NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

No notice will be taken of anonymous correspondence. What is intended for insertion in the "JAPAN WEEKLY MAIL," must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.

It is particularly requested that all letters on business be addressed to the MANAGER, and Cheques be made payable to same; and that literary contributions be addressed to the EDITOR.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 13TH, 1906.

BIRTHS.

At No. 252, Bluff, Yokohama, on January 8th, Mrs. VICTOR HELLER, of a Daughter.

At Saga, Hizen, on Jan. 4th, to the Rev. and Mrs. H. V. S. PREEKE, a Son.

DEATHS.

At Hongkong, on the 5th instant, HERBERT ROSE, Manager of Samuel Samuel & Co., Taipeh, Formosa. (By cable).

At No. 179 Bluff, on 11th Jan., JAMES PEACE, of Yorkshire, England, in his 60th year. Kobe and Bangkok papers please copy.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

HENRY HARLAND, the well known author of "The Cardinal's Snuff-box," is dead.

LIEUT.-GENERAL UYEMURA, Commander of the garrison in Formosa, left Taipeh on Jan. 3d for Tokyo.

MR. HAGIWARA, Secretary of the Legation at Seoul, left on Jan. 7th for Tokyo on official business.

LIEUT.-GENERAL TACHIMI, Commander of the Eighth Division, who is now north of Mukden, was attacked by apoplexy on Jan. 2nd. According to an official telegram received on Jan. 7th, he is growing better.

PEUL MEURICE, the author, dramatist and literary executor of Victor Hugo, died in Paris on Dec. 11th.

MR. M. INAGAKI, Minister at Bangkok, arrived in Shanghai on Jan. 8th on his way home on official business.

EIGHT converted gunboats have arrived at Kure from Port Arthur. They were released from service on January 8th.

LIEUT.-GENERAL NOZAKI, on the retired list, is reported to be seriously ill, his condition having become critical on Jan. 8th.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's new steamer Takamatsu Maru was launched on Jan. 5th at the Sakurajima Shipbuilding Yard, Osaka.

THE Suwo (formerly Pobieda) left which is undergoing temporary repairs at Saseloh, will be brought to Yokosuka at the beginning of next month.

THE Osaka City Assembly has decided to disburse half a million yen to enforce strict disinfecting measures with regard to the plague.

A HUNDRED and twenty-six Russians fleeing from the troubles in Siberia arrived on Jan. 9th at Nagasaki from Vladivostok. Twenty-six have left for Shanghai.

THE Shin-Yubari coal mine, 1,820,000 tsubo, of Hokkaido, has been acquired by British capitalists. The mine will be worked with a capital of yen 5,500,000.

THE Hochi has a telegram from Seoul under date of Jan. 4th that pirates are committing outrages off Gensan. A Japanese gendarme was killed by them the previous day.

MR. SAITO Shigetaka, Director of the Yokohama Tax Bureau, has been appointed Director of the Kobe Customs. Mr. K. Takao, Director of the Nagasaki Tax Bureau, has been ordered to succeed him.

PRINCE Nashimoto, who was a staff officer of the Second Army, and has been undergoing treatment at Maiko on account of illness, is reported to have recovered. He will arrive on Jan. 12th in Tokyo with General Baron Ōku.

THE annual general meeting of the Kanagafuchi Cotton Spinning Co. will be held on Jan. 13th. The net income for the last half year of 1905 was yen 1,800,000, and the interim dividend is at the rate of 16 per cent. per annum.

THE horses in an empty carriage belonging to Mr. F. Retz became frightened on January 6th while descending Daikan-zaka, Motomachi. The betto and the driver were thrown out and injured, and the carriage was considerably damaged.

THE Hongkong Daily Press hears that the people of Honan are buying charms and amulets from men who promise to make them invulnerable against sword or bullet. This was a feature of the Boxer outbreak, and may mean something.

ACCORDING to official investigations at the end of December, soldiers from the front who underwent disinfecting measures numbered as follows: 159,436 at Ninoshima; 79,602 at Daiiri; and 67,079 at Wadamisaki. These were carried by 179 steamers to Ninoshima, 126 to Daiiri, 88 to Wadamisaki.

I. NOGUCHI (27), an alleged robber, who was recently arrested in Yokohama, escaped from a railway carriage on the evening of Jan. 8th near the village of Iriarai between Omori and Shinagawa on the way from Yokohama to Tokyo. He was escorted by a police officer of the Kotobuki-cho Office. The train was stopped at once and the man was re-captured. He was found to be injured so as to be unable to escape.

K. HASEGAWA (32), a deliverer of the Yokohama Post Office, has been arrested and removed to the Yokohama District Court. He is alleged to have stolen a money order enclosed in a letter to be delivered to a merchant in Sakuragi-cho and cashed it at the Uchida cho Post Office.

THE death is announced of Lieut-General Baron Nozaki. Formerly he was Commander of the Sixth Division. During the Japanese-China war, he was Commander of the First Division at home. The Emperor decorated him on Jan. 8th with the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun.

It is said that a meeting was recently held by the Korean Cabinet Ministers to consult as to the advisability of cutting their hair, and our Seoul weekly contemporary is informed that the Minister for Home Affairs set the example by having his hair cut, and requested his fellow officials to do the same.

ENSIGN T. Yendo attempted to commit suicide on Jan. 4th, at a hotel in Shichioji, Kyoto, by cutting his throat with a sword. He sustained severe injuries to his right leg in May, 1904, at Port Arthur, when East Keekwan-shan was occupied by the investing army. On account of the wound he lost his leg. Later, he was decorated with the sixth class order of the Golden Kite and the same class of Merit and received a pension. Subsequently he was placed on the retired list.

A TRAGICAL affair occurred on Jan. 10th in the barracks of the first regiment of infantry, Azabu, Tokyo. To celebrate the 10th anniversary of the occupation of Kaiping during the Japan-China war and to celebrate the disbanding of the soldiers who recently returned from the front, a special dinner was given by the commanding officer. Owing to excessive drinking, Sudzuki, a sub-sergeant, and Horiuchi, a soldier, quarreled on some trivial ground and the former, becoming excited stabbed the latter in the breast with a sword. The victim died immediately, and Sudzuki was arrested.

SIR Archibald Geikie anticipates another deluge. He delivered a lecture at Cambridge in connection with the newly-formed department of geography which he cordially recommended to the support of the university. His subject was the evolution of a landscape, and he said that the great fact, which met the student of physical geography at every step was the universal decay of the surface of the land. This decay was so material, he declared, that even if the agents at work never increased in activity a comparatively short period would suffice to reduce most of the dry land to the level of the sea, and confront us with another deluge.

CAPTAIN RICHARD HASTINGS HARRINGTON, R.N., whose death was announced in November, entered the Royal Navy in 1846. He took part, as midshipman of the Medea, in the boat attack and capture of 18 Chinese piratical junks in Mirs Bay and Tienpak in 1850. In 1852 he was with the Vestal at the capture of three slave-carrying vessels off Cuba, and two years later was with the Leopard in the Baltic at the destruction of Bomarsund and Fort Presto. Captain Harrington was also present at the taking of Kerch, Kinburn forts, and the night attack on Sevastopol. As lieutenant of the Euryalus he was specially mentioned and promoted for having taken command of the naval brigade at the attack on the batteries in the Straits of Shimonoseki, 1864, when the captain in command was wounded.

THE PRESS ON THE CABINET.

As to the lives of previous Cabinets, the following are the figures:—

First Ito	Cabinet ...	2 years 4 months.
Kuroda	" ... 1	" 6 "
First Yamagata	" ... 1	" 6 "
First Matsukata	" ... 1	" 4 "
Second Ito	" ... 4	" 1 "
Second Matsukata	" ... 1	" 5 "
Third Ito	" ... 0	" 6 "
Okuma-Itagaki	" ... 0	" 5 "
Second Yamagata	" ... 1	" 11 "
Fourth Ito	" ... 0	" 8 "
Katsura	" ... 4	" 8 "

The Hochi Shimbun professes to give an accurate account of the procedure with regard to the change of Cabinet. It sets out by explaining Count Katsura's motives, namely, that the Peking Treaty not being wholly satisfactory a collision with the Diet was inevitable, and it goes on to say that on the 18th the Premier had an interview with Marquis Saionji, in which he offered to resign in the latter's favour, provided that nothing was done to disturb the policy of the Katsura Ministry, especially in the matter of finance, and provided that no changes were made in the Vice-Ministers and Chiefs of Bureaux. Marquis Saionji consented at once. When Marquis Ito was consulted he gave it as his opinion that the Katsura Ministry should face the situation, and if defeated in the Diet, should resign unconditionally. But Marquis Saionji having virtually pledged himself to the Premier, things were allowed to stand. Marquis Yamagata was then approached, and he answered that he would be answerable for the Army and Navy and that the new Cabinet should have his support. Marquis Saionji then proceeded to form his Cabinet. He desired to retain the services of General Terauchi, Admiral Yamamoto, Baron Kioura (Agriculture and Commerce) and Mr. Oura (Communications). General Terauchi consented, after some demur, but Admiral Yamamoto resolutely declined, and the portfolio finally fell to his nominee, Rear-Admiral Saito. Baron Kioura, who is one of Count Inouye's proteges, declared himself in need of rest, and his intimate friend Mr. Matsuoka was accordingly appointed. As for Mr. Oura, he said that he had resolved to take a trip abroad, so his portfolio was given to Marquis Yamagata's son-in-law, Mr. Yamagata Isaburo. General Terauchi's consent to remain in office is said to have been largely due to Marquis Yamagata's persuasion. Other particulars are given by our contemporary, but the only interesting point is that the budget for next year was suggested in outline by Count Inouye.

The Fiji Shimpō, as might have been expected, has nothing good to say of the outgoing Cabinet. It declines to acknowledge even the claim that the Ministry remained in office for 4½ years, since, according to the Fiji's view, 2 years of that lease of life were due entirely to the necessity of political union imposed on the nation by the war. As for the new Ministry, our contemporary's opinion, briefly stated, is that, the time not having yet arrived for party Cabinets in their entirety, Marquis Saionji had to strike a balance between the constitutional system and the influence of the Elder Statesmen. The result is a Ministry whose composition appears distinctly nondescript, but the nation must be content to think that nothing better could be done. At all events Marquis Saionji is to be unreservedly praised for stepping into the breach, and it is to be hoped that he will use his tenure of power to promote the ends of constitutional government.

The Kokumin Shimbun writes in a strain which will attract much attention not only because the newspaper was originally founded on popular interests, as its name implies, but also because the view expressed is striking. That view is, in so many words, that Marquis Saionji, though the leader of a great political party, has exerted himself to form a Ministry which shall be as far as possible removed from party influences. He recognises, in fact, that the day for party cabinets has gone by, and being himself a man with all the courage of his opinions, he has employed his own hand to give the last blow to that system. Therefore, while some people are congratulating themselves that the new Cabinet brings them an inch nearer the dawn of party administration, the Kokumin congratulates itself that the new Cabinet puts back the hands on the dial of that clock by a hundred years. It must be confessed that in thus writing the Kokumin is quite consistent. It supported the Katsura Cabinet frankly as a non-party Cabinet. It rejoices in the composition of the new Cabinet because party elements are not prominent.

The Nichi Nichi dwells on the difficulties lying in the path of the Saionji Ministry and applauds the Marquis for accepting office at such a time. Those difficulties consist mainly of post-bellum finances and post-bellum undertakings. If these are to be successfully dealt with, the prime aim should be to obtain the coöperation of the people at large. Let the channel be dug in the right direction and the water will naturally flow into it.

The Asahi Shimbun has nothing particular to say. It is pleased that the new Cabinet consists of new men, and from the secrecy in which the preliminaries to its organization have been conducted, our contemporary infers that Marquis Saionji will be able to secure union.

From the tone of the Progressist organs we judge that the new Cabinet must anticipate opposition at the hands of the Kensei-hontō in the Diet.

The Yomiuri calls it a hybrid Ministry—the term used is Nyūe Naikaku, the Nyūe being a fabulous monster, partly ape, partly tiger and partly snake, traditionally reported to have tormented the Emperor Toba. Such a Cabinet is very far indeed from the Yomiuri's ideal. Its only good feature is that it includes several young men. Marquis Saionji himself must feel profoundly dissatisfied, but it may be presumed that he did the best possible under the circumstances. He is to be sympathised with in his difficulties.

The shadow of the Elder Statesmen broods over the whole political arena in Japan. They control everything and accept no responsibility for anything. If there be any laudable feature about the new Ministry that feature is its transition character. Marquis Saionji may at all events labour to remove the influence of the Elder Statesmen. If he does that, his assumption of power will have been a distinct step of progress.

We (Japan Mail) may observe en passant that the Yomiuri finds it natural that foreign onlookers should regard Japanese politics as very strange. So they do, but not at all for the reason alleged by our contemporary. What they consider strange is, not that the nation should be led by the statesmen who have made the New Japan, but that any section of the nation should gird at such leadership. Other peoples are eager to avail themselves of the ripe experience and proved ability of their veteran leaders, but in Japan the party represented by the Yomiuri would throw their elders overboard and place the helm entirely in the hands of comparatively untried juniors.

The Hochi Shimbun, another Progressist organ, renews the old cry of hambatsu (clan eclectics), and extends its attack to the House of Peers.

OVERCOATS ON OCCASIONS OF CEREMONY.

Referring to a letter which appears in our correspondence columns on the subject of overcoats at the ceremony of opening the Diet, it may be well to remind "Civilian" that the notice to which he alludes was addressed not to foreigners alone but to Japanese, and that the former are a mere drop in the ocean compared with the latter. These notices—or shidai-gaki—are published in the first place in the Official Gazette, and are subsequently epitomized for insertion in foreign local journals. The idea, in the case of the overcoats, has never presented itself to us in the light now thrown on it by "Civilian." What we have always understood by the instruction is that to avoid confusion and delay such as would be inseparable from the deposit of hundreds of overcoats within the precincts of the House of Peers—where, as a matter of course and as fully recognised by our correspondent, they must necessarily be taken off—the plan is adopted of having them taken off at the gate and deposited each in the vehicle of its owner. Certainly, as "Civilian" points out, the moment of passing from the outer gate of the enclosure to the door of the House of Peers may be a very trying one and may result in the contracting of many colds, but the officials appear to have thought even that risk preferable to the alternative of a depository of coats within the Chamber. At all events, the chief point is that our correspondent seems to regard the notice as addressed wholly or mainly to foreigners, whereas these form scarcely five per cent. of the persons attending the ceremony. He would scarcely advocate that a notice appearing in one form in the Official Gazette for the behoof of Japanese subjects, should be altered for presentation to foreigners on the supposition that the latter are better versed in the rules of etiquette than the former.

MISS ALINE PURVIS.

We stated a few weeks ago that the Royal Humane Society had granted a medal to Miss Aline Purvis for her courageous attempt to save the life of Professor Griffin who was drowned in Hakone Lake in the summer of 1904. It will be remembered that Miss Purvis, a young lady still in her teens, dived into 17 feet of water and sought to reach Professor Griffin who had sunk, and whose body could be seen lying on the bottom. We understand that the matter was brought to the notice of the Humane Society by Mrs. Walter Weston immediately after the latter's return to England last spring, but owing to the necessity of correspondence with Japan on some matters of detail the award was delayed. All who know the young lady and all who admire acts of unselfish courage will be glad that this recognition has been given, and will desire that the presentation of the award may be made in as public a manner as possible.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The Council of the Progressists held a meeting on the 8th instant and decided that, in the Party's attitude towards the new Cabinet, they would follow the principles laid down by Count Okuma last year when speaking in the Kogetsu-ro: that is to say, they would welcome the Cabinet as representing an advance towards party government, they would extend to it their support, and if questions arose compelling them to differ from it, they would be guided in the controversy by rules of moderation and sincerity.

We may here mention that, according to the latest statistics, the composition of the Lower House at present is:—

Seiyu-kai .....	141
Progressists .....	96
Daido Club .....	84
Doko-kai .....	26
Unattached .....	30
Total .....	377

The full complement is 379, but two seats are vacant.

The House of Peers now numbers no less than 360 members against 379 in the House of Representatives. There are only 377 seats actually filled in the Lower House but 379 is the full complement. In the Upper Chamber a certain small expansion takes place from time to time owing to a gradual increase in the number of peers in the various orders. All peers of the rank of Marquis and upwards sit by hereditary right, but as there are very few additions made in the holders of these exalted titles, the House can scarcely be said to receive sensible increments from that source. The remark has less truth in the case of the three lowest orders—Counts, Viscounts and Barons—which return a per-centage of their representatives, but even with regard to these a considerable development is necessary in the total holders of patents before the fixed per-centage produces an additional member. Then there are the representatives of the highest tax-payers, one for each prefecture and therefore a virtually invariable total. It is to the Imperial nominees that we must turn to find the source of increase. These now aggregate 122, being thus a little more than one-third of the whole House. These Imperial nominees are life-members. Every one of them is a man who has distinguished himself in some career, and they thus represent probably the most enlightened and practically competent group of legislators sitting in any parliament. There has been a constant tendency towards increase in these nominees, for independently of the honour attaching to the position it brings to its holder the substantial salary of 2,000 yen annually. The composition of the Upper House at present is as follows:—

Princes of the Blood.....	13	All these sit by hereditary right.
Princes .....	10
Marquises .....	28
Counts .....	17
Viscounts .....	69
Barons .....	56
Imperial Nominees .....	122
Representatives of Highest Tax-payers .....	45
Total .....	360

It is stated that the measure much talked of in former years, namely, re-assessment of urban lands for taxation purposes, is about to be revived. The preliminary investigations have been made and the Cabinet will introduce a bill the basic idea of which will be re-assessment by taking the selling price and the letting price of the land as the standard of valuation. Should this measure be carried out frankly, the land taxes and land rates levied in the great cities would become almost intolerable unless the present rate of taxation, that is to say, the war rate—17½ per cent. of the assessed value—be reduced largely, and if such reduction is to be made one fails to see the immediate utility of re-assessment. The citizens of Tokyo, for example, used certainly to be too lightly taxed in respect of land when compared with the holders of agricultural lots, but the balance has been fully redressed by the war-rates, and even now many complaints are heard about the high rents that have to be charged for houses and the costliness of lodgings. We can not doubt that all these things will be taken into due consideration, but evidently the outlook is regarded in some quarters as disquieting.

Several Japanese journals have published what professes to be the Japanese text of the Peking Treaty. Instead of translating this we think it will be wiser to await the official version, which is not likely to be published for some ten days. In the matter of railways, the only new concession obtained by Japan is that of the Antung-Mukden line, under the conditions already detailed in our columns. All the provisions of the Treaty are known to our readers. There is nothing to add to what has appeared in previous issues of this journal. No allusion whatever is made in the body of the Treaty to either the Mukden-Hsinmintun or the Changchun-Harbin roads.

It is stated that Marquis Ito and Baron Kaneko will be appointed members of the Privy Council and that the same honour will be conferred on Baron Suyematsu when he returns. Rumour further says that Baron Komura, Mr. Hatano, Mr. Seki (Chief of Police) and Mr. Tokuno will be nominated members of the House of Peers.

Count Katsura, Baron Komura and Admiral Yamamoto are to receive, even when out of office, the treatment extended to Ministers of State.

The Nichi Nichi says that Barons Sone and Kioura will be appointed members of the Privy Council.

We read in the Kokumin that Viscount Aoki is to be the first Japanese Ambassador to the United States, but the Jiji speaks of Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku for this post. Mr. Kurino seems to be certain for the Paris embassy and Mr. K. Inouye for that in Berlin.

The Official Gazette of the 6th instant contained an Ordinance raising the Legations in Washington and Berlin to the rank of embassies, and fixing the salaries of the Ambassadors at 30,000 yen and 25,000 respectively.

The Emperor has been pleased to direct that Admiral Baron Yamamoto shall receive the treatment of a Minister of State though he has ceased to be a member of the Cabinet.

The following are the ages of the members of the new Cabinet:—

	Years.	Months.
Marquis Saionji, Premier.....	56	4
Mr. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs.....	46	1
Mr. Hara, Minister for Home Affairs.....	50	—
Dr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance.....	43	1
Admiral Saito, Minister for the Navy.....	47	4
Mr. Matsuda, Minister for Justice .....	60	10
Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce .....	59	8
Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications.....	48	2
Mr. Makino, Minister for Education .....	44	4
General Terauchi, Minister for War .....	54	—

THE PRIME MINISTER &amp; THE PROGRESSIST LEADER.

According to the Asahi Shimbun Marquis Saionji invited Mr. Oishi Masami to visit him on the 6th instant, and Mr. Oishi did so with the consent of Count Okuma. The Marquis said that he had been for some days desirous of meeting the Progressists' leader but that no opportunity had offered on account of his multifarious duties. He showed Mr. Oishi the list of the new Cabinet and expressed a hope that the Ministry might count on the support of the Progressists in the Lower House. Mr. Oishi replied that he applauded Marquis Saionji's courage in agreeing to organise the Ministry. He criticized one or two of the nominations for the new Cabinet, but he promised that the Progressists would support it as far as possible, especially in the great work of post bellum arrangements. At the same time he reminded the Marquis that vicissitudes and changes must always be anticipated in the field of politics and that no promise of support could be permanent. His Party nevertheless would do everything in its power to promote the practical reality of constitutional institutions, and to that end he begged the new Premier to refrain from any recourse to the infamous bacillus renju which had unfortunately become a feature of the time. The Marquis answered that while thanking Mr. Oishi for his criticism of the new portfolio-holders, he could not possibly make any change at this eleventh hour. He, however, assured his visitor that the Seiyu-kai did not yield to the Progressists in their earnest desire to promote the cause of constitutional methods, and that he intended to set his face rigidly against the bacillus renju.

The Dakokai and certain other small coteries of politicians have united to form the "Seiko Club" (political friends) and are expected to command some 40 votes in the Lower House. The leaders of the Association are Messrs. Shimada Saburo and Kono Hironaka. It is stated that they have announced their intention of acting the part of bystanders with reference to the parliamentary career of the new Cabinet. They admit frankly that so long as the influence of the Elder Statesmen is paramount no purely party Ministry can be organized. From that point of view, however, the Saionji Cabinet is a good deal better than the Katsura Cabinet was, and the Seiko club will not oppose it merely for the sake of destruction. On the contrary it will assist the Ministry so long as the latter refrains from any attempt to increase the Army or the Navy.

We do not attach much credit to the pacific pronouncements of the Progressists and the Political Friends. Such fair promises are easy to make during the House's recess and in the absence of any exciting cause, but the Progressists, under the leadership of men like Mr. Oishi Masami and Inouye Ki are nothing if not fighters, and the same is true in a scarcely less degree of any party headed by Messrs. Kono Hironaka and Shimada Saburo. The Diet is not going to be a garden of roses. Things will probably move along quietly enough during the present session, but between March and December there will be ample time to stir up the lees of ancient contentions.

Negotiations between the Tokyo and Osaka Sugar Refining Companies for amalgamation are in progress. The President of the joint company will be Baron Shibusawa.

THE CABINET.

Admiral Yamamoto, in handing over to Admiral Saito the portfolio of the Navy, said that he himself had served 15 years at the Department, of which time one half had been passed in subordinate positions under Admiral Kabayama, Admiral Nire and Admiral Saigo, and during the remaining half he had been himself Minister. He must say that in the main he had merely carried out instructions and that, if there had been during his tenure of office anything good or any progress connected with the Navy, the credit did not rest with him but with his seniors. So, if his administration had been at all successful in the China-Japan war, in the North-China complication and in the Russo-Japanese war, he was equally indebted to the direction of his seniors and to the loyalty and ability brought to the discharge of their duties by all the officers and men of the Navy and by the officials of the Department. The war with Russia was now over but a great task had still to be accomplished, the task of post-bellum arrangements. In the budget for next year nothing more had been attempted than to make provision for restoring what the war had destroyed or impaired, but thereafter it would be necessary to consider what was required in the way of educational reforms and new undertakings, and the Navy was to be heartily congratulated on falling under the control of a really active man at this crisis of its history. He trusted that all the officials of the Department would bring to the discharge of their functions under his successor as much industry and competence as they had displayed towards the out-going Minister, who now thanked them most heartily.

Admiral Saito, the new Minister, in a brief speech, said that he felt profoundly reluctant to accept such an onerous responsibility at a time when the affairs of the Navy occupied such an important place in the nation's regard, but he intended to be guided faithfully by the policy pursued by his distinguished predecessor, to whom he begged to offer his sincerest thanks for long and valuable instruction, and he took the opportunity of expressing the hope that the officials of the Department would continue to lend their valuable assistance to himself in the discharge of his new functions.

Similar ceremonies took place at the various Departments of State on the 8th instant in connexion with the transfer of business to the new Ministers, and the first meeting of the incoming Cabinet was held in the Premier's residence at noon. The following Vice-Ministers were appointed:—

Mr. Wakatsuki Reijiro, hitherto Chief of the Taxation Bureau, to be Vice-Minister of Finance.

Rear-Admiral Kato Tomosaburo, hitherto Chief of the Bureau of Affairs and a member of Admiral Togo's Staff, to be Vice-Minister of the Navy.

Mr. Kawamura Jozaburo, hitherto Chief of the Bureau of Civil Law, to be Vice-Minister of Justice.

Mr. Anenokoji Ren, hitherto Chief of the Police Bureau, to be Vice-Minister of Home Affairs.

The Emperor has directed that Count Katsura shall receive the official treatment accorded to a Prime Minister. It is expected that His Excellency will be nominated a member of the High Council of War, and that Admiral Baron Yamamoto will receive a similar appointment.

Barons Komura and Kaneko have been appointed members of the Privy Council.

On the 8th instant Marquis Saionji summoned a meeting of the Council and Managers of the Seiyun-kai and addressed them briefly.

Doubtless they fully understood, he said, the reasons which had induced him to bow to the Sovereign's mandate and to organize a Cabinet, and the reasons why he had discharged this important duty without consulting them. He looked confidently for their support in carrying out the various measures of vital importance necessary in the sequel of the war.

Mr. Hara Kei and Mr. Matsuda Masahisa made brief speeches announcing their acceptance of the portfolios of Home Affairs and of Justice respectively, and Mr. Matsuda formally resigned the presidency of the Lower House. Some discussion took place as to his successor in that post but no decision was reached.

MR. FUKUCHI GENICHIRO.

Mr. Fukuchi Genichiro expired at 2 a.m. on the 4th instant at the age of 66. He was one of the most distinguished literateurs of the Meiji era. A native of Nagasaki, his diligence in study and his proficiency in foreign languages soon brought him into notice and he served in various positions under the Bakufu Government, being sent abroad four times to accompany missions. When the Shogunate's fate was nearly sealed, he stood forth as an advocate of forceful resistance, and published in that interest the first Japanese newspaper, a sheet called the Koko Shimbun (the World). This involved him in a collision with the Authorities and he was thrown into prison. Subsequently he accompanied Marquis (then Mr.) Ito to Europe. In 1874 he became a member of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun staff, and soon ranked on the same plane with the great editors Kurimoto Joun of the Hochi, and Narishima Ryuhoku of the Choya. Those were the days of the Nichi Nichi's greatest fame, and the name of Fukuchi Genichiro was honoured as that of Japan's premier journalist. But the Nichi Nichi's connexion with the Government in those times of keen political turmoil gradually detracted from the paper's popularity, and after an unsuccessful attempt to organize a party called the Teisei-to, Mr. Fukuchi abandoned the profession of journalism in 1887. We need scarcely say that a deeper cause than those enumerated here was immediately responsible for his fall from fame, but in the case of such a man the rule of de mortuis may be observed with propriety. After his retirement from public life he occupied himself with literary pursuits, notably the composition of dramas for the modern stage. The Kabukiza theatre owed a large part of its regeneration to his efforts. Within recent years he emerged from retirement and was elected a member of the House of Representatives, but death overtook him just as a new career of distinction seemed to be dawning. The three books which will make his name remembered are Kwai o-jidan (talks of old times), Bakufu suibo-ron (fall of the Bakufu) and Bakumetsu seijika (statesmen at the close of the Bakufu).

DEATH OF PRINCE KUJO.

We regret to announce the death of Prince Kujo Michitaka, which occurred on the 4th instant. The Prince was 67 years of age. He had suffered some time previously from heart-trouble, but had made an apparently complete recovery. On the afternoon of the 3rd instant, while conversing with a guest, he succumbed to a sudden seizure and never subsequently rallied, death ensuing at 1 p.m. on the 4th. The Prince was father of Her Imperial Highness the Princess Imperial. Prince Kujo was a direct descendant of Fujiwara Kamatari. Under the old system the office of Kvampaku had been hereditary in this house, and it had also furnished consorts for the Sovereign. The daughters of the deceased Prince, four in number, are married respectively to Prince Yamashina, to Count Otani, to the Prince Imperial and to the Lord Abbot of Bukko-ji. His younger brother is Prince Nijo; one of his sons has been adopted into the family of Prince Ichijo, and his son and heir is serving as an Imperial Chamberlain.

On the 9th instant the Emperor addressed a message to the Minister of the Household lauding the services rendered to the State by the late Prince Kujo, who commanded the Imperial forces at the time of the Oshu expedition in 1867, and after much hardship carried the Imperial arms to victory, thus setting an example of valour and zeal among the highest families in the land. His Majesty instructed the Minister to take all steps necessary for honouring the memory of the illustrious deceased and directed that a sum of 20,000 yen be allotted for the purpose from the privy purse.

DEATH OF MR. PEACE.

Mr. Peace, who practised as a solicitor in Kobe during the 90's and after a short stay in Bombay settled down to the practise of his profession in Bangkok, died in Yokohama at 2.30 p.m. on Thursday after a long illness heroically borne. The first symptoms of the fell disease which has carried him off in his 60th year—cancer—were only apparently detected early last year, but by July he had lost the power of speech, and Dr. Gregory Jordan and other medical men when consulted in Hongkong gave the unfortunate gentleman but a short time to live. He reached Japan in the early autumn but was soon confined to his room, gradually fading away. He leaves a wife, one son and two daughters (Mrs. H. H. Grimble and Miss Peace) and to them our sincere condolences are extended in this hour of their distress.

THE CHINESE STUDENTS.

It appears that the Chinese Representative applied to the Waiwupu for instructions as to the method of dealing with the Chinese students' strike in Tokyo, and the Waiwupu in turn handed over the question to the educational authorities who finally decided to despatch an official to Japan who should act in the dual capacity of controller and representative of the students. Since the departure of the implacables, about a thousand in number, there seems to have been a vehement discussion among the seven thousand students who remain. Some of them urged the wisdom of resuming their studies and others maintained that the only manly course was to return home. After long dispute the former party is said to have won the day, and according to present arrangements the students will all return to their various schools on the 11th instant. We say "all" because, although some are under sentence of expulsion, it has been decided, at the instance of the Chinese Minister, to revoke the sentence and allow the lads to attend their classes as though nothing untoward had occurred. That so far as we can see, is the only concession made by the Japanese Authorities.

THE PEKING TREATY.

The versions of this Treaty published by the press are now accepted as genuine and they provoke a good deal of comment. The Jiji Shimpō takes the lead in condemning the terms. Naturally its main objections relate to railways. The proceedings of the Portsmouth conference show that Japan originally asked for the whole of the East Chinese Railway as far as Harbin and that she agreed to a compromise, namely, to leave the Changchun-Harbin portion in Russian hands, provided that her own right to construct the Changchun-Kirin road was acknowledged. Thus the latter line may be said to have formed an integral part of the Portsmouth Treaty, yet not the smallest allusion is made to it in the Peking Treaty, and the public are left to infer some secret arrangement by which Japan is to have the privilege of supplying one-half of the capital under certain conditions. Again, the Mukden-Hsinmintun military line, though actually constructed and actually in Japan's possession receives no mention in the Peking agreement. The Jiji is unwilling to pursue with criticism a Cabinet which has resigned, but it can not find anything good to say of the Treaty.

The Kokumin Shimbun takes precisely the opposite line. It declares that so soon as the Japanese Plenipotentiaries obtained China's endorsement of the terms of the Portsmouth Convention, they had performed their part and done even more than was generally expected. No little apprehension had been entertained that the Chinese Government would decline to agree to the conditions accepted by the Russians at Portsmouth, for they might not unnaturally have taken the line that this would be merely exchanging King Log for King Stork. Nevertheless they did agree, and it was no small diplomatic feat to secure their agreement. In addition to that achievement, however, the Japanese Plenipotentiaries secured the practical enforcement of the open door and equal opportunities for all in the Three Eastern Provinces, and secured also some further important advantages for their country. The Treaty must therefore be described as an undoubted success.

The Nippon points out that there is nothing whatever about three very important questions which the public had fondly expected to be definitely settled; namely, the question of posts and telegraphs; the question of the navigation of the Liao River; and the question of extending recognition to Japan's military notes as duly authorized currency. No one can call such an agreement quite satisfactory. Nevertheless the Nippon accords a certain measure of negative praise to the Peking Treaty. For this reason. By the Portsmouth Treaty a situation was practically created which signified the division of Manchuria into two parts, namely, the north which was to be Russia's sphere of influence, and the south which was to be Japan's. It is certain that under this arrangement Russia would have demanded from China within the Russian sphere privileges equal to all those obtained by Japan within the Japanese sphere. But the Peking Treaty has not conferred upon Japan any special privileges such as may not be duplicated in the north on Russia's account without inconvenient consequences. From that point of view the Treaty must be called a statesmanlike convention.

The Nichi Nichi does not think that the Treaty fulfils all expectations but it insists that China's position had to be considered, and that if the agreement be wisely and discreetly carried out; Japan may derive considerable advantage without at all encroaching upon China's legitimate rights.

The Chuo Shimbun, like the Nichi Nichi, refrains from any severe criticism. In fact, this journal is disposed to applaud the Treaty as having accomplished the objects that Japan openly proposed to herself before the war, namely, the open door and the establishment of equal rights for all in Manchuria. Besides Japan can congratulate herself upon having obtained what may be called the backbone of Manchuria, and therefore she need not trouble about minor details. It will be for her people to utilize the advantages offered to them.

KOREA.

Friday, January 5.

A telegram from Seoul to the Nichi Nichi says that news having been received in the city of Marquis Ito's determination not to force or precipitate any reforms, but to proceed with the utmost deliberation and circumspection, the confidence felt in the Resident-General has been augmented and his coming is eagerly expected by all classes. The Koreans are evidently afraid of nothing so much as being hustled out of their old-time grooves.

Pirates have made their appearance in the sea off Kunsan in Chhollado. They have murdered a Japanese gendarme.

Saturday, January 6.

There has been a collision between Korean troops and the inhabitants of a district near Wiju. Some casualties occurred and ultimately 5 Japanese gendarmes were sent to restore order.

The Il Ching-hoi are said to be the victims of violence at the hands of two other parties in Korea, and as the Authorities do not take efficient measures to protect life and property the Il Ching-hoi are arranging to help themselves. It is feared that this may lead to some disturbance. The enemies of the Il Ching-hoi—who support Japan's policy—are described as the "Education Party" and the "Young Men's Association."

The Residency-General is to have its offices in the building hitherto used as the Korean Foreign Office.

Monday, January 8.

The Foreign Office has published a letter addressed to it by a Japanese subject living in Korea, with reference to the interpretation assigned by some Koreans to the term Tō-kan (Resident General)—we use the Japanese pronunciation of the ideographs. It appears that in the Korean nomenclature all officials of Sō-nin rank are called Rei-kan. Ministers of the Crown are called generically Tai-kan, and the Emperor himself is called Jō-kan. According to the view of Korean ideographers the term Tō-kan includes all these functions and is higher than even the title Jō-kan. The writer of the letter asks the Foreign Office to give an authoritative ruling as to whether this rendering is correct or not.

In the second place the writer says that, collating the views of the Koreans, he finds they have in general no complaint to make against their country becoming a protectorate of Japan. They desire merely to have appearances saved. They do not ask whether the Li Family are to rule or not, or whether in fact they are to be under Japan's tutelage. What they fear is that the Japanese will cross over in great numbers, and, under various pretexts, will impair the rights of the Koreans themselves and reduce them to a kind of slavery. If, on the contrary, the Japanese rescue the Koreans from their unenlightened state and accord to them equal rights, the people of the peninsula will welcome the new comers and accept their presence with tranquil gratitude. Such is said to be the view of many Koreans and the importance of treating them kindly is therefore dwelt on by the writer of the letter.

Wednesday, January 10.

The recent disturbers of the peace in provincial districts of Korea appear to have abandoned their violent schemes since the arrest of their leaders. Nothing is to be seen of them any longer.

The French Representative is said to be rapidly making preparations to depart from Seoul. He is pressing the Korean Government to settle several pending questions before his departure.

Thursday, January 11.

The Resident-General's office in Seoul is to be opened for business on the 1st of February.

Apparently it is part of the Resident-General's plan to continue and extend the system of advisers. There is talk of the appointment of several further officials to these positions.

COUNT ARCO VALLEY.

Rumour alleges that the German Representative in Peking is to come to Japan as his country's first Ambassador to the Mikado's Court. There are doubtless sufficient reasons for this change. Indeed, with the exception of Sir Claude MacDonald, whose services in connexion with the Alliance constitute a special claim, all the Tokyo Representatives of the Great Powers seem destined to be removed to make room for successors of ambassadorial rank. That is seen to be natural enough when we regard the matter carefully, for Tokyo, in its Legation days, was not by any means the highest rung in the ladder of pre-ambassadorial promotion. The Peking Legation ranked higher, as did several of the European, and just as it would have been quite out of the routine that a Minister Plenipotentiary should pass from Tokyo direct to an embassy elsewhere, so when Tokyo was elevated to ambassadorial rank, it is right that its embassies should fall to the next in order for such promotion, not to those already serving there as Ministers. Still though the etiquette of promotion may demand Count Arco Valley's transfer, there is no one of any nationality in Japan who will not profoundly regret the change. It is not merely that by his zealous and able discharge of official duties Count Arco has won universal esteem, but that his qualities as a man have endeared him to everybody. He is the very personification of altruism, never by any chance sparing himself if others can be spared thereby and never failing to obey the minutest dictates of almost limitless kindness. We are reluctant to write in too full terms about an official who is still among us but Count Arco Valley presents to the public a study in the highest type of human nature and he must pardon us if we take a philosophic as well as a historical interest in his career. His departure from Tokyo will be a very great loss to the city, and he may be assured that among his many admirers the Japanese are not the least hearty.

CHINA.

Saturday, January 6.

It is stated that the three Chinese Envoys who are now at Shanghai preparatory to visiting Japan en route for the West, have been asked by the Tokyo Government to defer their visit pending the complete settlement of the affair of the Chinese students. With reference to this latter problem we may here mention that Viceroy Chang is said to have appointed a commission of six members who are to proceed to Japan for the purpose of admonishing the students. If the coming of this commission be awaited before the Envoys leave Shanghai the latter event is likely to be considerably delayed. These Envoys have been most unfortunate. The bomb-throwing incident caused a long postponement of their departure from Peking, and now the prosecution of their journey beyond Shanghai has been interrupted by the students' strike. It is an obvious inference that the Japanese Authorities recognise the existence of a political element in the students' agitation.

Attention is drawn by one of our Tokyo contemporaries to the fact that the development of Japanese trade is taking place mainly with northern China and that comparatively little progress is made in the south. This fact is indicated by the following table, which shows the order occupied by the commercial transactions of the Powers with the various Chinese ports:—

Newchwang—Japan, England, China, Germany.
Tientsin—England, China, Japan, Germany.
Chefoo—England, Japan, China, Germany.
Kiaochow—Germany, Japan, England, China.
Chingwantao—England, Japan, China, Germany.
Yangtsz-kiang—England, China, Japan, Germany.
Ports between the Yangtsz and Canton—England, China, Japan.

Monday, January 8.

The three Envoys now waiting in Shanghai have postponed their departure for Japan until the next French mail steamer.

There is a rumour that Mr. Sheng I-hwai, Chief Commissioner of Railways, has died suddenly.

The students who recently left Tokyo have assembled to the number of 800 or 900 in Shanghai, and are projecting the establishment of schools there. Teachers, it is said, will be obtained from Europe and America. It is a very happy thing, we imagine, that youths with such hot fancies as these students displayed when in Tokyo, should receive their education outside Japan.

Russian insurgents are said to have entered Kiakta and committed many outrages. The Chinese Authorities have made formal application to Russia for their control, but Russia's hands are already pretty full.

Wednesday, January 10.

The Hochi Shimbun's Peking correspondent says that, according to Chinese calculations, the number of Chinese subjects in Manchuria who lost their lives in the war was 20,000, and losses of property totalled 40 millions of yen. The Chinese Government is represented as entertaining some idea of preferring a claim on these accounts to Russia and Japan. Baron Komura is said to have been approached on the subject during his recent sojourn in Peking, and his reply is alleged to have been that if an exact account could be prepared Japan might possibly take the matter into consideration. It is obvious, however, that an exact account would be extremely difficult if not impossible to compile, for no trustworthy means would be available of distinguishing between injuries caused by the Russian forces and injuries caused by the Japanese. To impartial outsiders it seems very evident that China herself should gladly bear these losses in consideration of the fact that she is to recover the whole of Manchuria without firing a shot on her own account. Never, indeed, was a Power treated with such extraordinary leniency. A veritably romantic standard has been prescribed by the nations for Japan's guide in this matter. Would any other Power have consented to make gratis such an immense restoration of territory after incurring such a vast loss of life and treasure to expel its invaders? If there be such a Power, the history of the past furnishes no clue to its identity. And yet, in the face of this colossal act of generosity on Japan's part, China ventures to talk of compensation for the paltry suffering endured by her subjects in the restored territory. We observe, however, that China is believed to be unlikely to press the claim. She would have been better advised had she never referred to it.

ADMIRAL ROJESTVENSKY.

Admiral Rojestvensky's utterance in the Novoye Vremya stands at the very head of all the silly things that have been said in connexion with the war. Until the moment of this article's publication the Admiral was in the happy possession of one of the extremely few bright reputations won by his country's commanders in the campaign. He had brought out safely from Europe a heterogeneous fleet under circumstances of baffling difficulty, and he had advanced stoutly to deliver against the Japanese an attack which, some folks are charitable enough to believe, might have ended less disastrously for Russia had not he himself fallen severely wounded at the outset. Thus there remained to him at any rate the name of a potential captain. But by his article in the Russian journal he has proved himself totally deficient in common-sense and curiously ignorant of the elementary laws of international intercourse. One easily understands now how natural it must have seemed to such a person that French ports and French supplies should be always available to Russian ships engaged fighting with the ships of a State towards which France occupied the position of a friendly neutral. If Admiral Rojestvensky imagined—as he has now declared that he did—if he imagined that it was quite within the range of legitimate international relations that the navy of a neutral should be assembled and held in readiness to destroy the ships of one belligerent in case the other belligerent left the task uncompleted, then it is obvious that the whole of his journey from the Baltic to the Sea of Japan was beset with contingencies which might at any moment have involved France, England or Germany in most serious complications. The man has not the most rudimentary conception of neutrality and what it imposes. Treachery, too, of the blackest kind appears to present itself to his mind as a familiar incident. England was at peace with Russia and had taken infinite pains to discharge all neutral responsibilities throughout the war. Yet the commander-in-chief of the Baltic Fleet now quietly announces that the squadron of this neutral Power lay in wait at Weihaiwei to fall on his ships if the enemy failed to destroy them. No wonder that the Hull trawlers came in for rough handling from the Balticks and no wonder that the latter abused French hospitality so flagrantly. Perhaps the solution of this extraordinary incident is to be found in Admiral Rojestvensky's wound. He received a fracture of the skull, and although, he left Japan in a nominally convalescent condition, the excitement of returning to Russia and the circumstances awaiting him there may have intensified the effects of his injury so as to deprive him partially of reasoning faculty. That is the most charitable hypothesis. Should it not be confirmed, then indeed the world may well draw a long breath in reflecting over the perils to which its peace was exposed so long as a commander like Rojestvensky ranged the high seas with unlimited authority over a powerful fleet of war-ships.

There are conflicting telegrams about the sequel of Admiral Rojestvensky's marvellous utterance in the columns of the Novoye Vremya. One telegram alleges that the Russian Government has demanded an explanation from the British, which assertion is flatly denied in England. Another message reverses the order of the demand and makes the query come from Great Britain. Yet another represents England as addressing Rojestvensky. The probability is that no such step has yet been taken on either side. It is easy, however, to credit a cablegram which says that Count Witte laughs at the Admiral's extravagance and declares that no serious Russian will pay any attention to such assertions. There is a suggestion that Rojestvensky is endeavouring to influence public opinion in his own favour and to affect the verdict of the Court-martial before which he will have to appear presently, but that is hard to conceive since the Admiral must know well that the Court-martial is a mere matter of form. In our opinion the only tenable solution of the mystery is that the unfortunate officer is suffering from some cerebral disturbance caused by his wound. At all events he has fatally marred the prospect which was said to be opening before him: the Tsar can never appoint him to the portfolio of the Navy after such a fiasco.

GENERALS NOGI, NOZU AND OKU.

General Nogi reached Ujina at 8.30 a.m. on the 10th and left Hiroshima at 7 a.m. on the 12th. He will make his triumphal entry into Tokyo on the 14th instant, which happens to be the anniversary of the day when he made his entry into Port Arthur. We read in the Asahi that when the General left Fukuinun he received numerous marks of the esteem in which he was held by the inhabitants. They sent him a colossal umbrella and a flag, each bearing the ideographs ban-min (all the people). This umbrella has been from time immemorial an emblem in China of successful official protection. Under it the people are supposed to have enjoyed prosperity and peace.

The General says that if his own wishes were consulted, he would return to Japan hidden in the least conspicuous costume procurable. He notes some remarkable coincidences: that he paid his second visit to Port Arthur on the very day of the place's capitulation a year previously; that he embarked at Tairen in the very ship which carried Stoessel and his staff to Nagasaki; that at Ujina he exchanged salutes with a batch of Russian prisoners returning home, and that he is to enter Tokyo on the anniversary of the day when he entered Port Arthur after its surrender.

General Oku is to enter Tokyo to-day at 10.39 a.m.

THE ANNUAL BANQUET IN THE PALACE.

The Emperor received the Princes of the Blood, the high officers of State and the Foreign Representatives in the Homei-den of the Imperial Palace at luncheon on the 5th instant, according to the usual custom of opening the new year. The Prince Imperial was not present owing to the death of his father-in-law. On either side of the Sovereign at the banquet were ranged four Princes of the Blood, and the fifth place on the left and right respectively was occupied by Marquis Ito and the British Ambassador. The Emperor delivered a very brief speech, confining himself to an expression of the satisfaction it gave him to meet the distinguished company on this auspicious occasion and to wishing prosperity to the Heads of the various States. His Majesty's words were translated into English by Count Toda. Count Katsura, speaking on behalf of the Cabinet and the other Japanese subjects present, expressed in a few words their appreciation of the honour conferred on them by the Sovereign and their respectful wishes for the perpetual happiness of the Emperor and Empress and the prosperity of the Imperial House. Sir Claude Macdonald, on behalf of the Corps Diplomatique, speaking in French, repeated the wishes expressed by Count Katsura, thanked His Majesty for his gracious reference to the Heads of the States represented on this occasion, and trusted that the good relations now happily existing between Japan and those States would be preserved and still further strengthened. Count Toda translated Sir Claude's speech into Japanese.

It will be observed that whereas the Emperor's speech was translated into the English language the British Ambassador spoke in French. Doubtless in this matter Sir Claude Macdonald felt that his position as British Ambassador should be merged in his functions as Doyen of the Corps Diplomatique, in whose behalf His Excellency addressed the Throne. Yet we can not but feel that since the Emperor chose the English language to convey his congratulations to the Corps Diplomatique, there might have been a wholesome departure from the old groove in which this convention has moved for so many years. French is a beautiful and eminently expressive language: in these respects it certainly occupies the premier place. But it can no longer assert any comparison with English in extent of use and utility, and at a Court where the initiative comes from the Sovereign himself, the language of Anglo-Saxondom might surely be accorded the position of honour.

THE JAPANESE MERCANTILE MARINE.

The Ship-owners Association (Senshu Dōmei-kai) now own 350,000 tons of vessels, and its members are said to be agitating for an amendment of the Navigation Encouragement Law. According to that Law, no steamer is eligible for a bounty unless she displace at least a thousand tons and have a minimum speed of 10 knots. The Ship-owners Association advocates the abolition of these limits as to speed and size, their idea being that all vessels flying the Japanese flag should receive encouragement from the State. This very catholic doctrine is strongly combatted by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, which points out that such an indiscriminate and wholesale diversion of public funds into one special channel would be extremely false economy to say nothing of its administrative impropriety. There has been an exceedingly rapid development of Japan's mercantile marine during the past few years. In 1893 its total tonnage was 155,000; in 1897 the figure was 390,000, and in 1902 it stood at 900,000. The great development which took place in the five-year period, 1897 to 1902, was largely due to the operation of the laws enacted in 1896 for the encouragement of navigation, but must also be regarded as a sign of healthy commercial development. Between January, 1904, and October, 1905, an addition of 360,000 tons was made, and this, of course, must be regarded as quite apart from normal trade expansion, inasmuch as the added vessels were purchased to do the duty of steamers diverted to purposes of military transport or captured from the enemy. Apparently the main portion—virtually the whole, indeed—of this increment has passed into the possession of the Senshu Dōmei-Kai, and they are disposed to seek State aid for the maintenance of ships which have entered the field under these unusual circumstances. It is a false step. The Nichi Nichi urges the Association to face the situation boldly and seek the only legitimate and lasting kind of support, namely, that of the public at large.

We may mention here that the quantity of coal said to have been captured in Russian vessels during the war was:—

Cardiff, &c. ....	86,463 tons.
Japanese .....	7,825 "
Total .....	94,188 "

BISHOP AWDRY.

Bishop Awdry's letter to The Times would, we hoped, be suffered to pass into oblivion without attracting wide attention or causing much excitement. But, according to Mr. Ishikawa, London correspondent of the Hochi Shimbun, the letter created a great commotion in England. It is said to have furnished a text for renewed attacks on the Alliance by the latter's opponents, and to have been taken up by Mr. Leonard Courtney, who sought to prove that when such charges were preferred against the Japanese by a man in Bishop Awdry's position, there could be no doubt that the nation was unworthy to be Great Britain's ally and that any trust reposed in it would probably prove a source of disappointment and even disaster. Mr. Ishikawa writes in a very indignant tone. He states plainly that there is a strong feeling among churchmen in England as to the impropriety of leaving Bishop Awdry as the hierarch of the English Episcopalian Church in Japan, and that he should be recalled without delay. We can not, however, find any traces of the excitement referred to by Mr. Ishikawa. They do not appear in the correspondence columns of The Times, and the correspondence columns of The Times constitute the surest index of British public feeling. Mr. Leonard Courtney's long letter did not evoke a single rejoinder in the shape of protest or confirmation, so far as we can see, and we are inclined to think that Mr. Ishikawa, looking at the situation with naturally excited eyes, saw it in distorted proportions. We are bound to express the deliberate opinion that whatever grains of good may have been sown by the Bishop's letter, they are wholly swallowed up in the crop of mischievous tares it at once produced, but the best way to mitigate the situation is to keep silence. Those that know the Japanese know what a great though unwilling injustice Bishop Awdry did to them, and those that know

Bishop Awdry know that his genuine friendship for this country and its people induced him to write the letter and that the act must have cost him a bitter struggle.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Pessimistic accounts still continue to pour in from Russia. It is impossible to tell how greatly they exaggerate the facts or how far they fall short of them. The capture of Krasnoyarsk by the rebels is a heavy blow, not so much because of any special importance attaching to the place as because the difficulties of quelling an outbreak in this remote region must be immense. As for the estimate that the rebellion has thus far entailed a loss of two thousand million roubles, it is not at all incredible: in fact we may suspect it of being under the mark. Here we may mention that the latest news from Vladivostock indicates a most unquiet state of affairs. The Hungtusz appear to be the chief offenders against law and order. A thousand of them, who are said to have been originally in Russian employment, have grown insubordinate, and are reported to be raiding the town freely, directing their outrages chiefly against Japanese and Chinese subjects. Owing to the insecurity thus caused only one Japanese store has been opened, and great quantities of Japanese goods are said to be lying piled up on the wharves. The American Consul is making frequent and vigorous protests to the Russian Authorities, but the latter do not appear to have reorganized their forces sufficiently to deal effectually with the crisis.

We read in the Hochi Shimbun that the Tsar has conferred a high Order on Bishop Nicholai. Our contemporary reproduces the Imperial message accompanying the bestowal. It warmly eulogizes the unceasing and powerful efforts of the distinguished prelate in the cause of Christian propagandism, and alludes specially to his staunch adherence to his post throughout the war between his country and Japan. This honour is well bestowed.

The fourth big dock at Yokosuka has been finished and was opened with due ceremony on the 7th instant. Vice-Admiral Kamimura took the principal part in the ceremonies and the Emperor was represented by Prince Arisugawa. A conspicuous figure was that of Chief Engineer Ishiwada, who has served continuously at Yokosuka since 1867. The dimensions of the dock are the largest of any in Japan. It is capable of receiving a ship 165 metres long, 26 metres beam and drawing 9½ metres. The dock had been under construction since the close of 1901 and its cost has been 815,372 yen. It immediately received the Peresviet.

Lieut.-General Matsunaga, who was reported to be lying desperately ill in Mukden, is now said to have improved greatly and to be out of danger.

From the 1st of March next there will come into operation a new system of handling money through the medium of the post office. Briefly speaking the proposed plan is to substitute post-office cheques for postal orders. Thus it will not be necessary to go or send to the office if one wants to despatch money to any given place. One need only write two cheques and forward one of them to the destined recipient of money, despatching the other by mail to the post office where one has registered oneself as a client of the new system. These transactions will not be performed gratis. The post office will make pro-rata charges, but they will be considerably less than the present charges. Further, the client (kanyusha) must deposit a sum of 20 yen on which he will not receive any interest. The system is called yubin furikaye chokin.

Folks who arrived at Nagasaki by the S.S. Manchuria on the 9th instant, report a state of great disquiet in Irkutsk and Tsitsihar, where much fighting has taken place and wholesale slaughter has been perpetrated by the Cossacks. The killed in Irkutsk are said to have numbered some 1,500 and their bodies were thrown into Lake Baikal. These informants add that the insurgents in Irkutsk and Harbin have agreed to march to Tsitsihar on Russian New Year's day (13th January) and to unite forces there, a prospect which is causing much alarm to the garrison. The idea of men proceeding in mid-winter from Baikal to Tsitsihar strikes us as somewhat problematical.

There are vague rumours of a serious disturbance among the Russian prisoners at Marugame in Shikoku. The news reaches the Jiji Shimpō. Several casualties are said to have occurred, some fatal, but no details have yet been received.

We may mention here that the prisoners now remaining in Japan number 32,000. After the 11th instant those at Narashino will be reduced to 2,700, and these too will soon embark at Yokohama. It is said that the Russian Government expects to have taken complete delivery by the end of this month.

The Ikoma, first-class cruiser (13,700 tons), sister-ship to the Tsuba, is expected to be launched at the beginning of March. The principal engineer connected with the building of the two ships is Mr. Yamada.

Vladivostok is said to be still in a most unquiet condition. The rioters comprise convicts released from jail in Vladivostok and Siberia on occasions of recent emeutes and a number of Hunghtsz. They are said to be pillaging in broad daylight, and their victims are chiefly Chinese and Japanese merchants. The steamer Norma brings this news. She arrived at Moji on the 4th, and her people allege that the Russian authorities are treating the matter very coolly.

All accounts agree that order has not by any means been fully restored in Vladivostok. The situation still eludes the hands of the authorities and trade is virtually at a stand-still. It must be confessed, however, that this present unanimity of rumour is at variance with recent stories and possibly some exaggeration may now also be suspected. A telegram states that the soldiers sent from Russia to deal with the disaffected elements in Linevitch's Army have orders to disarm the latter or to destroy them.

General Nogi and his staff embarked on the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's S.S. Kamakura Maru on the 7th instant, en route for Japan. Among his staff were General Ijichi, who complied with his former chief's desire that he should accompany him on his return. The Kamakura Maru, under the command of Captain Swain, had carried General Stoessel and his staff from Port Arthur to Nagasaki, and was now so fortunate as to carry General Nogi. Moreover, Captain Swain had commanded the Toyohashi Maru in which General Nogi proceeded to the war. The General paid Captain Swain a high compliment. He noted that this well known and universally popular commander had served the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for 30 years, never encountering the slightest accident throughout that long period, and that such a record indicated extraordinary zeal and competence. The first luncheon on board the steamer seems to have been a very brilliant affair. Mr. Hayashii Tamio, representing the Yusen Kaisha, welcomed the distinguished guests in an eloquent speech.

Our readers remember that in the summer of 1905 a Chinese mob attacked the branch temple of Hongwan-ji at Anhui and virtually destroyed it. Since that time negotiations have been proceeding between the Japanese Consul at Amoy and the Taoist, with the result that the latter has finally agreed to pay compensation amounting to 300,000 yen out of the public funds for the restoration of the temple, and to give an engagement that such outrages shall not be repeated.

We observe that Doctor Baron Takagi, F.R.C.S., Inspector-General of Naval Hospitals, left Yokohama by a recent mail steamer for the United States where he has been invited to give lectures on Naval and Military Sanitation at the Colombia University by the Committee of the Cartwright Lectures. Dr. Takagi studied at St. Thomas' Hospital in London from 1875 to 1880, and his reputation stands very high in scientific circles. After concluding his course of lectures in America it is his intention, we understand, to proceed to Europe, and he will probably be in London in March. It is to be hoped that advantage will be taken of his presence in the English capital to utilize his abilities as a lecturer.

Admiral Baron Yamamoto, in addition to being accorded the status and treatment of a Minister of State, has been appointed a member of the Council of War (Ginji Sangi). It will be remembered that this Council of War takes the place of the Gensui-fu (Marshal's Office) which existed in the Palace prior to the War.

Vice-Admiral Ijuin (Goro) has been appointed chief of the Kansei Honbu in addition to his present post of Kaigun Gunrei-bu Ji cho. Admiral Togo is chief of the latter.

Mr. Ikeda Jusaburo, of the Communications Department, has been appointed chief of the Bureau of Posts and Telegraphs in the Korean Residency-General.

A new destroyer, the Oi-kaze, was launched at Maizuru on the 10th instant.

The crews of the Kashima and Katori, 20 officers and 600 blue-jackets, are to leave Japan for England by the Iyo Maru on the 23rd instant.

The Crown Prince of Siam and a number of Siamese notables are expected to visit Japan shortly.

FIRES.

On the evening of the 5th instant a fire broke out in the Japanese annex of His Imperial Highness Prince Kanin's residence in Nagatacho, Tokyo. The Prince and his family took refuge temporarily in the residence of Marquis Nabeshima, but they were able to return shortly afterwards to their own house, as the flames did not extend to the main building. This is the third fire that has occurred in Tokyo since New Year's day. On the night of the 3rd Viscount Matsudaira's Koishikawa residence was burned, and on the 4th a conflagration took place in Tsukishima.

On January 5th, fire broke out in Kawaramachi, Kyoto, destroying two buildings. Four persons were killed while struggling to carry away articles from the burning houses.

At 12.40 a.m. on Jan. 10th, fire broke out in the up-stair rooms of the Chinese restaurant Pakha-tin, No. 4, Nigiwai-cho, Ichome, facing Isezaki-cho, Yokohama. The flames spread to the adjoining street, Wakaba-cho, destroying five houses and damaging six. The police are investigating the cause. It is generally reported that the accident originated with a lamp.

Early on the morning of Jan. 9th, a fatal outbreak of fire occurred in Akasaka, Tokyo. It burned nine houses and damaged six. Two men were killed while struggling to save articles from the burning buildings.

Another fatal fire took place at about the same time in Yanagi-wara-machi, Kanda, Tokyo, destroying two houses. One man was killed.

A further report by the Harbour Police concerning the fire on the steamer Brigantia says that Mr. Asakura, a tide waiter of the Yokohama Customs, a sailor on the ship, and a sendo of the launch Kaiko Maru sustained severe injuries by the explosion of saltpetre. They were removed to the office of Dr. Watanabe, Noge-machi. The principal portion of the cargo, consisting of saltpetre, sugar, cement, paper boards, etc., was destroyed. The wooden fittings of the holds were all damaged.

Fire broke out about 12 o'clock on the night of Jan. 4th in the factory of a confectioner named Y. Nakuzawa, No. 8, Yamamoto-cho, Ichome, Bluff, Yokohama. The flames were put out before causing extensive loss. The factory was partially damaged.

A lamentable accident occurred on January 4th at the Innai coal mine, Akita prefecture. Fire broke out in the afternoon of that day by which a hundred and one of about two thousand coolies lost their lives.

The dead body of a coolie was found on Jan. 8th in the hold of the German steamer Brigantia which recently took fire in Yokohama harbor. As the deceased has not been identified the body was being handed over to the City Office for burial.

An outbreak of fire occurred on the evening of Jan. 4th in Tsukijima, Tokyo, destroying twenty houses.

Fire broke out at 5 a.m. on Jan. 10th in South Sakuma-cho, Shiba, Tokyo, destroying seventeen houses and damaging five. About 8 a.m. the same day, an outbreak of fire occurred in a turpentine and oil factory in Oshiage-machi, Honjo, burning down the building.

NEW MUSIC.

From Messrs. Chappell & Co., of New Bond-st., London, comes a welcome bundle of new music, which includes the following compositions:—"Remember Me" and "A Chain of Roses," by Hermann Löhr; "For Propriety's Sake," Guy d'Hardelet; "The Magic Month of May," Ernest Newton; "Look up, O, heart," Teresa del Riego; "Deep in my heart," Frank Lambert; "Ramona," a two-step by Lee Johnson, and "Love's last words," by Octave Crémieux. Space does not permit of a separate review of each song, we therefore single out those which have appealed to the reviewer on account of their melodic construction. "The Magic Month of May," is certainly a very graceful morceau, admirably suited for a light and flexible soprano voice. We trust that ere long this cheery song will find a place upon local programmes. To the same class belongs "For Propriety's sake." A guitar obbligato would greatly add to the enhancement of its piquant melodies. The songs by Löhr and Lambert are effective numbers of that large class denominated the melancolique. As for the two-step, we can heartily recommend it for its liveliness and capital composition.

THE FAMINE IN THE NORTH.

AN impression appears to prevail in some quarters that the Japanese authorities are discouraging any special appeal to the public in connexion with the needs of the famine-stricken people in the north, and that, under these circumstances, the opening of subscription lists by foreign newspapers is viewed with a certain measure of umbrage. Such a misconception can not be too strongly protested against. We have the best possible ground for protesting. In point of fact subscriptions had been invited by one of the leading Japanese journals, the Fiji Shimpō, long before any appeal was made through the columns of the foreign local press, and a collection is now being made by the Asahi Shimbun. The Japanese Government is only too willing that all possible assistance should be given in the form of private or public charity and will, it is understood, be only too grateful for such aid. One question only has been raised, namely, as to the propriety of an appeal to the Mansion House in London. The idea of making such an appeal was suggested, but on reference to the Tokyo Authorities these decided that the crisis scarcely justified such an extreme step at present, whatever might be necessary in the future. The attitude of the Central Government towards this problem is in a sense conservative. It seems to be felt that, as far as possible, the suffering people, who are not all of the most provident or the most industrious type, should be encouraged to help themselves by taking employment on works which by tending to their own future benefit and prosperity, would not only assist them to bear up against present calamity but also guarantee them, partly at any rate, against recurrences of such troubles. Hence it has been considered inexpedient to give great prominence at first to the certainty of charitable succour. But no one doubts the urgent need of such succour, or imagines that any system of public works can prove adequate to relieve the distress. It is an occasion, we are fully persuaded, which amply warrants large exercise of the benevolence never lacking in this community. If any one has been deterred by a sense of reluctance to offer aid which might be considered impertinent, that idea can not be too quickly dispelled. As to the fact that the missionaries have taken the lead in the matter, we can not suppose that any really humane person would allow himself to be influenced for a moment by such a question. Still, if there be any who scruple to avail themselves of the religious medium, they have the resource of subscribing direct to the funds of the Fiji Shimpō or the Asahi Shimbun. The missionaries, as we understand their purpose, do not seek to be either the direct or the indirect dispensers of the foreign community's charity. They have associated themselves publicly with the movement because the discharge of their professional duties brought them into contact with facts which would not otherwise have been known to foreigners, and which showed plainly that a terrible fate was hanging over the heads of many unfortunate men, women and children. There are many among us who desire no better medium for conveying their gifts than the medium of the missionaries, but there appear to be some also who would prefer to avail themselves of secular channels. Ways are open for both classes, and we need scarcely say that the avenue which brings the succour matters not at all provided that the succour is brought.

THE CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

NO Cabinet that has been in office since the Constitution went into force will have such a name in history as the Cabinet which has just gone out of power. It will be remembered, in the first place, as a Cabinet more long-lived than any of its predecessors. Coming into office as a mere stop-gap pending the re-construction of the Seiyū-kai, and standing aloof from all political parties, it achieved an existence of 4½ years, although the general forecast of its life did not exceed as many months. It will be remembered, in the second place, because, during the whole of that time it avoided any tangible mistake. And it will be remembered in the third place because it raised Japan from the rank of a third-class State to the position of a first-rate Power. The second of these propositions will, of course, be disputed by some publicists; by the men who denounce as extravagant and unsound the Ministry's method of financing the war and by the men who condemn the Portsmouth Treaty as a wholesale and pusillanimous sacrifice. There is no occasion to re-open these questions here. We confine ourselves to saying that if ever ends can justify means the Government's financial programme is a case in point; and that unless it be bad statesmanship to appreciate a necessity and bow to it, the statesmanship of the KATSURA Ministry in withdrawing its indemnity claim is beyond reproach. It might have been desirable that the Cabinet should remain in office until its budget had been approved by the Diet. By so doing it would have rounded off its record completely, and indeed at one time the indications were that such would be Count KATSURA's policy. But he evidently found that by remaining any longer in office he would have outlived his mandate.

Nothing is more remarkable than the perfect peace and quiet that have attended this transfer of the administrative reins. Hitherto every Cabinet change was accompanied by conferences between party politicians, by meetings of Elder Statesmen, by councils at the Palace, by compromises and conciliations, and by newspaper controversies. All such elements of commotion have been conspicuously absent on the present occasion. Count KATSURA and Marquis SAIONJI seem to have elaborated their schemes and given effect to them with imperturbable sang-froid and machine-like precision. The habitual calm of the one as a great military captain and the quiet courtesy of the other as a grand seigneur have doubtless been largely responsible for this result, which is an object-lesson worth studying.

Looking at the composition of the new Cabinet, we are struck by the fact that while its leader is a nobleman of the bluest blood, not one other member possesses a title. Already men are beginning to speak of it as a "Cabinet of Commoners." The SAIONJI family—which traces its lineage back to KAMATARI in far-remote centuries—is one of the nine Seigwa; that is to say, one of the nine houses privileged to supply Daijō-daijin (prime-ministers) under the old system, though not to supply Sesshō or Kwambaku. These nine houses are SANJO, SAIONJI, TOKUDAIJI, KWAZANIN, OI-NO-MIKADO, KUGA, KIKUTEI, HIROHATA and DAIGO; and the five Sekke, from which Sesshō or Kwambaku were taken, are KONOYE, KUJO, NIJO, ICHIGO and TAKATSUKASA. Marquis SAIONJI served on the staff of the Imperial Army in the Aizu campaign of 1867 and received a life-pension in recognition of his services. In 1870 he repaired to France for purposes of education and remained there ten years, acquiring an extended acquaintance with many subjects and a perfect knowledge of the French language. Returning in 1880, he at once stepped into public notice by starting a journal called the Tōyō Jiyū (Far-Eastern Liberty), which caused some sensation as an exponent of opinions too far in advance of the times. From that moment, however, the Marquis was recognised as a leader of thought and a politician with a distinguished future. He represented the French School of philosophy, while Prince KONOYE represented the German and Marquis KURODA the English. Always a profound admirer and close friend of Marquis ITO, Marquis SAIONJI took the portfolio of Education in the latter's 1894 Cabinet, and during his tenure of that office he twice discharged the duties of Foreign Minister ad interim. Again in 1898 he accepted the portfolio of Education under Marquis ITO as Premier, and on the latter's resignation he passed to the presidency of the Privy Council, which he subsequently left for the purpose of assuming the leadership of the Seiyū-kai.

Another striking feature of the new Cabinet is that though it includes three of the Seiyū-kai leaders—Marquis SAIONJI, Mr. MATSUDA MASAHIRO and Mr. HARA KEI—its remaining seven members are all without party affinities. Thus it can not be called "a party Cabinet" in any generally accepted sense of the term. It is rather a Cabinet which accepts the hegemony of a political party in exchange for the latter's parliamentary support. Indeed, one of the striking facts of the time is that the clamour for party government has largely died out in Japan. Even the Progressists, staunchest adherents of the system, admit that the time for its successful inauguration has not come, and are content to welcome the SAIONJI Cabinet as a small step in the desired direction.

Yet again it is to be remarked that no less than five of the new Ministers have served as Vice-Ministers; three—Rear-Admiral SAITO (Navy), Mr. SAKATANI (Finance) and Mr. YAMAGATA (Home)—under the KATSURA regime, and two—Mr. MATSUOKA Kōki (Home) and Mr. MAKINO SHINKEN (Education)—in previous Ministries.

Mr. MATSUDA MASAHISA was for many years a prominent lieutenant of Count ITAGAKI in the old Liberal Party. Throughout a long public career the voice of reproach has never once been raised against him. Twice previously he has held portfolios: that of Finance in the OKUMA-ITAGAKI Cabinet of 1898, and that of Education in the ITO Cabinet of 1900. His appointment to the Department of Justice is considered somewhat anomalous, legal or judicial studies not having hitherto occupied his attention, but it is well understood that he is tolerably certain to succeed in any position which he consents to occupy.

Mr. HARA KEI, formerly a most promising official of the Foreign Office, exchanged official life for a business career and immediately obtained a distinguished place as one of the managers of the great FURUKAWA mining enterprise. When the Seiyu-kai was organized, he entered its ranks and was chosen on the Standing Committee, whereafter he became Minister of Communications in the ITO Cabinet of 1900.

Of Mr. KATO TAKAOKI it is scarcely necessary to speak, his career being familiar to all interested in Japanese affairs. He represented Japan at the Court of St. James for many years with conspicuous success, and he held the portfolio of Foreign Affairs in the ITO Cabinet of 1900. No name stands higher among the statesmen of the younger generation. His warm personal friendship with Count OKUMA has created the impression that he belongs to the Progressists' ranks, but he is not a party man, and it is safe to say that he enjoys as full a measure of the respect and confidence of the Seiyu-kai as of the Kensei-hon-to.

Mr. SAKATANI had long occupied the post of Vice-Minister of Finance before his present receipt of the portfolio. For years back he has been known as the very head and front of Japanese finance. No man possesses a more intimate grasp of all the details of the subject nor has any mind been more fertile of sagacious expedients.

Rear-Admiral SAITO is one of those quiet, hard-working and thoroughly competent men who often escape notice and fame unless the opportunity for their distinction specially presents itself. If a record of his work during the war were accessible to the public, it would be found that in every branch of naval affairs his industry and sound judgment were invaluable, and that as a mere physical feat his unremitting attention to duty was quite striking. He succeeds a Minister of rare ability but it is felt that the Naval Department will not lose by the change.

Mr. YAMAGATA ISABURO is a near relative of Marquis YAMAGATA. His name has not hitherto been much before the public, but he is exceedingly popular, and much admired for business capacity in the Department (Home Affairs) where his chief service has been.

The new Minister of Education, Mr. MAKINO SHINKEN, is a son of the celebrated OKUBO. He was Vice-Minister of Education under Marquis SAIONJI in 1898, and until his present appointment to a portfolio he served as Japanese Representative in Vienna. We speak of him as a member of the new Cabinet, but in point of fact his name has not yet been gazetted. Marquis SAIONJI himself takes the portfolio of Education pro tem. But it is well understood that this latter measure is only pending Mr. MAKINO's return.

Mr. MATSUOKA Kōki has long been a distinguished jurist. He once served as Vice-Minister of the Home Office. Prior to receiving Ministerial rank he held the position of Chief of the Legislative Bureau in the Cabinet. It was expected that the Department of Justice would be placed under his control, but he goes to the Department of Agriculture and Commerce.

There is no change at the War Office: General TERAUCHI has consented to remain there, an arrangement which seems to give universal satisfaction, as well it might.

It is observable that Choshu and Satsuma are represented by two names, the former by General TERAUCHI, the latter by Mr. MAKINO. Party politicians can at least say that the "Clan System" has disappeared entirely.

In the matter of parliamentary support, Marquis SAIONJI has 141 Seiyu-kai votes, and the probability is that the Daido Club (84) will go into the same lobby with him, thus enabling the Ministry to reckon on a solid working majority—225 in a House of 379. But it must be recognised that unless the Progressists (96) vote with the Seiyu-kai, which is not probable, the balance of power is in the hands of the Daido Club.

THE CHINESE.

IN an article commenting on the Shanghai affair the North-China Herald recently declared that the Chinese Authorities have no competence to move so much as a solitary soldier within the limits of the settlement unless the previous permission of the foreign municipality has been obtained. Very likely they have not, but fancy what must be the feelings of any patriotic Chinese subject when he reads such a declaration. It amounts to an explicit statement that China no longer possesses any sovereign rights whatever over the foreign settlement. The fact is not new: it has been repeatedly asserted in the past and has never, so far as we know, been practically contradicted. Indeed when Vicoroy LI passed through the settlement some years ago, he had to obtain the sanction of the foreign municipality before commanding the attendance of his body-guard, and the circumstance was alluded to by the foreign local press in terms the reverse of tactful. But though the fact itself is not new, there is reason to think that its significance has newly dawned upon the Chinese, who, educated by the electric telegraph and the newspaper, are beginning to develop a faculty of perception very different from their old indifference. It can scarcely fail to occur to them that when they are simultaneously held responsible for the safety of a foreign settlement into which their right to march troops is denied, an evidently unjust position is created; and it must also occur to them that if foreign settlements tend to become imperia in imperio of the Shanghai type, then the fewer of such settlements China permits to be established, the better for her dignity and peace. Underlying the recent riots, proximately provoked by the Mixed-Court question, there could be discerned a feeling of general umbrage against foreign settlements in their modern character, and who can wonder that such should be the case? China's present mood seems to be one of straining after results and dispensing with processes. It is stated that the EMPRESS-DOWAGER, when granting audience to Baron KOMURA on the occasion of his recent embassy to Peking, made a frank declaration of conviction that Japan owes to her modern reforms the high place she has won among the nations; whereupon Baron KOMURA, with the quickness of intellect which usually distinguishes him, replied that the EMPEROR of Japan had never failed to take the lead in encouraging and promoting reform. HER MAJESTY'S conviction is wholesome and welcome, but we can not feel at all confident that its full significance is appreciated by the Imperial lady or by the officials nearest to the Throne. They seem to have conceived the idea of manufacturing a Constitution, not because they appreciate the advantages of constitutional government, but because they observe constitutions to be among the paraphernalia of great Western Powers and of the new great Power, Japan. Apparently, too, they have just awaked to the fact that Japan has recovered her judicial autonomy, and they are beginning to ask why China should not re-assert her sovereignty in the same direction. But they have not conceived clearly, if at all, what efforts are required as preliminary to that end, nor have they discovered that Japan's success was prefaced by thirty years of unremitting preparation. Thus the position is that they begin to grasp at results without recognising causes, and meanwhile, as the Nichi Nichi Shimbun said in a recent article, they are brought into daily contact with factors which render foreign intercourse more and more unsightly and intolerable in proportion as their eyes are opened to its anomalies. A book published five years ago said of China's then condition:—"It is a situation full of perplexity and menace. China's awakening, it indeed she be yet fully awake, seems to have come too late. The umbrage of her own people and the impatience of foreign Powers will not leave her time to complete reforms without which the origin of the former can not be removed or the cause of the latter corrected." Since this was written, Japan, by an extraordinary exercise of force, has put back the hands on the dial of foreign aggression, and England has joined her with the same object. China therefore might count on time for reform were she earnestly bent on reforming. But she seems inclined to kick off her shackles instead of waiting to get them quietly unlocked, and the former violent process can not be suffered even by the allies who have combined to secure her integrity.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

THE foreign trade of Japan during 1905 reached the unprecedented total of 809,859,000 yen, so far as is now known. The figure may be taken as a very close approximation although only 9 ports are included for the closing month of the year. The details are:—

	1905. Yen.	1904. Yen.
Imports .....	488,265,000	371,290,538
Exports .....	321,594,000	319,260,895
Totals.....	809,859,000	690,551,433

Ten years ago (1896) the trade bulked 289,517,234 yen, so that it has very nearly trebled in a decade. It is interesting to note the decennial development since 1869:

	Yen.
Total trade in 1869 .....	33,672,611
do 1878 .....	58,862,974
do 1887 .....	96,711,932
do 1905 .....	809,859,000

The growth during the past 20 years has been very remarkable. Old residents doubtless remember that in the late seventies and early eighties, when the treaty-revision controversy was waxing vehement, one of the arguments advanced by the opponents of revision was that Japan had proved a commercial bubble and that nothing substantial could be gained by cultivating her friendship. This contention was based on the fact that the total foreign trade did not represent an average of 2 yen per unit of the population, and that no prospect of substantial increase could be looked for in any era however remote. The average in 1905 was nearly 18 yen.

A striking feature of the trade is the excess of imports. The balance against Japan—to use the popular and misleading phraseology—was no less than 166,671,000 yen. In 1893 the excess of imports amounted to nearly 112 millions, the largest figure in any year previous to 1905. If we collect the returns for the past 10 years, in every one of which the imports have exceeded the exports, we obtain the following results:—

	Yen.
1896.....	53,831,713
1897.....	56,165,694
1898.....	111,748,403
1899.....	5,472,031
1900.....	82,831,851
1901.....	3,467,101
1902.....	13,428,193
1903.....	27,633,075
1904.....	52,029,642
1905.....	166,671,000
Total.....	573,278,703

It is a remarkable fact that in the space of ten years this country has received from abroad 573¼ million yen worth of goods more than she sold.

The movements of specie in 1905 were these:—

	Yen.	Yen.
Export.... { Gold .....	14,708,000	16,343,000
{ Silver .....	1,635,000
Imports . { Gold .....	20,167,000	31,362,000
{ Silver .....	11,195,000

Excess of Imports ..... 15,019,000

The movements of specie during the decade ended 1905 were:—

	Excess of Exports. Yen.	Excess of Imports. Yen.
1896 .....		27,543,325
1897 .....		62,247,549
1898 .....	44,423,699
1899 .....		8,985,153
1900 .....	45,189,228
1901 .....	3,088,350
1902 .....		30,132,377
1903 .....		8,806,271
1904 .....	73,849,203
1905 .....		15,019,000
Totals .....	166,550,480	152,733,675
Excess of Exports .....	13,816,805

From these returns it would seem that Japan has bought 573¼ million yen worth of goods by paying only some 14 million yen, in cash, the balance in her favour thus being 560 millions approximately. But of course it has to be remembered that in many cases large sums of specie which came into the Government's hands abroad were brought to Japan and went to redress the balance of trade. The actual movements of specie during the ten-year period were:—

	Yen.
Exports of Specie .....	328,565,972
Imports " .....	314,749,167
Excess of Exports .....	13,816,805

It is possible, though extremely improbable, that the whole of the specie imported was brought in through official agency. Without some definite information on that subject, it is out of the question to determine how much hard money actually flowed away from the country's normal store in connexion with foreign trade. The fact has to be here noted that goods purchased abroad on direct account of the Government do not appear in the custom's returns.

Although the bulk of the trade for 1905 shows such a large development compared with 1904, the growth will not be regarded by Japanese economists as particularly healthy, since only 2½ millions of increment stand to the credit of exports, whereas nearly 117 millions appear in the imports' column. In 1896 there was an actual diminution of exports as compared with 1895, a diminution of 18¼ millions. But during the past decade the increase has been persistent and no year except 1898 made such a poor showing as 1905. There are two obvious explanations of the nation's apparently slow growth of producing capacity in 1905, namely, the absence of nearly a million of able-bodied men at the front, and the fact that large quantities of commodities manufactured in Japan were shipped in Government transports for the seat of war and thus do not figure at all in the customs returns. The latter is true of woollen and cotton fabrics, of boots, shoes and harness, of waggons, carts and entrenching tools, of provisions, of fodder and of munitions of war. Indeed when it is remembered that in addition to meeting the demands of foreign markets, the Japanese people, though materially reduced in number, furnished supplies of all kinds for an immense army and navy and a big fleet of transports, it is evident that the nation must have worked with unflagging industry. On the other hand, while paying 160 million yen in the shape of extra taxes, the people made unprecedentedly large purchases of foreign goods. Thus, on the whole, the record of 1905 indicates a very vigorous nation.

BARON SUYEMATSU AND THE MISSIONARIES.

WE have received more than one communication on the subject of the letter addressed by Baron SUYEMATSU to The Times with reference to missionaries in Japan in general and Bishop AWDREY's letter in particular. Our correspondents challenge us to express an opinion and we are bound to say that we can not altogether sympathise with the stand-point of Baron SUYEMATSU or think that his letter to The Times was well judged in the interests of his countrymen. The instances he alleges in support of his charge of tactlessness against some of the missionaries are hardly worthy of serious mention and certainly can not be regarded as in any sense out-balancing the great good the missionaries do and the zealous devotion they show. As one of our correspondents justly says:—

"Baron SUYEMATSU may know how loyally the whole body of Protestant missionaries stood by Japan in the late conflict. I believe there was not a traitor in their ranks. They vied with the Japanese in all kinds of service possible for them to render at such a time. Their devotion was extraordinary. Their united influence upon America and England counted materially for Japan's cause, and this is well understood by the Japanese Authorities. Letters have been received from Governors and Mayors in all districts from Sapporo to Kagoshima thanking the missionaries for gifts to soldiers' families and for services to the country. It is true, as you remark, that missionaries are much more conciliatory than in former days and I am confident that they seek to conform strictly with the laws and customs of the country. Their relations with the people are personal, confidential and sympathetic. Indeed in this respect they associate with the Japanese as intimately as they do with Americans or Englishmen."

Another correspondent says:—

"To me it seems that Baron SUYEMATSU has not exercised his usual perspicacity in this matter. We all can understand that in proportion as the Japanese have faith in their own ancestral creeds and are content with the morality produced by faith in them, they must be disposed to resent the labours of foreign missionaries whose very presence in the country constitutes a tacit assertion of religious superiority. But the Japanese, I take it, are far too astute not to recognise that since the Christian apostles received their proselytizing mandate from the revered founder of their faith, the duty of propagandism is imperative in their eyes, and if they come to Japan to preach the gospel, it is not because they are imbued with a Sadducean belief in their own superiority to other men, but because they have received, as they think, a rich gift which they are bound to share with their fellow-men. Could an account be cast of the assistance they have rendered to this country in its wonderful path of modern progress, their work would receive recognition even from the most inimical. But they ask for no such recognition. They are well content to know that they have not laboured in vain, and one strong cause for satisfaction is the assurance that the friendships and mutual sympathies which have grown up between them and the people of the land have helped materially to break down the barriers of East and West. Even in the affair which forms the chief text of Baron SUYEMATSU's remarks, last September's riots, the missionaries themselves did everything in their power to correct false impressions which could not fail to be formed to the prejudice of the Japanese nation."

Yet another correspondent writes:—

"I am not a missionary, but I have talked with many of the cloth about the letters which appeared in The Times over the signatures of Bishop AWDRY and Baron SUYEMATSU, and my strong impression is that as between the two communications Bishop AWDRY's is the more regretted. Every one feels that the Bishop wrote in obedience to a high sense of duty and a sincere desire to bring the truth home to Japanese and English readers alike. But the question is, what will be the net result of his letter, good or evil? May not the same be said of Baron SUYEMATSU's rejoinder also? The Baron's indictment of the missionaries is slender and unsubstantial. Some of its counts are almost frivolous. Yet it is a protest, and a protest coming from a man so distinguished can not fail to influence the public mind. An idea has thus been conveyed that no light task devolves on the Japanese Authorities in preserving peace and good order between the missionaries and the people among whom they labour. I repeat that I am not a missionary myself, and since I have heard very little complaint from the missionaries, I will not attempt to defend them though the task would, I think, be very easy. Neither am I a Japanese, but if I were I would resent the implication suggested by the Baron's writing that my countrymen required careful watching and cautious legislation to keep them on good terms with Europeans and Americans who come here with the most benevolent purposes and without any selfish aims whatever. From what I know of the Japanese and from what I know of the missionaries, I can unhesitatingly allege that both might safely be left wholly to themselves without the slightest fear of any development of mutual hostility or ill-will. Is not that your opinion also? To me it seems that the absolute immunity enjoyed by every class and every race of foreigners in this country is one of the jewels in Japan's crown of civilization, and I do not like to see its lustre dimmed by constructive suggestions that this kindly and tolerant mood is in any sense the result of official manipulation. I wish Bishop AWDRY had kept out of newspaper columns, but I have met Japanese who admire the courage of his speech more than they resent its bitterness. But as a genuine friend of Japan, which I claim to be, I wish much more earnestly that Baron SUYEMATSU had held his hand."

It appears to us that there is little to traverse in these utterances. There have been indiscretions on the part of the missionaries, but they are things of very ancient date, due wholly to the low estimate existing among foreigners universally twenty-five or thirty years ago as to the moral condition of every Oriental people. Something of that estimate lingers still in a few minds, no doubt, but concerning the missionaries as a whole it may be truly said that their appreciation of the Japanese is conspicuously high, and that Japan could not possibly have more sympathetic or favourable exponents of her character. If Baron SUYEMATSU had exercised the logical acumen and the spirit of justice which generally distinguish his writings, he would certainly have dwelt upon this phase of missionary labour, and would have noted that the missionaries are not only a valuable educational instrument but also the truest and best-disposed interpreters the country can have.

CHRISTMAS IN JAPAN: IN AND AROUND SENDAI.

(COMMUNICATED.)

In speaking of Christmas in Japan it must be remembered that the large majority of Japanese are not Christians and therefore know nothing about this beautiful season in the year which we all like so well to celebrate, and which is so universally celebrated throughout America. No festival in the entire church year is so universally celebrated by Christians in Japan as Christmas. The season comes at the end of the year, just after the schools, both public and private, have passed through their mid-year examinations. As this time is naturally a vacation for most people, it affords a splendid opportunity to the students to help in celebrating Christmas. Japan has many students and among this class are to be found some of the most earnest and best Christians and in them lies the hope of future Japan.

This year all the different churches held services. In connection with our work here the writer attended eight different services, beginning on December 20th at the old dormitory of the Theological Department of North Japan College. Here we met with young men who are to be pastors of some church; they are older in the faith and rendered a fine programme. This service was attended only on invitation, the building being too small to accommodate all who wished to attend it.

On December 21, there was a unique little Christmas service by the Kindergarten Department of the Second Street Orphan's Home. It was quite plain and simple but the little children seemed very happy as they took part in their little recitations, dialogues and motion songs. After the programme their hearts were made to beat fast when they received a small bag of cakes valued at one cent and a beautiful Christmas card which came from America. Some received a special prize for attending regularly.

The service on December 22nd was held at a small preaching place in the northern part of Sendai, called: "Kitakajimachi Kogisho." This is in the heart of the poor district and the boys and girls who attend the Sunday School services come from homes where the parents are hardened with the old doctrines and observances. The very house in which the service was held was the home of a famous Buddhist priest. But our student evangelist, Mr. Akaboshi, is doing splendid work here and had trained the scholars of his Sabbath School to render a very pleasant programme. A fine Christmas tree was the delight of these poor children and when they each received a bag of cakes and a fine American picture card they went to their homes with merry hearts.

Saturday evening, December 23rd, will long linger in the memories of the people at Aramachi Chapel, southern part of Sendai, as they held their first Christmas service in the new chapel completed a few weeks ago. Although the seating capacity of the chapel is about 200, there were 350 present by actual count, and a fine programme was well rendered. This chapel is the only place of Christian work in a community of over ten thousand inhabitants. Truly a large field.

December 24th was the great day at the big Nibancho Church, the writer being superintendent of this Sabbath School, which bears the distinction of being the largest in the Church of Christ in Japan with an enrollment of 380 scholars, and 24 trained teachers. The decorations throughout the church were exquisite and the Christmas tree very beautiful. A programme with 32 numbers, consisting of recitations, songs, dialogues, essays, motion songs, etc., lasted 2 hours. Then the distribution of gifts and congratulatory addresses lasted another hour. Attendance here over 800, church too small to hold all who came to hear and see; 12 Russian officers attended this service and seemed very much impressed. Here American picture cards were distributed and a collection was taken for the relief of the famine sufferers.

On Christmas evening the Miyagi Jo Gakko celebrated their Christmas. A fine programme with many songs, dialogues and a drama entitled "For Another's Sake" was well rendered. Here we saw the most beautiful decorations in Sendai—two fine trees elegantly trimmed, and when lighted it was a grand and pleasant sight to see. Much praise is due this flourishing girls' school who not only celebrated a Christmas at their own school, but went to one of the largest hospitals in the city the next day and gave the sick and wounded soldiers cheer and comfort. After they rendered a programme to the hospital inmates they distributed oranges, cakes and cards.

On December 26th the students in the Industrial Home of North Japan College held their Christmas exercises. It was a splendid service with many good talks, fine quartette singing, and the evening was brought to a close by having prizes and jokes. It was a pleasant evening for all and eclipsed previous services.

By special invitation I went to Kakuda on December 27th. This is a town about 40 miles from Sendai with a population of 8,000. Students met me at the one-horse street-car line, hustled me to the hotel, made me eat a hasty supper, and then escorted me to the service in the church there, which formerly was a temple. This service began at 6 p.m. and lasted until 11.30. The programme was a tedious one of songs, recitations, addresses, and gramophone selections.

STORM.

A strong southerly gale prevailed on Wednesday night and Thursday morning in the Gulf of Tokyo and its vicinity. Heavy rain fell at intervals and toward morning the wind was blowing a whole gale with frequent gusts of alarming force. On the Bluff a number of superannuated fences disclosed their weakness by being blown down, but so far as can be learned the damage on land is not serious.

TO A MADONNA OF MURILLO.

Oh sweet saint Mary, with thy tired eyes
And mother-anguish in thy sacred face,
Unmindful art thou of thy Babe's embrace.
Is it that thou canst see His cross arise
With yearning arms against Golgotha's skies,
And all the bitterness, the pain, the tears
To be His lot throughout forthcoming years,
And thou would'st stay His grand self-sacrifice?

Oh Mother Mary, thine is more than pain
Of earthly mothers; for that small Form pressed
In childish helplessness against thy breast,
Is God's own Son—not thine—though born of thee.
Yet though thou suffer thy Gethsemane,
No man shall say that thou hast borne in vain.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Toll of the Bush, by WILLIAM SATCHELL.
London, Macmillan & Co., Yokohama, Kelly
& Walsh, Ltd

THIS novel, which appears in the familiar buff-coloured covers of Macmillan's Colonial Library, should win a large circle of readers by reason of its vigorous, unconventional style and quaint charm of setting. Mr. Satchell has laid the scenes of his story amid the unfamiliar surroundings of New Zealand and he introduces us to men and women of a type rather better visualized than in the ordinary run of novels. Perhaps their surroundings may be held accountable for much that is fresh and attractive in some of the principal personages; perhaps more is due to the rare craftsmanship of a skillful pourtrayer of character. Certainly the author deals in a very refreshing manner with the elemental passions which have swayed poor humanity since the world was first sent swinging down the ringing grooves of change; but there is love and love, jealousy and jealousy, hate and hate, revenge and revenge—and while some writers can make them read real and true, in the hands of others they are the veriest buckram and rubbish at that. Mr. Satchell has the better way. As we said just now, the action of "The Toll of the Bush" lies in a little corner of the New Zealand bush where the settlers are still waging war against the primeval forces of Nature, and the author, having obtained his information at first hand, uses his "local colour" with considerable effect. Geoffrey Hershaw, a young Englishman possessing many lovable qualities but cursed with an irresolute will, is the hero. His indecision of character has so far spoiled all his attempts at taking up a career and the possibilities are that it will submerge him in the end. For his antithesis we have a Church of England clergyman of revivalistic tendencies, the Rev. T. Fletcher, whose powers of will are adamant in their texture and mercilessness. These young men are rivals for the hand of Eve Milward, the beautiful younger daughter of a pioneer settler of great wealth and local consideration. Through some means or other Fletcher becomes possessed of certain information regarding Hershaw's life in England which gives him the whip-hand and he uses the advantage most unscrupulously. Mr. Satchell, though one of the Moderns, is sufficiently loyal to the ancient tradition of his craft to make the wrong-doer eventually pay the penalty, but we leave it to our readers to turn to the book themselves to find out the means by which the end is attained. In the unfolding of the story we have pictures of New Zealand country life and manners in the opening days of the 20th century which give delightful glimpses of the open-handed Colonial hospitality which still prevails so extensively among the well-to-do; the free and easy outlook on life which distinguishes the younger men and women; of the broad minded charity which forgives and condones a multitude of failings and shortcomings; of the petty rancours and asperities which destroy the idyllic charm of the Bush for many of its indwellers. The closing chapters of the novel are perhaps the best. Mr. Satchell gradually throws aside the restraint which held him in at the outset and "letting himself go" describes most graphically the development of a mania in one poor human derelict which leads up the grand catastrophe of the book—a bush fire and the wandering into the wilderness and rescue therefrom of Eve Milward and Geoffrey Hershaw. We look forward to Mr. Satchell's next work with considerable interest.

Lone Marie, by W.E. NORRIS, London, Macmillan and Co., Yokohama, Kelly and Walsh, Ltd.

MR. NORRIS long since won his spurs in the field of light literature. He is the possessor of a very delicate literary fancy and no matter how thin the story may be which he has to tell he nevertheless drapes it in a mantle of most becoming form and texture. Lone Marie is a young American lady who has spent most of her time amid the diplomatic circles of Europe and when the story opens we find her acting the part of guardian angel to an American heiress, who, with her mother, is spending some time in London. All three ladies are possessed of much charm of manner and one is rather sorry that the men—with the exception of Mr. Theodore White, of St. Paul—are such poor representatives of the breed. Lord Westenhanger is a very colourless specimen of the English aristocracy; though he fulfils the purpose for which he was intended by his creator; but Mr. Gordon Heneage is about the biggest "boulder" we have encountered in fiction for a long time past. It seems altogether incomprehensible that a person with such fine tastes and distinguished qualities as Lone Marie is said to have possessed could ever have associated with such a blackguard. But then if she had not done so, there would have been no story to write concerning her and her little ways and we should have lost several hours of good entertainment.

The Last Chance, by ROLF BOLDREWOOD; London, Messrs. Macmillan & Co. Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

IT cannot be truthfully averred that the Australian writer whose nom de plume of Rolf Boldrewood appears on more than a dozen novels, improves with the passing years. His hand has either lost its cunning or else by sticking too closely to the groove he first cut for himself he has effectually destroyed all sense of novelty and freshness. "The Last Chance" bears no comparison with "Robbery under Arms." Badly balanced, unequal, and without method, it resembles a lazy river creeping wearily through monotonous flats. Here and there it draws into its uninteresting current incidents such as the opening of the Kalgoorlie Water-works, the rescue of a suspected leper from Molokai, an armed attack upon a miner's camp, incidents in a fever hospital, the Oxford & Cambridge boatrace; the Grand National; the Australian bank smash; the Boer War; the behaviour of Colonials in England; Mayoral and Ducal post-prandial orations; whole cantos from Wordsworth, Scott, and other poets, the Russo-Japanese War—all and sundry being pitchforked in to bulk up sufficient matter to make a book. Rolf Boldrewood must mend his ways if he wished to keep his readers.

Bulletin of the University of Wisconsin.

TWO numbers of the "Bulletin of the University of Wisconsin" are to hand. One deals with "English Common Law in the Early American Colonies," and is a well-reasoned piece of writing. Parenthetically we may state that it was a thesis submitted for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin by Paul Samuel Reinsch, Assistant Professor of Political Science. The second bulletin prints a lecture by Mr. Henry Charles Taylor, Ph. D., Instructor in Political Economics, in the University of Wisconsin, upon "The Decline of landowning Farmers in England." He traces the beginning of the evil to the time when the yeomen began to be replaced by "gentlemen farmers" during the great depression which extended from 1820 to 1836. He sees little hope of the old order being restored, for English farmers of the present day do not buy the land which they cultivate. It therefore follows that the English farmlands are being acquired by the wealthy manufacturing and mercantile classes with the object of forming estates from which they can derive territorial and social distinction.

New Zealand Year Book, 1905.

THE New Zealand Official year book for 1905 is a very useful volume giving as it does a vast variety of information in a most compendious form. Special articles dealing with the land system of New Zealand, Old Age Pensions, Notes on the Hot Spring districts, and the colour sense of the Maori lend additional interest to the volume.

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM."

The second performance by pupils of the Bluff High School of selections from Shakespeare's fairy play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" drew a crowded audience to the Van Schaick Hall on Saturday afternoon. As our readers are aware the proceeds are to be devoted to the Sendai Famine Fund and we are glad that the young ladies secured such a warm and hearty response to their charitable appeal. Preceding the play came a short miscellaneous programme, the outstanding item in which was the Irish Famine Song, sung most sympathetically by Dr. Bomford Emerson—an appropriate selection in very sooth.

Pianoforte Solo... "Charakterstück" .....Lichner.
Miss Blundell.
Song..... "Over Here" .....Wood.
Dr. Bomford-Emerson.
Recitation..... "His Sixth Birthday".....Billings.
Master Freddie Wolf.
Violin Solo..... "Serenade" .....Pierne.
Mr. C. H. Thorn.
Recitation... "The Naughty Little Girl" .....Peck.
Miss May Neville.
Song..... "Ora pro Nobis." .....Piccolomini.
Mr. K. Dodds.

Miss May Neville received a pretty basket of flowers after her well-spoken recitation.

The play was even more prettily staged than on the first occasion, the wood near Athens in particular being a veritable fairy glen with coloured lights twinkling among the boskage and electric glow-lights besprinkling the over-arching bamboos. Again the Lysander of Miss Dorothy Austen, the Helena of Miss Georgie Tresize, the Theseus of Miss Emily Fox, the Oberon of Miss Daisy Neville, the Titania of Miss D. Hearne and the Puck of Miss M. Emerson stood out above their fellows. Action was admirably fitted to word in every instance, and the play became a real thing of life and beauty, whether fairy or mortal held the stage. A statelier Lysander could not be desired; or a more wistful, pleading, loveable Helena, with her flashes of roguishness; while the kingly dignity of Oberon was a joy to see. The tricky little Puck was a veritable sprite fit to gambol on a dolphin's back or slide down the silvery pathway of the moon-beams. The incidental dances and songs of the fairies were very daintily given, though we should have liked to have had Oberon's beautiful "I know a bank," sung instead of recited. But it would be ungracious to criticise such a really clever performance as Saturday's and we conclude with hearty thanks to the Misses Kilby for affording Yokohama two perfectly delightful afternoons.

THE VISIT OF PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

A meeting of British residents, called by the St. George's and St. Andrew's Societies, the British Navy League, and The China Association "to consider what steps shall be taken to welcome H. R. H. Prince Arthur of Connaught" was held on Wednesday at 5 p.m. in the Masonic Hall, No. 78. There were about 40 present.

Mr. JAMES WALTER, President of St. George's Society, said Mr. J. Carey Hall, H. B. M. Consul-General, had been to Tokyo and had seen the Ambassador, Sir Claude MacDonald, in regard to the reception of Prince Arthur. Mr. Hall therefore could probably give them a good deal of information as to the arrival of His Royal Highness in Japan and the duration of his stay in this country. He moved that Mr. Hall should preside at this meeting. This was carried by acclamation and Mr. Hall took the chair.

Mr. HALL, having acknowledged the honour the meeting had done him in voting him to the chair, said Mr. Walter drew his attention yesterday to the fact that there was a desire on the part of the British community to show respect to their Prince, who was due to arrive here next month. They had an exchange of ideas as to the proper thing to do in the circumstances and they agreed that the first step to take would be to consult the Ambassador. He (the speaker) accordingly waited on Sir Claude by arrangement that morning and ascertained his views on the matter. Mr. Hall believed the programme of the Prince's movements was tolerably well-known. He was due to arrive here on a man-of-war on Feb. 19th and was to leave on or about Mar. 16th in the C.P.R. steamer. During the first 8 or 10 days of his Royal Highness' stay in Japan he would be the guest of the Japanese nation, of His Majesty the Emperor, and some time during that period the ceremony of Investiture which constitutes the chief aim of the Prince's mission would take place. After that this Royal Highness would be free to spend his time as would be most agreeable to him, and Mr. Hall believed that as in February and March the coldest time of the year was experienced the Prince, accompanied by the Ambassador, would see as much of the southern and warmer parts of Japan as was possible during the remainder of His Royal Highness' stay. He expressed, and he thought they would approve of his doing so, the opinion of the British community of Yokohama that they would be desirous of testifying their respect to a Prince of the Blood Royal arriving on a mission of such importance as to invest the Emperor of Japan with the Order of the Garter, and he asked Sir Claude as to the proper means of testifying their respect and interest on the occasion. Sir Claude considered that the proper thing would be for the British community to assemble en masse, or as many of its members as possible, to welcome His Royal Highness on his arrival and perhaps read a short address of welcome—(Hear, hear and Applause). Perhaps the whole ceremony to pass off in less than half an hour. That was about all that would be expected of them, and that much at least he (the speaker) hoped they would all be willing to do. If the desire of the community should be for any further display of hospitality it would necessarily take place, not during the first 10 days of the Prince's stay but rather towards the time of his departure, and it would be a question for future consideration. The facts he had detailed were the result of his interview with the Ambassador with regard to the desire of the community to do something on the occasion.

Mr. WALTER said they were all very much obliged to the Chairman for his trouble and pains in going to Tokyo and seeing the Ambassador with regard to the method of receiving the Prince. He thought they were probably all agreed that it would do very well to assemble at the Pier on the arrival of His Royal Highness—all British subjects, including wives and children—to receive the Prince en masse as suggested by the Ambassador and he therefore moved that notice be given to all British subjects when the arrival of the vessel was known so that they could assemble, men, women and children, at the Hatoba and present a short address to His Royal Highness Prince Arthur, (Applause).

Mr. A. G. MOREY WEALE seconded.

Mr. WALTER before the motion was put to the meeting suggested that as there would doubtless be a large number of their allies, the Japanese, present to receive the Prince, Mr. Hall might kindly have an arrangement with the Governor so as to have a portion of the Pier set apart for the British community.

The CHAIRMAN said he was glad to have an opportunity of supplying an omission in the remarks he had made. The same thought occurred to him in his discussion of the subject with the Ambassador, who at once re-assured him on the point. Naturally there would be a large crowd, and if no arrangements were made for the recognition of the British community they might have to apprehend being crushed and shouldered in the crowd. But Sir Claude assured him that all the arrangements were to be settled by the Household Department and him in concert and that if the British community wished to meet His Royal Highness in this way the Japanese Authorities would ensure that they would have a suitable place on the occasion. (Applause).

The motion was adopted unanimously.

Mr. P. S. BENT raised the question of securing that the address would be acceptable to the Prince.

The CHAIRMAN suggested that a small committee be appointed to look after the matter of the address, in the case of which, of course, brevity would be the soul of eloquence. It would be cold weather—indeed if the weather should prove inclement, he thought it would be in order for the address to be read in the old court-room at the British Consulate, which could be prepared for the occasion. He suggested a small committee—say 5 or 7. The movement was spontaneous, coming from the community itself, and the nomination of their committee rested entirely with the meeting.

Mr. WALTER suggested 7.

Mr. V. A. CAESAR HAWKINS thought they should make it a dozen.

Mr. MOREY WEALE suggested 7 with power to add.

Mr. WALTER, referring to the bodies by which the meeting had been called said they might take their chiefs with Mr. Hall as Chairman.

The Committee was then elected as follows:—Messrs. Jas. Walter (St. George's Society), V. A. Caesar Hawkins (Navy League), Dr. Wheeler (Ireland), E. C. Davis, A. G. Morey Weale (China Association), A. McLean (Canada), President or Vice-President of St. Andrew's Society; J. T. Hamilton (Australia),—Bhesania, (India), Rev. W. P. Field and Mr. F. J. Lias (Wales).

It was proposed that Mr. HALL should act but he declined, remarking that the Committee had better be non-official. He said, however, he would give the Committee every assistance in his power.

Mr. WALTER said there was another matter as to which there were two suggestions. They had learned that Prince Arthur would be here for a short time only so that there would be no possibility of their doing anything else—except on his leaving for home. It would be for them to consider whether they should not entertain His Royal Highness at a dinner. There were two ways of doing that. One was by a dinner at one of the hotels, but the most that they could accommodate at the Oriental Palace would be 200. Another would be to entertain him at either a lunch or a dinner in the Public Hall, where it would be possible to provide seats for 400 people. It might be remembered that on the day fixed for the Coronation there were plates laid for 400 in the Public Hall, but unfortunately owing to the illness of the King the whole affair fell through. At the Public Hall also they could have ladies present. It was understood that the Prince was leaving by the Empress so that a luncheon might be arranged, which would be very appropriate because it would be a farewell to His Royal Highness, and Mr. Walter was sure permission could be obtained from the agent of the C.P.R. to have the steamer postponed for an hour or two on such an occasion. Unfortunately in the month of March an outdoor entertainment would be impossible.

Mr. C. A. FRASER asked what was the number of the British residents in Yokohama.

The CHAIRMAN said for the last 6 years, he was sorry to state, British subjects had not been under any necessity or duty to register themselves at the Consulate. The duty of numbering the peoples, a very important function in ancient times, was now performed not by the Consulates but by the Japanese authorities. The number of British subjects here used to be well over a thousand and he should say it was well over a thousand now. But the number able and willing to co-operate in an affair of this kind would not be likely to exceed the figure mentioned by Mr. Walter, 400, at the very outside. Perhaps it would be premature to come to any decision on the subject brought forward by Mr. Walter; and the Committee should find out whether such an entertainment would be agreeable to the Prince on the occasion of his departure and take measures accordingly. The Committee, then, would know that besides the drawing up of the address they had the duty of ascertaining whether any further expression of hospitality and respect would be welcome to His Royal Highness.

Mr. CAESAR HAWKINS seconded and the proposal was adopted unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN, having summed up the decisions arrived at by the meeting, begged to tender his best thanks for the prompt and punctual attendance on this occasion.

On the call of Mr. WALTER a vote of thanks to Mr. Hall for presiding was passed by acclamation. The meeting then dispersed.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

The fortnightly meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society, held in Van Schaick Hall on Friday evening must be set down as one of the most successful during the present session. Practically the whole evening was the outcome of the Vice-President's individual work, Mr. Vincent having prepared the paper, selected and seen to the making of his own lantern slides, arranged the musical portion of the programme (which involved the composing of organ parts for some of the items, and in addition he read the paper and described the scenes. Before starting the programme the President drew attention to the musical and essay competitions which the Society at the annual general meeting directed the different committees to arrange. The musical prospectus and rules for the essay competition were now in the hands of all members and he hoped the labours of the committees would be rewarded by a fuller list of entries than they had had last year. He appealed to the members to make both competitions the success they deserved to be.

The paper read by Mr. W. Karl Vincent, (Vice-President of the Society) on "Ober-ammergau and the Passion Play" was at once historical and descriptive, and highly interesting from all points. It was illustrated by over 50 views depicting scenes on the way to the little Tyrolean village on which once in every ten years the eyes of all Europe—indeed of the whole civilized world,—are centred, and reproducing photographs in and of the village and its strikingly picturesque surroundings, and of the action of the remarkable work these humble Tyrolean peasants produce before spectators drawn by curiosity or religious fervour from all quarters of the earth. At the outset Mr. Vincent made brief reference to the now well dissipated idea that the Passion Play is a profanation of the sacred subject. The villagers, he said, look upon the Passion Play as a religious service—a labour of love. Every performance is prefaced by prayer, they solemnly partake of the Holy Communion and thus prepare themselves for their great and difficult task, with the result that the religious fervour of the players elevates the Play and renders it one of the most profoundly impressive spectacles that can be witnessed. Of alternative routes Mr. Vincent chose that from Munich via Starnberg and Murnau to Oberau by railway and thence by post-chaise. The road via Ettal from the latter point is one of the loveliest mountain routes in Bavaria. Broad and easy, it winds in huge zig-zags up the hill side by steep precipices and deep mountain gullies. A few words were given in passing to the interesting village of Ettal, believed to have been founded either towards the end of the 9th century by one Guelph Ethike, or a few centuries later by Ludwig the Bavarian who, called by a monkish vision from Rome, came hither and raised a cloister. Leaving Ettal one enters on the last bit of road to the Passion village, part of which is wedged in between the crystal river Ammer and a high wall of marble called the Kappellen-wand, (high up in which is a huge figure of Christ in the mouth of the Barenloch cave), and part passes the steep Kofel overlooking Ober-ammergau, on which betrothals were wont to be celebrated, and from which a fine view of the surrounding country is obtained. There are other interesting sights, but the village itself of course claims chief attention. When, said the lecturer, the Passion pilgrim allows his eyes to rove over the hamlet for the first time he will at once admit that it has a decidedly charming and idyllic situation. He is welcomed by the fir-clad mountains, by the sunny meadows through which the river Ammer winds its shining way in zig-zag grooves, by the tall church, the Passion theatre, and by the smart yet quaint dwellings and their neat little gardens. On a bright summer's day everything breathes of peace and happiness. But anyone who goes to Ammergau expecting to find there a typical Bavarian village with country customs will be surprised. Mr. Vincent did not think the influx of visitors tended to spread culture and refinement among the villagers; on the contrary he regarded them as disturbing factors. The Ammergauer seen in his best light is the result of centuries. He is refined by inheritance, by a relatively long process which has formed his character.

Mr. Vincent devoted a substantial part of his paper to a history of the Ammer valley, (the first parish church of which was erected in 746 A.D.) which has undergone many misfortunes but is now rejoicing in prosperity and happiness through the medium of the Passion Play of Ober-ammergau. The population is about 1,800 and the people are an industrious folk, principally wood-carvers and farmers. The town itself is extremely clean and neat; everything that tends to add to the comfort and general welfare of the villagers is carefully sought after by the Mayor and his assistants. The Main Street contains many picturesque dwellings in the style of the Swiss chalet, with trim little gardens all aglow with bright flowers of many colours. Among the monuments in the Parish Church is one to Pastor Daisenberger, the arranger of the Passion Play as we now have it. The church, its frescoes, altars, etc., the fine shops with their beautiful products of art-industry were described. The needs and wants of the people are of the simplest kind. The large sums of money that the Passion Play brings into the village are almost all absorbed in parish undertakings. Ammergau has been burdened with so many debts, so much distress and misery, that up to well in the eighties the receipts from the Passion Play were much like drops of rain in the desert. It takes a lot to keep the mountain rivers in order, to contribute to the general up-keep of the village, to maintain the carving school and other public enterprises and buildings. Each individual receives very little of the proceeds from the Passion Play. After the necessary village expenses have been paid, the surplus of the Passion Fund is divided among the six to seven hundred players. Mayr, who took the part of "Christ" in 1890, received a sum equal to one thousand yen for his share in the performance. Considering that the play occurs only once in ten years, that the villagers are often put to a good deal of expense to meet the demands of visitors and that during this season the people can not obtain outside work, one must say that the Passion Play is not a very profitable undertaking. It is not a simple money-making affair, for the villagers treasure the Play as a precious heirloom, and they have steadfastly refused the most tempting offers to perform elsewhere. The lecturer then described the theatre, its dimensions and arrangement. Formerly the play was given in the open, but since 1900 the auditorium has been covered in and now seats nearly 5,000; the stage, however, is still open to the sky.

Turning now to the Play, Mr. Vincent briefly reviewed its history since 1633 when, the plague having been brought into the valley, the heads of the village vowed that, if its ravages might be stayed they would hold a "Passiontragedie" every ten years, a vow which by special miracle arrested the ravages of the disease. In 1634 the Play was given for the first time on an open air stage by the Ammergauers, and though more than once molested by official interference its performance has continued with regularity to the present day. Having mentioned the three men (Father Ottmar Weiss, 1769-1843; the schoolmaster Rochus Dedler, 1779-1822; and the priest Daisenberger, 1779-1853) justly celebrated for their popularity with the community and the good work they rendered in connexion with the theatre, and cited the names of those that will long be remembered for their exceptional abilities in portraying the several difficult characters of the drama, Mr. Vincent proceeded to a brief description of the Play itself, which in its general features is doubtless well-known to our readers. At Ober-ammergau everything tends to deepen one's impression of the Passion Play. "Nature and art were never more charmingly blended. Behind the stage and towering above it in the distance are the mountains of Tyrol. The twittering of the birds harmonizes with the orchestra and chorus. Butterflies flit across the stage, the sweet perfume of spring blossoms scents the air; the doves perched high in the rafters of the theatre coo to their hearts' content; the soft green of the hills meets the deep blue of the sky. God never seemed revealed in greater glory than here in Ober-ammergau among the Bavarian hills." The remarks of the lecturer were strikingly enforced by the views shown of the various tableaux and scenes—from the moment when to soft and harmonious music the chorus with slow and stately measure comes forth from the columned halls on either side and the Choragus recites the opening lines, "O, human race, by sin and shame laid low," etc., and the first Tableaux—the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise—to the dread tragedy of the Cross, the Rising Again, and the final apotheosis where Christ ascends from the midst of His disciples and holy women to join his Father in Heaven. "Shades of evening gradually approach,—faintly in the distance is heard the chiming of the vesper bell, slowly the curtain falls to the final strains of the Hallelujah Chorus, quietly, deeply moved, with abated breath the spectators gradually leave the Passion Theatre and walk out into the golden glow of even-tide."

Following the lecture came an appropriate musical programme, as set out below:—

Song..... "Shepherd of Souls".....Wilson.
Mr. E. Kendall.
Pianoforte and Harmonium } "Pilgrims' Chorus" .....Wagner.
(from "Tannhäuser").
Miss Blundell and Mr. W. Karl Vincent.
Song....."Le Crucifix" .....Faure.
Mrs. E. C. Irwine.
Violin Solo....."Air" .....Goldmark.
(from Violin Concerto).
Mr. H. A. Poole.
Song....."O, Blessed Redeemer" .....Faure.
Mrs. James Walter.
Piano Duet and Harmonium } "March of the Pilgrims" .....Mendelssohn.
(from Italian Symphony).
Misses Blundell and Cain and Mr. W. Karl Vincent.
Song....."O, Divine Redeemer" .....Gounod.
Mrs. E. C. Irwine.

The President in moving a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Vincent complimented him upon the excellence of his paper and the super-excellence of the musical programme which he had arranged. Mr. Vincent had dealt entirely with the Passion-Play of Ober-Ammergau, but it must not be forgotten that before the Reformation England was a prolific field for similar dramatic representations of the sacred stories of Holy Writ. The York, Chester and Coventry Miracle and Mystery Plays were a quaint literary heritage of our race, and they dealt with a vast variety of topics all associated with the Scriptures. The M.S.S. of these rude old plays could be seen in the British Museum, in the Bodleian Library, in the Chapter House at York and elsewhere. So great was their vogue that the Reformers had the greatest difficulty in frowning them down, the good folks of Coventry in particular being most tenacious in maintaining their right to enact their Miracle Play at certain seasons of the year. But the custom was gradually suppressed though here and there a Mystery or a Miracle Play lingered in the more remote parts of rural England, and as late as 1850, one was given in one of those queer old-fashioned little Cornish villages which rejoice in the name of a saint taken from the old British calendar. As a boy the speaker could remember the "Waits" at Christmastime performing a little play dealing with the birth of Christ, in which the carols took but a subsidiary part. This was in Warwickshire in the late seventies; but it is only a year ago that The Times described a similar Christmas Eve performance in a Sussex Village, and the writer of the article declared that the words used by "St John," "Old Adam," "The Shepherds," "Vice," and other characters had been handed down orally from father to son for untold generations, for they bore in their archaic form traces of a most remote antiquity. The Morality Plays to which category "Everyman" belongs, are of a much later period of evolution. Properly speaking they were the immediate forerunners of the great Elizabethan drama, which, as we know, turned to the book of everyday life for its subjects.

THE HEBREWS IN AMERICA.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

New York, December 7th, 1905.

New York is gay with Christmas preparation, but lively also with politics despite election being over; for no one knows yet but that Hearst may be counted in and become mayor. The prize is great, for Mayor McClellan actually rules over more people than did President George Washington. The New York Herald, which a short time ago contained the data showing this contrast of facts, gave also the portrait of an ex-naval engineer, who in 1874 repaired Commodore M. C. Perry's flag-ship, the Mississippi. In his nineties Mr. Chas. Haswell is still at work daily in his office at the City Hall.

The shadows and the lights alternate. "The Mayor of Tokio," full of fun, nonsense, bright jokes and local hits, with suggestions of the city on the Sumida in silk and spangle, parasol and top-knot, holds the boards and draws the crowds. Up at the Nippon Club, in quiet and aristocratic 85 Street, now reached in a jiffy by subway, Minister Takahira has bidden his New York friends goodbye. They all hope to see him in the United States again. At Washington he gives another Sayonara party, previous to leaving for home. As a neighbour and friend in the capital, he has made many warm friends who feel real regret at his leaving. Remembering him first as a student lad in Tokyo University, and then as a secretary at the Japanese Legation of earlier days, I was highly interested in finding him at the council board at Portsmouth, where he sat with another student of mine, Baron Komura, whom I had the honour of teaching during the greater part of the years 1872, 1873 and 1874. Most amusing, during the days of the Peace Conference at Portsmouth, were the bright, flippant and highly entertaining, but utterly untrustworthy accounts in the morning newspaper of what the envoys said and did! Walter Savage Landor never wrote more lively and also more imaginary "conversations."

Not one moment too soon did President Roosevelt come forward as peacemaker, and history will surely justify and increase in honor the Elder Statesmen who advised the signing of the treaty. If for no other reason because there is no "deceitfulness of riches" greater than money made in war, the Emperor and his advisers deserve the praise of the world. Japan's greatest victory was won over herself, and her prosperity will be sound and sure.

While we are still wondering if it is evolution or revolution in Russia, the Hebrews are mourning. One of the most impressive sights seen in Manhattan Island for years was the slow and solemn movement of 120,000 Jews, living on the East Side, who in public mourning, in street and in synagogue, showed their grief at the slaughter of their brethren at Odessa and in other Russian cities. Yet they are not stopping with tears. The fund for the relief of the Jewish survivors in Russia has already reached one million dollars. On Thanksgiving Day, and on the Sundays before and after, the celebration of the 250th anniversary of the settlement of Jews in the United States was commemorated in hall, church and synagogue. Driven out from Brazil when the intolerant Portuguese expelled the tolerant Dutch, the Jewish Pilgrim fathers found rest and peace with prosperity first on cosmopolitan Manhattan island and then in Rhode Island. The little "Land of Crooked Streets," as Massachusetts Tories used to call Roger Williams' colony, led New England in civil and religious freedom. Happily to the credit of the city once called New Amsterdam, there is soon to arise in Central Park an equestrian statue of William of Nassau. Long before Roger Williams was born, this Dutch Stadholder laid down the principle on which the Dutch Republic was founded—no interference with a man's conscience, so long as he obeys the laws. In the United States the Dutch led us all in religious liberty.

The Russian Jew, when like a hunted rat, he arrives in New York, is not a lovely or attractive specimen, as a rule. But, if one would have his icy prejudices melted, let him visit, for example, the "Educational Alliance" building, sustained by wealthy Israelites, on East Broadway. It stands in the very midst of one of the new Jerusalem. Five thousand people cross its threshold of stone (several times already worn down and renewed) in this rather new and handsome building. At 9.30 a.m. the little kindergartners come in—they need much soap and washing often—and all day are classes, and at night clubs. The final assembly 9.30-10.30 p.m. consists of the middle-aged teachers in Jewish homes of rabbinical Hebrew lore, who are trained in scientific and modern methods of reading and studying pure Hebrew. From the dirty, miserably poor "gutter snipes" to the bright, happy, neatly dressed debaters, embroiderers, singers, dancers, and piano-playing young ladies and gentlemen, good American citizens and prosperous merchants and philanthropists—the change is one delightful to note. Besides the public schools, which are "the stomach of the country," making good American blood, we have in New York that wonderful system of free public lectures, which gathers twice a week in a hundred halls, ten thousand adults to hear and see stereopticon lectures on travel, art, science, household economy, music, etc. The supervisor of the system is a Hebrew. A dozen daily papers in Yiddish help the ordinary Jew to know what is in the world, until he can read his newspaper in English. Although some Jews break away into blasphemy, immorality and even anarchy, and others, morbidly intellectual, are buried in books, expecting to solve the problems of society and the universe through speculation and philosophy, yet most of the immigrant Hebrews become good citizens and householders. It is to be hoped that the foolish counsels that urge the arming by Americans of the Russian Hebrews will evaporate. It is certain that Hebrews, Koreans, Armenians and other oppressed people, who know not Washington's farewell address counsels will besiege the doors of the White House in vain so long as we have a negro problem on our hands, and 9,000,000 black folks to look after, to say nothing of Indians, and the Monroe doctrine in practice. We Americans are likely to let the other Powers attempt the task which some day "The Parliament of the World" may attempt. One must expect "the battle flags furl" before that consummation. Tennyson was scientific as well as poetic in his order of vision.

Congress has opened and the President's message—the longest document of the sort ever known, occupying over two hours in the official reading—has been more or less digested. The literary critic sees easily why our President's writing is no more likely to win fame as classic or permanent addition to literature in English, any more than is Gladstone's. The soul of wit is also the secret of life in literature, yet the topics pressing for attention are stalwartly discussed.

THE LAW COURTS.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The trial of Mr. H. Kono, a member of the Lower House, and other politicians who are charged with having participated in the Tokyo disturbances, will take place on Jan. 15th in the Tokyo District Court.

THE NOGUCHI CASE.

The trial of O. Noguchi, who is charged with having murdered his brother-in-law, the well-known poet, Mr. Noguchi Neisai, will take place on February 8th in the Tokyo District Court before Judge Imamura. Messrs. T. Hanai and S. Saito, lawyers of Tokyo, will be employed for the defence.

RAZA v. CHARTERED BANK.

The hearing of a case instituted by Mr. M. A. Raza against the Chartered Bank claiming delivery of forty bales of sheep skins, was resumed on Jan. 10th, in the Yokohama District Court. Mr. J. F. Cox Edwards, of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, was examined as an expert witness.

At the outset of the hearing, Mr. Edwards asked the Court that he should be paid a fee for appearing as an expert. He was very reluctant to attend as this was his busy time.

The Court was willing to pay a fee but could not fix the amount before his claim was presented. If the claim was reasonable the Court would have no objection to payment.

Mr. Edwards deposed that drafts on merchandise were arranged in various ways. As to the usual practice, the draft was attached to the shipping documents—bill of lading, marine insurance policy, invoice, etc.—on which the shipper can draw the amount covering the invoice from a bank. Of course there must be a special arrangement between the shipper and the bank. Such an understanding was made in confidence between the parties, so that the bank would not take any precautionary measures as to the contents of packages specified in the invoice. On the other hand, the bank which received the foregoing draft would intimate its arrival to the consignee. The bank would give an instruction to a landing agent to land the goods concerned in the documents and to keep them stored until the draft was honoured by the consignee within due time. When the draft was paid, the bank would give up to the consignee the warrant given by the landing agent.

Being shown by the Court the receipt of Messrs Helm Bros. for eighty bales of tanned sheep-skins, Witness said that it was a warrant. Examined by the plaintiff's Counsel, Mr. Edwards said that no bank personally examined the goods. The bank did not pay money against the documentary draft unless there was confidence in the shipper. Consequently the bank examined the invoice and bill of lading only. The goods were thus security against the advance to the shipper. As to the arrangement between the bank and the landing agent, witness said there were several ways according to the nature of the draft attached to the shipping documents. In any case the goods would be kept by the landing agent on behalf of the bank until the draft was paid. In the case of damage or shortage of merchandise the landing agent would notify the bank. There was no business practice that the bank was bound to pay for damage or shortage.

Several argumentative queries by the plaintiff's Counsel followed to which explanations were duly given. Further witness said that if the draft was dishonoured, the bank would inform the shipper and would re-ship the goods or take other steps under the instructions of the shipper. Being questioned by the plaintiff's Counsel what steps the bank would take as to damage which was found in goods in the custody of the landing agent, he said that the bank had no responsibility for the damage.

At the conclusion of the examination of witness Counsel briefly spoke after which plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine a clerk of Messrs. Helm Bros as to the details of communications between the landing agents and the shipowner with regard to the damage to a portion of forty bales of tanned sheep-skins consigned to the plaintiff. The Court dismissed the request.

The parties thereupon briefly discussed the case after which the Court decided to give judgment on Jan. 12th.

DEATH OF MR. HERBERT ROSE.

His many friends in Japan, and especially those in Yokohama, where he spent a number of years, will learn with deep sorrow of the death of Mr. Herbert Rose, Manager in Taipei, Formosa, of the firm of Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co. He was here on a visit during the Christmas Holidays and at that time presented no conspicuous appearance of ill-health.

Mr. Rose, who was of Anglo-German parentage, came to Yokohama some eight years ago and entered the office of Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co., with whom he remained till the time of his death. He was an enthusiastic yachtsman and owned several boats successively, his last being the Wanderer, and he took an active share in the administration of the Yokohama Yacht Club, of which he was for some years an exceedingly popular and energetic Hon. Secretary. The turf also claimed part of his attention, and for several years in succession he had an interest in stables. Mr. Rose will be remembered by all who came in contact with him as a true gentleman; an honest-hearted, straightforward and kindly man: his removal in the very prime of life is very sad.

EXHIBITION OF FENCING AND JIUJITSU.

Promoted by the masters and mistresses of the Sho-do Kwan, an institution for training in old military arts, a funeral service in memory of the officers and men who died during the war was conducted on the Cricket Ground, Yokohama, on Sunday, Jan. 7th, commencing at 11 a.m. The altar was arranged on a stage where the assault-at-arms later took place. Buddhist and Shinto priests officiated at the services. Abbot Ito, of the Yokohama branch of the Hongwanji, read an address eulogising the excellent services rendered by the deceased during the war.

Under the auspices of Mrs. Ai Matsumoto, a well-known fencing and jiujitsu mistress, (apparently about sixty-five years old), feats of arms were exhibited. In the intervals between the various performances, the City band played selections and in addition hora (conch-shells) were blown and jintaiko, (military drums) were beaten. In ancient times to order a retreat, the conch-shell or gong was used, and for the advance, the drum. Jugglers also performed and day fire-works were displayed. The meeting, which was attended by a number of foreigners, concluded at 4.30 p.m.

It is officially reported that the second batch of Japanese prisoners—about forty officers and men—from Harbin have been handed over to the Japanese at the advanced line. They are all sick and wounded and could not be removed to European Russia. The further delivery of prisoners, about ninety in number, will shortly take place in Manchuria. This is said to be the final batch.

TREATY AND ADDITIONAL AGREEMENT BETWEEN JAPAN AND CHINA RELATING TO MANCHURIA.

(OFFICIAL VERSION).

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the Emperor of China, desiring to adjust certain matters of common concern growing out of the Treaty of Peace between Japan and Russia of September 5th, 1905 have resolved to conclude a Treaty with that object in view and have for that purpose named Their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan: Baron Komura Jutarō, Jusammī, Grand Cordon of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Special Ambassador of His Majesty, and

Uchida Yasuya, Jushii, Second Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun, His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary; and His Majesty the Emperor of China:

Prince Ching, Presiding Minister for Foreign Affairs, Councillor of State and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty, Chu Hung-chi, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Councillor of State and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty, and Yuan Shih-kai, Viceroy of the Province of Chihli, Junior Guardian of the Heir-Apparent, Minister Superintendent of Trade for the Northern Ports and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty;

Who, after having exchanged their full powers which were found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following Articles:

Art. I.—The Imperial Chinese Government consent to all the transfers and assignments made by Russia to Japan by Articles V and VI of the Treaty of Peace above mentioned.

Art. II.—The Imperial Japanese Government engage that in regard to the leased territory as well as in the matter of railway construction and exploitation, they will, so far as circumstances permit, conform to the original agreements concluded between China and Russia. In case any question arises in the future on these subjects, the Japanese Government will decide it in consultation with the Chinese Government.

Art. III.—The present Treaty shall come into full force from the date of signature. It shall be ratified by Their Majesties the Emperor of Japan and the Emperor of China and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Peking as soon as possible, and not later than two months from the present date.

In witness whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty in duplicate in the Japanese and Chinese languages and have thereto affixed their seals.

Done at Peking, this twenty-second day of the twelfth month of the thirty-eighth year of Meiji, corresponding to the twenty-sixth day of the eleventh moon of the thirty-first year of Kuang Hsi.

(Signed) BARON KOMURA JUTARO, (L. S.)
Jusammī, Grand Cordon of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Special Ambassador of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

(Signed) UCHIDA YASUYA, (L. S.)
Jushii, Second Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

(Signed) PRINCE CHING, (L. S.)
Presiding Minister for Foreign Affairs,

Councillor of State and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of China.

(Signed) CHU HUNG-CHI, (L. S.)
Minister for Foreign Affairs, Councillor of State and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of China.

(Signed) YUAN SHIH-KAI, (L. S.)
Viceroy of the Province of Chihli, Junior Guardian of the Heir-Apparent, Minister Superintendent of Trade for the Northern Ports and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of China.

The Governments of Japan and China, with a view to regulate, for their guidance, certain questions in which they are both interested in Manchuria, in addition to those provided for in the Treaty signed this day, have agreed as follows:

Art. I.—The Imperial Chinese Government agree that as soon as possible after the evacuation of Manchuria by the Japanese and Russian forces, the following cities and towns in Manchuria will be opened by China herself as places of international residence and trade:

In the Province of Shingking:
Fenghuangcheng; Liaoyang; Hsinmintun; Tieling; Tungkiangtzu and Fakumen.
In the Province of Kirin:
Changchun (Kuanhengtzu); Kirin; Ninguta; Hunchun and Sanhsing.
In the Province of Heilungkiang:
Tsitsihar; Hailar; Aihun and Manchuli.

Art. II.—In view of the earnest desire expressed by the Imperial Chinese Government to have the Japanese and Russian troops and railway guards in Manchuria withdrawn as soon as possible, and in order to meet this desire, the Imperial Japanese Government, in the event of Russia agreeing to the withdrawal of her railway guards, or in case other proper measures are agreed to between China and Russia, consent to take similar steps accordingly. When tranquillity shall have been re-established in Manchuria and China shall have become herself capable of affording full protection to the lives and property of foreigners, Japan will withdraw her railway guards simultaneously with Russia.

Art. III.—The Imperial Japanese Government, immediately upon the withdrawal of their troops from any regions in Manchuria, shall notify the Imperial Chinese Government of the regions thus evacuated, and even within the period stipulated for the withdrawal of troops in the Additional Articles of the Treaty of Peace between Japan and Russia, the Chinese Government may send necessary troops to the evacuated regions of which they have been already notified as above mentioned, for the purpose of maintaining order and tranquillity in those regions. If, in the regions from which Japanese troops have not yet been withdrawn, any villages are disturbed or damaged by native bandits, the Chinese local authorities may also dispatch a suitable military force for the purpose of capturing or dispersing those bandits. Such troops, however, shall not proceed within twenty Chinese li from the boundary of the territory where Japanese troops are stationed.

Art. IV.—The Imperial Government of Japan engage that Chinese public and private property in Manchuria, which they have occupied or expropriated on account of military necessity, shall be restored at the time the Japanese troops are withdrawn from Manchuria and that such property as is no longer required for military purposes shall be restored even before such withdrawal.

Art. V.—The Imperial Chinese Government engage to take all necessary measures to protect fully and completely the grounds in Manchuria in which the tombs and monuments of the Japanese officers and soldiers who were killed in war are located.

Art. VI.—The Imperial Chinese Government agree that Japan has the right to maintain and work the military railway line constructed between Antung and Mukden and to improve the said line so as to make it fit for the conveyance of commercial and industrial goods of all nations. The term for which such right is conceded is fifteen years from the date of the completion of the improvements above provided for. The work of such improvements is to be completed within two years, exclusive of a period of twelve months during which it will have to be delayed owing to the necessity of using the existing line for the withdrawal of troops. The term of the concession above mentioned is therefore to expire in the 48th year of Kuang Hsu. At the expiration of that term, the said railway shall be sold to China at a price to be determined by appraisal of all its properties by a foreign expert who will be selected by both parties. The conveyance by the railway of the troops and munitions of war of the Chinese Government prior to such sale shall be dealt with in accordance with the regulations of the Eastern Chinese Railway. Regarding the manner in which the improvements of the railway are to be effected, it is agreed that the person undertaking the work on behalf of Japan shall con-suli with the Commissioner dispatched for the purpose by China. The Chinese Government will also appoint a Commissioner to look after the business relating to the railway as is provided in the Agreement relating to the Eastern Chinese Railway. It is further agreed that detailed regulations shall be concluded regarding the tariffs for the carriage by the railway of the public and private goods of China.

Art. VII.—The Governments of Japan and China, with a view to promote and facilitate intercourse and traffic, will conclude, as soon as possible, a separate convention for the regulation of connecting services between the railway lines in South Manchuria and all the other railway lines in China.

Art. VIII.—The Imperial Chinese Government engage that all materials required for the railways in South Manchuria shall be exempt from all duties, taxes and likin.

Art. IX.—The methods of laying out the Japanese Settlement at Yingkou in the Province of Shinking, which has already been opened to trade, and at Antung and Mukden in the same Province, which are still unopened although stipulated to be opened, shall be separately arranged and determined by officials of Japan and China.

Art. X.—The Imperial Chinese Government agree that a joint-stock company of forestry composed of Japanese and Chinese capitalists shall be organized for the exploitation of the forests in the regions on the right bank of the River Yalu and that a detailed agreement shall be concluded in which the area and term of the concession as well as the organization of the company and all regulations concerning the joint work of exploitation shall be provided for. The Japanese and Chinese shareholders shall share equally in the profits of the undertaking.

Art. XI.—The Governments of Japan and China engage that in all that relates to frontier trade between Manchuria and Korea most favoured nation treatment shall be reciprocally extended.

Art. XII.—The Governments of Japan and China engage that in all matters dealt with in the Treaty signed this day or in the present Agreement the most favourable treatment shall be reciprocally extended.

The present Agreement shall take effect from the date of signature. When the Treaty signed this day is ratified, this Agreement shall also be considered as approved.

In witness whereof, the Undersigned, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed the present Agreement in duplicate in the Japanese and Chinese languages and have thereon affixed their seals.

Done at Peking, this 22nd day of the 12th month of the 38th year of Meiji, corresponding to the 26th day of the 11th moon of the 31st year of Kuang Hsi.

OVERCOATS AT OFFICIAL CEREMONIES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your issue of the 28th Dec. is a notice of the official opening of the Diet, which took place that day. At the end of your notice, is the customary admonition that: "Overcoats must be taken off outside the gates." I ask once more the question, that has often been put before: Is it not time for the Japanese officials to stop acting in this childish manner? We all recognize the present dignified position of the country, and admit gladly its title to our respect, but wearing an overcoat or not wearing one does not mark respect or denote disrespect. There are days in Tokyo, when even the two or three minutes which it takes to go from the gate to the door of the Houses of the Diet, are sufficient to cause an attack of pneumonia, if a person strips off his overcoat and, if a civilian, walks in his thin evening clothes. Some of us who have lived long in Japan, know about the old sentiment connected with an overcoat, but surely that has long passed away. Are we foreigners never to be admitted to have any sense of propriety? Is there any man who would be likely to receive a card to the Opening Ceremony of the Diet, who does not know just when he ought to take off his overcoat? Well, possibly there may be some who are so stupid or discountenanced as to wear it in the warm Peers' Chamber and in the presence of the Sovereign, but if there are such the ushers will never be criticised for giving them the grand bounce! Perhaps it may be said that such notices are made out of consideration for strangers to avoid the danger of disagreeable scenes at the gates or at the door, or elsewhere when we are supposed to confirm to the usages of polite society: very well, let us accept the thoughtfulness gratefully, but let us relieve the officials of the necessity for being so considerate. Your paper goes to all parts of the world, and I know that such notices never fail to excite a laugh in Europe and America when they are read by the many people who have not been in Japan.

Yours faithfully,
January 1st, 1906.

CIVILIAN.

TWO DAYS IN THE FAMINE REGION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Here in Sendai we hear much of the famine that exists in the surrounding country districts but the city is only indirectly affected and while we have the poor always with us their number has not very materially increased because of the famine. To see the worst, however, we do not need to go far. The chief of Kuribara County, who is the brother-in-law of a very dear friend of mine, a gentleman who was a student with me at Princeton, recently made the statement that his county is the worst in this ken. Some friends having recently sent a sum of money "for immediate distribution" Dr. De Forest and I went last week with it in hand on the invitation of the head official of Kuribara County to see this bad spot of the famine region.

Kuribara County was the scene of the great military manoeuvres held in the presence of His Majesty the Emperor four years ago. Some of us saw the fields at that time just after a good crop had been harvested. This year the county official report shows that the crop is less than 8% of an average year. Kuribara is in every way by far the largest county in Miyagi ken. The main reliance of its nearly one hundred thousand people is the rice crop, and their loss on this last year amounted to more than two millions of yen. It is estimated that to feed the poorest of the people with cheap food until next May will require Yen 198,000. As has been said several times, work is to be provided for those able to work and thus much of this sum will be paid as wages to a large part of the more than 40,000 poverty-stricken people of this county. So far relief works have not been begun except by a few philanthropic individuals, but after work is begun even the able-bodied must rest many days when snow is falling or on the ground. The nations of Europe and America do not as governments dispense charity and here at this time in Japan there is as yet no provision for the sick and aged and those who for any reason cannot work.

When there was only half of a crop three years ago the most important relief work was the relaying out of rice fields. Some of this land is very good for rice, and near Tsukidate there is a fine large plain which was well laid out three years ago. One of the strange things concerning this famine is that some of the best land yielded the least and last year this fine plain produced almost nothing. Some of the rice is still standing uncut, as even the straw is worthless, and much has been cut to get it out of the way, and thrown into the fields to rot and enrich the ground for another year.

For five years I have been secretary and treasurer for the Sendai community's door relief committee, which annually uses about three hundred yen among the poor of the city, and three years ago I was treasurer of the Miyagi ken Famine Relief Committee. I know more than one poor family whose main food the year round is what is left over in the dishes of the soldiers in the barracks, and have seen many cases of poverty. Officials had recently given us samples of the food being eaten by the poorest of the poor, but I must admit that I was hardly prepared when we suddenly entered one house to actually see a child eating a mixture of boiled leaves and chaff. Breakfast had been made of this stuff by the whole family and there was still some left in the pot. Some of the food we saw on this trip was of a sickly green color and my stomach was almost turned at the sight of it.

Among the poor there are some who still manage to get a little cheap rice to mix with the daikon for one of the meals of the day, but we were in the homes of many who now have not a grain of rice even once a day. A large number of families are trying to live on an average of two sen per member per day. My experience with such people leads me to believe that it is not wise to give them money, at least not any large sum. Sometimes kind-hearted people do as much harm as good in their attempts to give aid. With the very poor a little at a time is a good rule and, no matter what the circumstances, we did not give more than one yen to any family.

We recently asked the Chief of the Tax Bureau of these three ken what is the main cause of the poverty of so many people in this region and he replied that while some are lazy and some wicked the great reason is the size of the families. The whole world knows that the poor have more than their share of the children. The Japanese have a proverb bimbo ko takusan—the poor have many children. They have also a persimmon which they call bimbo kaki—poor man's persimmon, because it has very many seeds and contains very little that can be eaten. In Kuribara County the average family consists of more than seven members. One town we visited has a population of a little more than five thousand, and 73% of all the families are said to be in need of aid. There are only two of the twenty-nine towns and villages in the county worse off than this. In one house which we entered we saw a man who is trying to support a family of seven on about twelve sen a day which he and his wife earn by making of twigs the bundles into which charcoal is put. He is a peasant and has no other work. Here is a family in real distress. The morning meal had been daiken leaves and bean husks.

The next house we entered was only a few doors away. Here was a deserted family. Some of his neighbours emigrated with their families to Hokkaido but this man ran away and left his family in poverty and misery. The family consists of the wife and three children—one of them born after the father ran away—and the great-grandmother, about seventy years of age. The mother looks self-respecting and she is bravely trying to keep alive all five with the few sen she is able to earn somehow.

We had not time to visit very many of the five hundred stricken families and so after giving some help to the families we did see we left fifteen yen with the town officials to be given in rice to those in greatest need. To-day one of these officials, who had been in Sendai on business, called just before starting home and said that the rice had been distributed. In answer to questions he replied that of the five hundred families three hundred are in great need. Our idea had been to have them help five or six of the very, very worst cases but there are sixty such families and the officials had given twenty-five sen worth of cheap rice to each. This means that each family received not quite two sho of rice—just about enough for a family of seven for one day's full allowance.

We had ideal weather for getting around. The roads were frozen but there was comparatively little snow. At Tsukidate a policeman told me that if it rained or snowed for three days there would be intense suffering and that if the police were not watchful some people would actually starve. The village offices have no money but the policeman thought that at the last pinch some money could be gotten somehow to prevent death. Just as we reached home at eight o'clock on Friday night snow began to fall and when we awoke next morning there was nearly a foot of snow on the ground and the flakes were still coming down thick and fast.

TOKYO'S TRAMWAYS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—To an observer one of the most extraordinary phenomena in the financial sphere in Japan is the present condition of the Electric Railroads in Tokyo. The fare is four sen and twenty-five per cent. is handed over to the Government as a tax. The remaining seventy-five per cent. goes for expenses and dividends. It certainly seems that one quarter of the gross receipts is an unduly large proportion. That, however, can hardly be avoided, it appears. The point that seems quite inexplicable is why the shareholders of the Companies in question should have in the first place made themselves ridiculous by charging a uniform 3 sen fare; and further why they should make themselves still more ridiculous by continuing it after it has proved to be such a lamentable failure.

If my information is correct, after a certain number of years these electric roads will become the property of the city of Tokyo. If this be so, they should certainly be entitled to a fair profit during the mean time. And yet, in spite of the fact that the cars are invariably well filled, I note that the shares (50 yen fully paid) of one of the Companies are quoted at 52 yen and the dividend 2.5 per cent.!

What kind of finance is this? Is it likely that foreigners or Japanese either, will feel any inducement to invest money in public enterprises conducted in such an absurd manner?

If the shareholders of these Companies are so extraordinarily benevolent, would it not be just as well to turn the whole thing into a charitable institution, and let people ride for nothing? Perhaps Mr. Anenomiya, out of the fulness of his heart, would then propose to provide each passenger with a ham sandwich and a cup of coffee.

Yours respectfully,

A MAN IN THE STREET.

THE RUSSIAN CHRISTMAS TREES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I have to thank you for so promptly inserting my letter about the proposed Christmas trees for the Russians at Narashino.

The party of twelve who went to Narashino last Saturday, the Russians' Christmas Eve, were unanimous in declaring that they had had a never-to-be-forgotten day, for owing to the exertions of kind friends there was not the slightest hitch in any of the arrangements, and they were able to feel that their visit had given great pleasure. Four trees were erected, two in the Russian and two in the Polish Church. While the trees were being decorated the heads of companies received the presents, to distribute them afterwards to the men. Preparations were made for eight thousand and seventy men.

To each man Mrs. Warton gave a packet of cigarettes, a bun, a sponge cake, a piece of hard-bake, a piece of gingerbread and a card wishing him a happy return to his own country.

The contributions sent in enabled us to add to this a hundred lbs. of tea and an orange for each man.

After the trees had been decorated we were present at the Christmas Eve anointing ceremony. When this was over it was dusk and the trees were lit. The choir sang some hymns and the whole body of men joined in chanting the Nicene creed. The officiating priest was Japanese but all the arrangements were carried out by the prisoners themselves and their singing was most impressive. Our one regret was that the whole plan, having only been suggested the previous Saturday, was carried out very hastily and we were not able to invite some who might have liked to go with us. In consequence of a rumour circulated both in Tokyo and Yokohama to the effect that the bulk of the men were leaving on Saturday, a number of promised subscriptions were held back. Contributions and subscriptions of money were received from Mrs. Kirby, the Imperial Hotel; the King's Daughters; Six British Children, Mrs. Buck; Mrs. Gubbins; Miss Dorothy Farclay; Bishop McKim; Mrs. Thompson; Miss Thompson; Miss G. Thompson; Mrs. Box; Miss Emerson; Mrs. Buck; the Misses Squire; Mrs. and Miss Black; Madame Doutelegne; Mr. Archer; Mr. Avril and an anonymous subscription of thirty yen.

Yours truly, SUSAN BALLARD.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

MONSIEUR,—A propos de votre article du 4 courant, Missionaries in Japan, il me revient en mémoire une petite anecdote parisienne. Un monsieur se promène dans la rue avec son chien. Dans le corridor d'une maison, le chien aperçoit un lapin domestique, se précipite dessus et l'étrangle. Le propriétaire du lapin sort. Violente dispute. Un gamin de Paris suit la scène d'un œil amusé et se tournant du côté du propriétaire du chien: "Deux sous, Monsieur, et je témoigne que c'est le lapin qui a commencé."

C'est on peu ce qu'a voulu prouver le Baron Suematsu dans les colonnes du Times au sujet des incendies de certaines églises chrétiennes à Tokyo. Des chrétiens inoffensifs ont perdu par la stupidité d'une bande d'énergumènes organisés plusieurs milliers de yen; mais ces lapins manquent si souvent de discrétion, dirait le Baron Suematsu, sont si combattifs de par leur religion disent certains autres, qu'ils méritaient une petite leçon: on la leur a donnée: rien d'étrange. M. le Baron Suematsu trouve quelques journalistes complaisants et le tour est joué.

Le procédé peut être habile, je ne le trouve pas honnête. F.H.

THE ARGENTINE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your paper of the 5th inst. I saw an article entitled "Defaulting States." This article was taken from a London paper, and reported a meeting of bankers at which statistics were read regarding insolvent states. These countries included the municipality of Cordoba and Santa Fe; the government of the province of Buenos Ayres was also put down for a cedula mortgage. In reading the article I gathered that it was stated that the Republic of Argentina does not pay its debts. Please permit me to tell you that such a statement is not correct. Insolvency does not attach to the Republic of Argentina, but to the municipality of Cordoba and Santa Fe, who use for payment of the debt, the "Bank Hipotecario" in Buenos Ayres which conducts transactions accepted by all the creditors. Such being the case the Republic of Argentina has no legal or financial responsibility, as local liabilities are carried in accordance with the law and naturally will be paid off in due time. For the present, the Republic of Argentina is in a very prosperous condition and the public debt has moved from the class of 6 per cents. to 4½ per cents. and even 4 per cents.

Let me place before you the actual situation.

In 1900 the Republic of Argentina had a foreign loan of £385,000,000. Up to date the country has always paid the interest on this, beside refunding £30,000,000 of the principal.

The loan of 6 per cent. in 1891 was quoted in 1900 at 90 per cent. and has been retired at 103 per cent.

The loan of 5 per cent. for public works stood in 1875 at 90 per cent. and to-day is at 103 per cent.

The loan of 4½% in 1888 was 67% and to-day 97%
" 4 " in 1900 was 57 " " 93 "
" 3½ " in 1900 was 51 " " 90 "

It would be very easy for the Minister of Finance in Buenos Ayres to convert the present loans into bonds bearing lower rates of interest. In conclusion, allow me to point out that the Republic of Argentina has actually in the Bank 126,000,000 (gold) pesos, destined to liquidate its loans, and let me also tell you that the national Government has received offers of further assistance from English capitalists, so I am sure we may declare that its public finances are in a most flourishing condition.

The President of the Commission of the Budget, the Deputy Varela, has himself explained the matter. Our creditors have great confidence in the financial situation of the country, which has been obtained through the punctuality shown in its payments to its creditors and we constantly receive new offers on behalf of Government enterprises.

Hoping you will be kind enough to publish this declaration,

I remain, Dear Sir, Yours very truly,

(Signed) GARCIA SAGASTUME.
Argentine Chamber d'Affaires.

Tokyo, 9th January, 1906.

THE FAMINE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—From the reports of members of the Foreign Famine Relief Fund in Sendai who have interested themselves and the public, by the assistance of the press, in the distress which is undoubtedly prevalent in Miyagi Ken, Iwate Ken, and Fukushima Ken, the foreign communities have commenced to respond to the appeal with their customary generosity.

I am somewhat surprised to read in the columns of the Times (Nov. 24th, 1905) that the Japanese Embassy in London has informed Reuter's Agency that foreign aid is unnecessary, and that beyond the liberal contributions already received in London no further assistance is acceptable.

The reports from Sendai are calculated to impress those of us in Japan with the dire need for immediate and adequate assistance to prevent suffering and even starvation. You will be rendering considerable help to all concerned if you can furnish the public with a statement of what the Japanese authorities and public generally are providing for those in such distress, as has been described in the columns of the local press, also with the plan of assistance projected by the Sendai Committee who solicit the practical sympathy of the foreign community in Japan.

Yours faithfully,

F. PARROTT.

THE SHIN-YUBARI MINE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In yesterday's issue of your paper you mentioned the fact that, according to the Hochi, the Shin-Yubari coal mines, Hokkaido, were sold to a number of London capitalists. In this connection it may interest you and your readers to know that the whole property of 7,200,000 tsubo was sold and that a company with a capital of yen 5,500,000 will immediately be formed. This is the first transaction under the new Mining Laws of July 1st, 1905 and it was the Samurai Syndicate, 41 Threadneedle Street, London, E.C., which succeeded in interesting the capitalists in this property. We are the sole representatives of the Samurai Syndicate and any information desired is gladly put at your disposal.

We remain, dear sir, Yours faithfully,

MEYER, KURODA & CO.

PROGRESS OF REORGANIZATION OF THE FINANCES OF KOREA.

(C) ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM.

VI.—OFFICIAL REFORM.

The Korean administrative system, though it appears at a glance more or less complete in its organization and in the manner of conducting its affairs, is so only to external appearance; if one examine it from the inside it seems needlessly complicated, and to necessitate a number of superfluous officials, by no means in harmony with the impoverished condition of the country.

In attempting the reform of the finance one of the most necessary steps is to take in hand the reform of the administration and to re-adjust the official system. For this reason the re-organization of the official system should proceed hand in hand with that of the finances of the country.

The Government, always dilatory, having been urged in this direction, the Government Offices Reform Office was established, and at last, in March this year, a notification respecting the re-organization of the departments of the central Government was published. This organization is necessarily for the present mainly confined to the reduction of officials; the abolition and amalgamation of different parts of the system and the re-arrangement of the official business belongs rather to the work of purely administrative reform, apart from the question of finance, and is for the most part relegated to the future, the present changes being confined to such matters as directly affect the annual revenue and the national finance. The surplus revenue accruing to the country out of these reforms will for this reason only amount to some 40,000 yen.

The number of offices and officials abolished under this scheme are as follows:—

	Former System.	New System.	Reduction
Number of officials .....	24	20	4
Number of officials:—
1st grade of crown appointments (Chokunin) .....	50	45	5
2nd grade of appointments by recommendation of Ministers (Sonnin) .....	303	114	189
3rd grade of appointments by Ministers (Hannin) .....	398	368	30
Total Officials reduced.....	751	527	224

VII.—MILITARY REFORM.

The military forces of the country formerly absorbed about half of the ordinary expenditure under the Budget, but by the agreement with Japan it became necessary to support a greater number than were actually required for the defence of the country, and changes were effected by which a saving was made of about yen 1,000,000 annually. The change was commenced in July last year and completed in July of this year, and in this time a saving of much needless expenditure was made. The reduction in the troops is as follows:—

Six battalions and three companies. Comprising 311 officers and 8,214 men.

VIII.—AMENDMENT OF THE OFFICIAL SALARY REGULATIONS.

The confusion of the finances of Korea is due to a great extent to the want of reliability in the official discipline and this in turn is partly due to the smallness of the salaries allotted to the officials. The official salaries have been of late, owing to the rise in prices, insufficient to keep up the dignity of the officials, and even to live upon. When salaries are insufficient honesty cannot be expected, and if the officials are dishonest the discipline is tampered with. It is necessary gradually to extend the system of supervision of the accounts, thereby removing all suspicion of irregularities in the national revenue and expenditure, and in order to effect this it has become necessary to raise official salaries. In the impoverished condition of the exchequer it has so far proved impossible to sanction the entire expenditure required, but it is absolutely necessary to encourage honesty, and consequently the departments of the central government have been first dealt with, and the provincial governments and Imperial Household left till later. This is, however, but a matter of expediency in the scheme of reform.

The sources of revenue have been minutely investigated and by dint of economy in the Government expenditure the regulations governing official salaries were amended in June last, and the raising of the salaries of the departments of the central government and of military officers was decided upon. A comparison of the salaries under the old and new scales is made in the following table: shortly speaking, those of the third grade (Hannin) are doubled, and those of officials of higher grades will be advanced in somewhat less proportion.

Concurrently with this measure, in order to foster habits of economy, the necessity for which is recognised, those officials who have so far profited by an increase of salary are encouraged to save by the issue of Official Saving Regulations by the Council of State.

(D) RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE BUDGET.

IX.—COMPILATION OF THE BUDGET.

In former days the Korean Government presented no budget: of late years, however, an annual Budget has been compiled and an account of the annual revenue and expenditure published. This document was, however, a mere form and had no connection with the actual estimates. The items of revenue and expenditure were arbitrary sums, and again, items having no reference to the national expenditure were inserted. The subdivisions were based upon a confused system of currency denomination, by which the grand total was greatly augmented.

The Budget was not published for four or five months after the beginning of the year.

It was decided that the Budget for the present year should be revised and published before the beginning of the year, but the departmental returns were not presented to the department of Finance until three weeks before the end of the year, and the amount demanded was far in excess of requirement, and in no case reliable, so that the accounts of the different departments could not be properly revised, and the Budget was finally compiled from the following data:—

1. Expenses of the personnel were calculated from the total number of the officials and the average amount of salary.
2. Expenses of supplies were calculated by enquiring what was needed in each department and simply estimating the cost.
3. Everything was eliminated except the necessary national expenses.
4. Totals were estimated by taking the Korean dollars as the standard, and estimating payments made on a gold basis (i.e. in Japanese yen) as two Korean dollars to one gold yen, by re-adding the amount.
5. All expenditure not of an urgent or important nature was eliminated.
6. New undertakings were limited to those of an urgent character.
7. Where the subdivision of items was unsatisfactory a new subdivision was made.

On the returns from the different departments being thus revised the Imperial sanction was obtained and the Budget was published by the 26th December.

With regard to the revenue, there were no reliable returns on which to base the estimate, and consequently this portion of the Budget was but the result of a little study of former budgets. It will be impossible to compile satisfactory revenue returns until the national taxes are placed upon a proper footing and the state of the revenue can thus be accurately ascertained.

The following table compares the Budgets of 1904 and 1905. In order, however, to place the estimates for 1905 on the same footing as those for 1904, in spite of the misleading nature of the latter, for purposes of comparison the re-additions of Japanese yen are deducted from the totals for 1905.

	1904. (Korean $)	1905. (Korean $)
Total Estimates:—
Revenue.....	14,214,573...	14,960,574
Expenditure...	14,214,298.....	19,113,665

Items in gold yen re-added in 1905 estimates:—
Revenue.....	865,000
Expenditure.....	1,790,958
Totals derived by subtraction of re-additions of gold yen:—
Revenue.....	14,214,573.....	14,105,564.

X.—THE PUTTING INTO PRACTICE OF THE ESTIMATES.

The Budget, which was published before the beginning of the year, purported to explain the sources and objects of the revenue and expenditure, but the government, which had hitherto exercised no supervision over the Budgets, were in a state of perplexity as to how these estimates were to be carried into practice. The accountant officers of the different departments were therefore summoned to the finance department at the beginning of the year, and the methods by which the practical adoption of the estimates should be taken in hand were carefully explained. They were told to adhere strictly to the amount in the estimates, to refuse to sanction any expenditure not therein provided for, to endeavour to economise as far as possible in the Budget estimates, to break away from old standing customs and to remedy former abuses. At the same time all demands for money on expenditure account were refused unless authenticated by the seal of the financial adviser. By this means the irregular expenditure of public funds was gradually reduced and economies began to appear in the current expenses. If similar progress be maintained, the ordinary current expenditure should not exceed the sum provided for in the Budgets.

As expenditure outside the scope of the budget will not be allowed, the sums hitherto dispersed in irregular expenditure will be saved, the accounts will by this means be kept within the limits of the Budget.

XI.—ISSUE OF TREASURY BONDS.

During the present year the debts due for repayment by the Government amounted to yen 1,538,000 of which yen 930,000 was due to the Dai-ichi-Ginko, 250,000 to the Accounts Office of the Imperial Household, and a balance of yen 300,000 to the Imperial Funerals account. Beside this there are salaries and travelling expenses due to foreign employes, the total, with other sundry sums due, amounting to yen 2,000,000.

As the economies in the expenditure were entirely insufficient to meet these debts, and it was impossible to anticipate any increase in the revenue, in June this year Treasury Bond Regulations were issued in order to meet the difficulty, under which a short term loan of yen 2,000,000 was authorised, and the national revenue assigned as security.

The flotation of the loan was undertaken by the Dai-ichi-Ginko, and the terms are as follows:—Interest at 7 per cent per annum, issue price yen 95 per yen 100 face value, and repayment to be made gradually within two years after the lapse of three years from the date of the loan. The Loan was floated in Tokyo, and, being the first Korean Government Loan, was subscribed more than five times over, in spite of the tightness of the money market consequent on the hostilities between Japan and Russia. The result of this Loan may be looked upon as a great omen for financial reform of Korea.

The details of the issue of the Loan are as follows:—

	Yen.
Amount of Loan.....	2,000,000
Issue price.....	95
Amount of applications above issue price...	475,400
do. do. at par.....	7,954,000
Ratio of allotments to amount of Applications	20%

XII.—REGULATIONS REGARDING FINANCIAL AFFAIRS.

By Law No. 2 of 1895, relating to the national Contabilities Imperial Edict No. 71 of the same year, embodying Revenue Regulations, and Imperial Edict No. 72 of the same year embodying Expenditure Regulations, the foundation of the rules regulating the national finance were laid. These were further supplemented by various regulations, the whole forming a code closely resembling the Japanese Finance Laws, and carefully drawn up. This code however was pigeonholed and was never put into practical effect or regarded in the least, the officials themselves being only in rare instances aware of its existence. It is even doubtful if a number of its provisions would if enforced have proved beneficial; if, however, these regulations had been properly applied, much of the present financial confusion and extortion among the official classes would have been avoided.

It has now been attempted to construct a code which will put the officials on the right pass by the adoption of such of the provisions of the above mentioned code as apply to present conditions, adding supplementary Regulations, thus giving effect to the reform of the financial administration. The principal points of these regulations are as follows:—

1. To establish a fixed method of dealing with the revenue and expenditure, to establish adequate supervision over the revenue and expenditure, and to devise means for regulating the same, thus abolishing the former evils of irregular taxation and extortion, and the collection and expenditure of the national revenue at the will of individuals, also the injurious practice hitherto existing in Korea of farming out the collection of the revenue to individuals. By these means it is hoped to set the revenue on a uniform system and to establish a definite relation between the revenue and expenditure.

2. To establish a fixed method of administering affairs connected with the national treasury. For this purpose the Dai-ichi-Ginko has been appointed to undertake the business of the Treasury, which is the direct agent for affairs connected with the revenue and expenditure. By this means the Bank transact the Treasury business both of the central Government and of the provincial Governments, and magistrates are saved the trouble of remitting specie to the department of finance.

3. To make regulations for the transport of specie, in order to introduce a uniform system for the transport of money received in taxes by the Treasury (Dai-ichi Ginko).

By this means the system will be abolished under which the magistrates remitted the taxes to the central Government, deducting a certain proportion under the head of transport expenses, irrespective of the actual amount of such transport expense, the greater part of which went into their own pockets.

4. To establish a system of checking of Government property, to the end that the Government property may be accurately defined, and order introduced, and also to prevent the appropriation of such property by officials, by whom no distinction was made between Government and private property of individuals.

5. To frame regulations with regard to public works and to sale and purchase, renting and letting Government property. By this means disputes regarding purchase and sale, letting and renting of Government property and contracts for public work will be regulated, restrictions imposed on Government contractors, contracts be strictly drawn up, provision be made for the payment of guarantee money, and the many irregularities hitherto existing with respect to public works and property established.

6. To frame regulations for ready money payments, so that petty expenses on office account, and other incidental accounts may be estimated in the Budget purposes at a monthly rate, and paid for in ready money as incurred.

It is also intended to summon the accountant officials from time to time to give them advice and to encourage honesty among them, at the same time carefully instructing them as to the methods by which they should carry out their duties. It is proposed to create a control office for revenue purposes, and a director for expenditure purposes, whose duty it will be to issue instructions to the examining officials in these two branches; and a chief collector and collectors, whose duty it will be to instruct the district magistrates in their duties, thus ensuring that the revenue and the expenditure shall be dealt with by proper methods, and to endeavour to guard against injustice toward the people by ensuring that the revenue shall not be collected without the proper notification, and that no officials other than the magistrates of districts and governors of cities shall issue orders of collection of taxes, and that taxes when collected shall not be used for unauthorised purposes, as at present. By this means it is hoped to abolish the existing evils in connection with taxation.

The above measures form but the first stage in endeavouring to remedy the present condition of the finance of Korea, and amount to no more than the outline of a scheme for putting the financial status of the country on a permanent basis. It is impossible to say as yet whether the result will answer to the expectations. At the same time it is confidently anticipated that the Budget will show a surplus, and that the reform will not be confined to reduction, but will progress on constructive lines, with the result that the country will become prosperous and the people contented.

Already a start has been made on constructive lines; an agricultural experimental station and a cotton experimental farm have been established; bonded warehouses have to be erected, education is in process of reform and sanitary matters have been taken in hand. There are still, however, many matters which require attention, as, for instance, the placing of the revenue on a sound basis, the further organisation of the systems of communication and of education, besides a number of matters which belong properly to the second stage, such as the expansion of the foreign trade and the reorganisation of the Customs tariff, which will have a direct influence on the national prosperity.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

APPREHENSIONS AS TO MOROCCAN CONFERENCE.

London, December 4.

Renewed apprehensiveness is felt on the eve of the Moroccan Conference. The tone of the Spanish and Italian press is most pessimistic, the latter being remarkable for a distinct note of hostility to Germany. Even the Berlin press disputes the official assurances and is uneasy owing to rumours of German military preparations.

FLOUR FOR FAMISHING JAPANESE.

The Premier of New South Wales has promised to co-operate in the despatch of flour for the relief of the famine sufferers in Japan.

AMERICA "CHIPS IN."

Later.

A remarkable semi-official statement has been issued in Washington to the effect that the United States, by virtue of having concluded the first treaty with the Barbary States for the purpose of keeping down piracy, has a right superior to that of any European State in deciding critical questions at the Moroccan Conference.

INSURANCE AFFAIRS IN AMERICA.

Alexander Arr has been elected President of the New York Life in succession to McCaul, who has resigned. Both the McCurdys have resigned the trusteeship of the New York Mutual.

IMPORTANT STEAMSHIP AMALGAMATION.

The Royal Mail Steamship Company has entered into an agreement with the Orient-Pacific Line for the joint working of the Australian Service, which will henceforth be known as the Orient-Royal Service.

JAPANESE PRISONERS FROM RUSSIA.

London, January 6.

The Vancouver with 936 Japanese prisoners on board has passed Port Said.

ROJESTVENSKY EXPLAINS.

Admiral Rojestvensky, in a communication to the Novoe Vremya, explains that the permission to publish his letter did not imply the Naval Minister's agreement with the views stated in that letter, especially as he gave permission without censoring the letter. The allusion to Great Britain, the communication further adds, is Admiral Rojestvensky's private opinion.

RUSSIA'S TROUBLES.

Later.

Russian advices continue to report serious trouble in different parts of the empire, showing that the revolution is in no wise completely suppressed.

AMERICAN CURRENCY REFORM.

The well-known banker Jacob Schiff, in a speech delivered in New York, predicted a panic exceeding all previous experiences unless the currency of the United States is reformed and made more elastic. The speech has created a great impression.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

London, January 7.

The American delegates to the Moroccan Conference are instructed to prevent any Franco-German friction and to maintain the policy of the "open door."

CHINESE AND THE RAND.

The Standard quotes the opinion of counsel that the Earl of Elgin, Secretary for the Colonies, acted illegally in stopping the importation of Chinese into South Africa: the power to do so rests solely with the Privy Council.

BRITISH ARMY REFORM.

The Standard understands that Mr. Haldane, Secretary for War, will restore the five years' service with the Colours and seven years' with the Reserve.

RAMPANT ROWDYS.

The British general election is marked by increasing rowdyism. Mr. Balfour, speaking at Manchester, was constantly interrupted and the police had to be summoned to eject the offenders.

RUSSIA AND FRENCH INVESTORS.

Later.

M. Rouvier, the French Premier, has informed the Russian agent that the political situation is unfavourable for the flotation of the proposed Russian loan of 32,000,000 sterling.

THE CHINESE PROBLEM.

Mr. Gladstone, speaking at Leeds, said that the immediate deportation of 50,000 Chinese from the Transvaal would produce financial and industrial chaos in South Africa. It is the duty of the Government to alter the position with the least amount of friction possible.

BRITISH TRADE.

The imports of the United Kingdom for the year just closed were £565,000,000 sterling, showing an increase of 14½ millions; the exports were £330,000,000, showing an increase of 21½ millions.

THE ITALIAN PRESS AND THE CONFERENCE.

London, January 7.

The Italian newspapers are continuing their warm support of the rights of France in Morocco. They welcome the appointment of Marquis Visconti Venosta, the author of the Franco-Italian and Anglo-Italian Agreements, as delegate to the Conference.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR THE PHILIPPINES.

Washington reports say it has been decided to send two additional regiments to the Philippines. This, it is explained, is a precautionary measure due to the possibility of American interests in China requiring protection owing to the change that China is undergoing.

COUNT WITTE ON GERMANY'S FOREIGN POLICY.

Count Witte, being interviewed, said that he is convinced that the reports of an aggressive attitude attributed to the Kaiser with regard to the Morocco Conference are unfounded. Germany pursues an exclusively pacific policy. The Conference will terminate without difficulty.

THE LIBERAL POLICY.

London, January 9.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the British Premier, in his electoral address, says that "by renouncing the undesirable characteristics we formerly detected in their foreign policy, the Unionists had made it possible for us to pursue in substantial continuity their foreign policy without departing from the friendly unprovocative methods of past Liberal governments. It would be our duty to uphold economy, self-government; civil and religious liberty; free trade; and to repair as far as possible the mischief wrought in recent years to secure social economic reforms."

GERMANY AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Later.

Meetings continue in Germany in favour of friendly relations with Great Britain.

THE FRENCH SENATE.

The triennial elections to the Senate of France have taken place. M. Jaures and his Socialist colleagues are badly beaten.

DISSOLUTION.

King Edward signed the order for the dissolution of the British parliament yesterday.

BRITISH POLITICS.

London, January 10.

All the political leaders on both sides were speaking last night. The fiscal question and the Chinese labour issue were the chief topics of discussion; home-rule was also generally mentioned. Mr. John Burns, at Derby, and Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, dealt lengthily with the Chinese question. The latter declared that the Liberals did not intend and dare not alter the system.

AMERICAN CURRENCY BILL.

At Washington the bill for the reform of the currency of the United States has been introduced.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

It is expected that the borough elections in Great Britain and Ireland will finish by the 17th January; the counties will not finish till the 27th of the month.

GERMANY AND MOROCCO.

London, January 10.

The German White Book on Morocco, just issued, bears evidence of being carefully compiled rather for the purpose of establishing Germany's standpoint than for retorting upon the French Yellow Book. It shows that the Sultan emphatically assured the German representative that France was claiming to be mandatory for Europe. The book adduces various facts tending to prove the contention that the French reform schemes implied complete French control of Morocco. Prince von Buelow maintains that Germany in demanding the conference defends the interests of all the Powers.

The press, commenting on the White Book, considers that it indicates an amicable solution, though doubts are expressed as to German designs on the Atlantic coast.

THE FRENCH CHAMBER.

London, January 11.

The French Chamber of Deputies has re-assembled. M. Doumer has been elected President of the Chamber.

CHINESE LABOUR ON THE RAND.

The Chinese labour correspondence has been published in London. Lord Elgin, Secretary for the Colonies, at first directed that every step should be taken to prevent the shipment of 14,700 already licensed Chinese, but after a strong protest from Lord Selborne, High Commissioner in South Africa, Lord Elgin cabled that the licenses be allowed to stand.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, speaking at Liverpool, regretted his inability to cancel the importations of Chinese coolies already licensed. The sudden issue of 13,000 fresh licenses early in November would require elucidation, and the Government was now awaiting advice from the responsible Transvaal Government.

VOLCANIC ERUPTIONS IN ITALY.

Later.

There has been an eruption of Vesuvius and also of Etna. The lava is pouring down the sides of the funicular railway on Vesuvius, which is seriously damaged. There was a slight earthquake.

REVOLUTION IN THE CAUCASUS.

A telegram from Vienna says that the revolution in the Caucasus is extending. The rebels have seized the railways and have organized a general strike.

(RECEIVED BY THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")
THE TESHU LAMA.

London, January 6.

The Times' Calcutta correspondent says that the visit of the Teshu Lama was welcomed alike by the Hindoos and the Buddhists, which is a remarkable proof of their confidence in British friendship and indicates the friendliest relations.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

London, January 8.

Women in the United Kingdom are agitating for the franchise. Meetings are being interrupted by the introduction of the subject.

POLAND.

At Radow in Poland, bombs have been thrown into the residence of the Chief of Police. He sustained severe injuries to his feet and his wife was killed.

AMERICA AND CHINA.

Later.

A New York telegram to The Times contradicts the report that the U.S. Government intends to despatch troops to China in connection with European Powers in anticipation of an outbreak of further anti-foreign trouble, and says that the Secretary of State is desirous of maintaining the territorial integrity of China.

SOUTH RUSSIA.

A telegram from Odessa says that the revolutionary committees in South Russia are endeavouring to collect funds and to start a fresh movement.

RUSSIAN NEWS.

London, January 10.

The St. Petersburg authorities are informed that the life of the Czar will be attempted when he leaves the Palace.

The principal towns on the Siberian railway are in the possession of the reservists and strikers.

Wholesale arrests have been made at Perm, Kazan and Vladimir.

THE FRENCH FRONTIER.

The great forts at Belfort have been declared to be in a satisfactory condition in view of possible German aggression.

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

A moderate business has been done during the week, chiefly by native speculators, foreign shippers doing very little. Prices have on the whole been maintained, but consuming markets refuse to pay these prices and it is difficult to see how they can be kept up. Stock is heavy and foreign buyers look for some reduction in price before they can co-operate.

WILD WITH ECZEMA

And Other Itching, Burning, Scaly Eruptions with Loss of Hair.

Speedy Cure Treatment.

Bathe the affected parts with Hot Water and Cuticura Soap, to cleanse the surface of crusts and scales, and soften the thickened cuticle. Dry, without hard rubbing, and apply Cuticura Ointment freely, to allay itching, irritation, and inflammation, and soothe and heal, and lastly take Cuticura Resolvent Pills, to cool and cleanse the blood. A single set is often sufficient to cure the most torturing, disfiguring, itching, burning, scaly, pimply humours, eczemas, rashes, irritations, and chafings, with loss of hair, when all else fails.

The agonizing itching and burning of the skin, as in eczema; the frightful scaling, as in psoriasis; the loss of hair and crusting of the scalp, as in scalded head; the facial disfigurement, as in pimples and ringworm; the awful suffering of infants and the anxiety of worn-out parents, as in milk crust, tetter, and salt rheum, — all demand a remedy of almost superhuman virtues to successfully cope with them. Such are the CUTICURA remedies, the purest, sweetest, most speedy and economical curatives for the skin, scalp, and blood ever compounded. Mothers are their warmest friends.

Millions of Women Use Cuticura Soap

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes and chafings, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations of women, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerative weaknesses, and many sanative, antiseptic purposes which readily suggest themselves, as well as for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (Chocolate Coated) are a new, tasteless, odourless, economical substitute for the celebrated liquid CUTICURA RESOLVENT, as well as for all other blood purifiers and humour cures. Put up in screw-cap pocket vials, containing 60 doses.

CUTICURA REMEDIES are sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: R. Towns & Co., Sydney. British Depot: J. B. Charterhouse Esq., London. French Depot: 5 Rue de la Paix, Paris. FORTES DRUG AND CHEM. CO., Sole Props., Boston, U.S.A.

PROTOCOLES DE LA CONFERENCE DE PAIX ENTRE LE JAPON ET LA RUSSIE.

PROTOCOLE PRÉLIMINAIRE.

Dans la réunion du 9 Août 1905 qui a inauguré les pourparlers des Plénipotentiaires à Portsmouth, les questions suivantes ont été discutées et résolues de commun accord :

2) Un secret absolu sera gardé sur les délibérations de Leurs Excellences les Plénipotentiaires. Les déclarations à faire à la presse seront élaborées en commun.

3) Les adjoints spécialistes ne seront pas invités à prendre part aux conférences. Leurs avis seront pris par les Plénipotentiaires, à titre de consultation. Toutefois, exception pourra être faite dans le cas où les deux Parties trouveront nécessaire d'inviter tel ou autre adjoint spécialiste.

4) On est convenu de se réunir comme règle générale tous les jours à deux reprises : de 9 h.  $\frac{1}{2}$  à midi et de 3 h. à 5 h.  $\frac{1}{2}$ . Dans le cas où l'une des Parties désirerait faire un intervalle plus prolongé, un arrangement à cet effet devra être fait d'avance.

Fait en double exemplaire à Portsmouth, le 10 Août 1905.

PROTOCOLE No I.

SÉANCE DU 10 AOÛT 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 10 h. 15 du matin.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adatci et Otchiai, Secrétaires de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétaires de la Conférence.

Les Plénipotentiaires des deux Parties ont procédé à la signature du document relatif à l'accord intervenu entre eux dans la réunion du 9 Août 1905, au sujet des préliminaires de la Conférence.

Les Plénipotentiaires des deux Parties s'étant ensuite communiqué leurs pleins pouvoirs respectifs, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont attiré l'attention des Plénipotentiaires du Japon sur deux points concernant les pleins pouvoirs japonais.

1) La copie de la traduction anglaise de ces pleins pouvoirs, telle qu'elle vient d'être transmise aux Plénipotentiaires de Russie, ne porte aucune signature qui certifie leur identité et l'exactitude de la traduction.

A ce sujet, le Baron Komura a fait observer qu'il est d'usage au Japon de ne point certifier les traductions des pleins pouvoirs, mais que si les Plénipotentiaires de Russie le désiraient, lui et M. Takahira s'empresseraient de munir le document en question de leur signature afin de certifier la conformité de la traduction au texte original. Après quoi, ils ont procédé à la signature dont il s'agit.

2) Le texte d'un passage des pleins pouvoirs japonais, concernant le droit du Souverain avant de ratifier les stipulations, de les soumettre à un examen de substance et de forme différerait essentiellement du passage respectif dans les pleins pouvoirs russes.

A cet effet, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont remis aux Plénipotentiaires du Japon la note dont la copie est ci-jointe (Annexe No. I) déclarant que malgré la différence des textes, ils interpréteraient les pleins pouvoirs signés par S. M. l'Empereur de Russie dans les mêmes limites dans lesquelles sont donnés ceux présentés par les Plénipotentiaires du Japon.

Le Baron Komura déclarant à M. Witte que pleins pouvoirs japonais étaient conformes à ceux donnés dans le but de conclure des traités, quelque importants qu'ils fussent, lui a demandé si le traité que les Plénipotentiaires Russes pourraient conclure n'avait pas besoin d'obtenir la ratification impériale pour être effectif. M. Witte ayant donné une réponse affirmative, le Baron Komura a fait remarquer que jusqu'à la ratification impériale, les limites des pouvoirs des Plénipotentiaires des deux Parties sont les mêmes.

Après cet échange de vues, la question des pleins pouvoirs a été reconnue comme définitivement réglée.

Au moment d'aborder les questions essentielles, les Plénipotentiaires des deux Parties ont exprimé unanimement leur sincère désir de traiter ces questions avec une entière franchise, en passant sur les questions ne se rattachant pas directement aux conditions de paix ou concernant les détails qui ne pourraient qu'entraver la des marche des négociations, et en cherchant le mode le plus expédient pour arriver à une solution favorable.

A cet effet, il a été convenu que les Plénipotentiaires du Japon présenteraient par écrit leurs conditions de paix et que, après avoir soumis ces conditions à un examen attentif, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie présenteraient leur réponse, également par écrit.

Il a été également convenu que les conditions de paix présentées par les Plénipotentiaires Japonais étant rédigées sous forme d'articles, la Conférence après avoir reçu la réponse des Plénipotentiaires Russes, adopterait le mode de discussion article par article.

Après cela, les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont transmis aux Plénipotentiaires de Russie le texte ci-joint des conditions de paix, en langue anglaise (Annexe No II) avec une traduction française (Annexe No III), en faisant observer que cette traduction faite à la hâte, pourrait avoir quelques inexactitudes, et que le texte anglais en devait faire foi, comme il a d'ailleurs été convenu.

Pour terminer la séance, les Plénipotentiaires ont élaboré le texte ci-joint d'une communication à la presse (Annexe No IV).

Les séances ont été ajournées jusqu'au moment où la réponse russe serait prête.

La séance est levée à 11 h. 50 du matin.

(Signé) SERGE WITTE. (Signé) JUTARO KOMURA.
(Signé) ROSEN. (Signé) K. TAKAHIRA.

ANNEXE No. I.

Portsmouth, le 28 juillet/10 août, 1905.

Les soussignés, Plénipotentiaires de S. M. l'Empereur de toutes les Russies ont l'honneur de signaler à la sérieuse attention de Leurs Excellences les Plénipotentiaires de S. M. l'Empereur du Japon ce qui suit.

L'examen attentif des pleins pouvoirs de Leurs Excellences les Plénipotentiaires de S. M. l'Empereur du Japon a constaté une différence importante dans cet acte en le comparant avec les pleins pouvoirs signés par S. M. l'Empereur de Russie.

En vertu du texte de ce dernier document S. M. l'Empereur de Russie promet par Sa parole Impériale d'approuver et de confirmer tout ce que les Plénipotentiaires auront stipulé ou signé.

Tandis que dans la traduction anglaise des pleins pouvoirs des Plénipotentiaires du Japon il est dit "We shall examine all stipulations which our said Plenipotentiaries may agree upon, and finding such stipulations proper and in good and due form, we shall ratify them."

Vu cette importante différence dans le texte des pleins pouvoirs respectifs, les soussignés se voient obligés de déclarer à Leurs Excellences les Plénipotentiaires du Japon qu'ils interprètent les pleins pouvoirs signés par S. M. l'Empereur, leur Auguste Maître, dans les mêmes limites dans lesquelles sont donnés ceux présentés par les Plénipotentiaires du Japon.

(Signé) SERGE WITTE.
(Signé) ROSEN.

A Leurs Excellences
les Plénipotentiaires du Japon.

ANNEXE No. II.

1. Russia, acknowledging that Japan possesses in Corea paramount political, military and economical interests, to engage not to obstruct or interfere with any measures of guidance, protection and control which Japan finds it necessary to take in Corea.

2. Engagement on the part of Russia to completely evacuate Manchuria within a period to be specified and to relinquish all territorial advantages and all preferential and exclusive concessions and franchises in that region in impairment of Chinese sovereignty or inconsistent with the principle of equal opportunity.

3. Japan to engage to restore to China, subject to the guarantee of reform and improved administration, all those portions of Manchuria which are in her occupation, saving only the regions affected by the lease of the Liao-tung Peninsula.

4. Japan and Russia reciprocally to engage not to obstruct any general measures common to all countries, which China may take for the development of the commerce and industries in Manchuria.

5. Saghalien and all islands appertaining thereto and all public works and properties to be ceded to Japan.

6. The lease of Port Arthur, Talien and adjacent territory and territorial waters together with all rights, privileges, concessions and franchises acquired by Russia from China, in connection with or as a part of such lease and all public works and properties to be transferred and assigned to Japan.

7. Russia to assign and transfer to Japan free of all claims and encumbrances, the railway between Harbin and Port Arthur and all its branches together with all rights, privileges and properties appertaining thereto, and all coal mines belonging to or worked for the benefit of the railway.

8. Russia to retain and work the Trans-Manchurian railway, subject to the terms and conditions of the concession under which it was constructed, and subject also to the condition that it is to be employed exclusively for commercial and industrial purposes.

9. Russia to reimburse to Japan the actual expenses of the war. The amount as well as the time and manner of such reimbursement to be agreed upon.

10. All Russian ships of war which, in consequence of damage received in battle, sought asylum in neutral ports and were there interned, to be surrendered to Japan as lawful prizes.

11. Russia to engage to limit her naval strength in the waters of the Extreme East.

12. Russia to grant to Japanese subjects full fishery rights along the coasts and in the bays, harbours, inlets and rivers of her possessions in the Japan, Okhotsk and Behring Seas.

ANNEXE No. IV.

Dans la séance du 10 Août 1905, la question des pleins pouvoirs a été réglée de sorte qu'il n'y a plus de difficultés à ce sujet. Après cela les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont transmis aux Plénipotentiaires de Russie les conditions de paix par écrit. Il a été décidé que les Plénipotentiaires de Russie se mettront sans retard à l'étude de ce document et donneront au plus vite une réponse par écrit. Jusque là les séances de la Conférence seront ajournées.

PROTOCOLE No. II.

Séance du 12 Août 1905,

La séance est ouverte à 9 h. 45 a.m.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adatci et Otchiai, Secrétaires de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Baron Rosen, assistés de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétaires de la Conférence.

Les Plénipotentiaires ont procédé à la signature du Protocole de la séance précédente du 10 Août.

M. Witte a transmis ensuite à M. le Baron Komura la réponse des Plénipotentiaires de Russie aux conditions de paix présentées par les Plénipotentiaires du Japon à la séance précédente.

Ci-joint copie de cette réponse en langue française (Annexe No. I).

Sur la demande des Plénipotentiaires du Japon, il a été décidé d'interrompre la séance et de la reprendre quand les Plénipotentiaires du Japon auront notifié aux Plénipotentiaires de Russie qu'ils avaient pris connaissance du document russe et qu'ils étaient prêts à procéder à la discussion des conditions de paix article par article.

Le Baron Komura ayant attiré l'attention de M. Witte sur certains articles de journaux concernant les négociations de la Conférence, M. Witte a répondu que le seul moyen d'éviter ces malentendus serait de publier tout ce qui se passe à la Conférence. On s'est engagé mutuellement à faire à l'avenir plus d'attention à l'égard de correspondances des journaux.

On a élaboré le texte d'une communication à la presse (No. II).

La séance s'est terminée à 10 heures ½ du matin.

A trois heures, la séance est réouverte sur l'invitation des Plénipotentiaires du Japon.

En procédant à la délibération sur l'article premier des conditions de paix, le Baron Komura a transmis à M. Witte une nouvelle rédaction de cet article en langue anglaise (Annexe No. III.)

Après en avoir pris connaissance, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont attiré l'attention des Plénipotentiaires du Japon sur les points suivants :

1° Dans le projet russe, il y avait une clause spéciale disant que les mesures que le Japon prendrait en Corée ne devaient pas porter atteinte aux droits souverains de l'Empereur de Corée. Dans la nouvelle rédaction japonaise de l'Article I, cette clause se trouve omise. Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont fait remarquer à ce sujet qu'il était indispensable, au point de vue international, de maintenir cette clause dans le traité, que ce n'était qu'une question de principe et de forme, que la Russie n'avait aucune intention d'empêcher les mesures japonaises en Corée, mais qu'elle ne pourrait à elle seule signer l'annéantissement de la souveraineté de ce pays, car cela pourrait donner lieu à des protestations de la part d'autres Puissances également intéressées au sort de la Corée, et qu'il serait très imprudent de la part du Japon comme de la part de la Russie de ne pas insérer la clause en question.

Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont répondu que de leur côté ils ne pouvaient, au contraire, admettre dans le traité l'existence d'une telle clause, puisque de fait cette indépendance n'existait plus dans toute sa plénitude.

Après avoir échangé leurs opinions à ce sujet, les Plénipotentiaires ont décidé de ne pas mentionner du tout dans l'Article I la question de la souveraineté de l'Empereur de Corée, mais d'insérer dans de Protocole la décision suivante : "Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon déclarent qu'il est entendu que les mesures que le Japon peut trouver nécessaire de prendre en Corée à l'avenir et qui portent atteinte à la souveraineté de ce pays seront prises d'accord avec le Gouvernement de Corée."

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie, reconnaissant la justesse de cette réciprocité, ont consenti à l'extension de la clause dont il s'agit, mais ils ont ajouté que la Russie ne pourrait pas être tenue à démanteler les fortifications d'un caractère permanent ayant déjà existé sur la frontière avant la guerre. Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont fait remarquer que la clause susmentionnée ne concernait que des fortifications d'une nature provisoire que les deux Parties auraient construites depuis l'ouverture des hostilités et d'autres militaires qu'elles pourraient prendre à l'avenir. Les Plénipotentiaires des deux Parties sont tombés d'accord pour régler la question dans le sens indiqué ci-dessus.

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont ensuite fait remarquer que la rédaction d'un autre passage du premier Article ne leur paraissait pas assez claire. Le rédaction russe du passage en question était : "La Russie et les sujets russes jouiront en Corée de tous les droits qui appartiennent ou appartiendront aux autres Puissances étrangères et à leurs ressortissants." Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont ajouté en tête de cette phrase les mots suivants : "subject to the above engagement." D'après les Plénipotentiaires Russes, l'insertion de ces mots pourrait signifier que la Russie et les Russes ne jouiraient pas en Corée de tous les droits qui y appartiennent aux autres Puissances et à leurs ressortissants, mais seulement d'une partie de ces droits, limitée par l'engagement précédent.

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ne sauraient donc admettre une pareille rédaction qui, selon eux, mettrait les sujets russes en Corée dans une situation moins favorable que les ressortissants des autres pays.

M. le Baron Komura a fait observer que le Japon n'avait aucune intention d'éliminer les sujets russes des traitements accordés aux ressortissants d'autres Puissances, mais que pour rendre plus claire la stipulation du début de l'Article, il était indispensable d'ajouter les mots en question, et que le résultat serait que les sujets russes jouiront en Corée des mêmes droits que les ressortissants d'autres Puissances. Après une délibération prolongée, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont promis de présenter à la séance prochaine une nouvelle rédaction qui rendrait exactement l'idée de M. le Baron Komura.

On a arrêté d'une communication à la presse (Annexe No. IV).

La séance a été terminée à 6 h. ½.

ANNEXE No. I.

1 Le premier article ne soulève pas d'objection. Le Gouvernement Impérial, reconnaissant que le Japon possède en Corée des intérêts prépondérants politiques, militaires et économiques, est prêt à s'engager à ne point obstruer ni intervenir en ce qui concerne les mesures de direction, de protection et de contrôle que le Japon considérera nécessaire de prendre en Corée. Il va sans dire que la Russie et les sujets russes jouiront de tous les droits qui appartiennent ou appartiendront aux autres Puissances Etrangères et à leurs ressortissants. Il est également entendu que la mise en vigueur par le Japon des mesures susmentionnées ne portera pas atteinte aux droits souverains de l'Empereur de Corée. En ce qui concerne particulièrement les mesures militaires, le Japon, dans le but d'éloigner toute cause de malentendu, s'abstiendra de prendre des mesures qui pourraient menacer la sécurité du territoire russe limitrophe de la Corée.

2 Le Gouvernement Impérial est prêt à accepter la première partie de cet article, et est disposé à faire évacuer par ses troupes la Manchourie simultanément avec l'évacuation des troupes japonaises ; les détails et termes d'évacuation pourraient être arrêtés ultérieurement. Quant à la dernière partie de cet article, le Gouvernement Impérial est prêt à déclarer qu'il n'a aucune prétention à des privilèges territoriaux, concessions ou facilités exclusives que seraient de nature à menacer les droits souverains de l'Empire de Chine et qui seraient incompatibles avec le principe d'égalité de droits. Le Gouvernement Impérial est disposé à donner à cet effet les garanties nécessaires. Ce principe de fond une fois établi, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie proposent aux Plénipotentiaires du Japon de préciser le desir du Gouvernement du Japon concernant cette partie de l'article 2 et ils déclarent que la Gouvernement Impérial est disposé à éliminer tout ce qui pourrait porter préjudice aux intérêts du Japon ou des autres Puissances. La seule entreprise privée russe en Manchourie ayant un caractère public est le chemin de fer de l'Est Chinois ; l'examen des questions se rattachant à ce chemin de fer se trouve du reste spécialement traité dans d'autres articles.

3 Le Gouvernement Impérial est prêt à accepter cet article, mais il va sans dire que la Russie et les sujets russes conserveront dans ces parties de la Manchourie tous les droits qui y appartiennent ou appartiendront aux autres Puissances Etrangères et à leurs ressortissants. Pour ce qui est des régions sur lesquelles s'étend le bail de la presqu'île de Liaotong, la Russie est disposée à céder au Japon ses droits aux régions dont il s'agit. Cependant, vu les droits souverains de la Chine à ces régions et les traites passés à cet effet avec le Gouvernement de Chine, une pareille cession ne pourrait se faire autrement qu'en vertu d'une entente avec cette dernière.

4 En accédant entièrement aux principes émis dans cet article, le Gouvernement Impérial déclare que si cette stipulation n'avait pas été insérée dans les conditions proposées par le Japon, la Russie se ferait un devoir de la proposer elle-même.

5 Les anciens droits de la Russie à l'île de Sakhaline existaient déjà à une époque où le Japon ne possédait, ou du moins n'exerçait, aucuns droits de propriété sur la majeure partie de cette île. D'un autre côté, Sakhaline n'est que la continuation naturelle des possessions russes en Asie, vu que cette île est séparée du continent par un détroit d'une très petite profondeur et d'une largeur de 7 verstes. En vertu de ces considérations la Russie ne saurait consentir à une cession de cette île, mais elle est en même temps toute disposée à reconnaître au Japon le droit d'exploiter largement les pêcheries maritimes et autres entreprises commerciales dans cette île. Les conditions d'une pareille exploitation pourraient faire l'objet d'un arrangement spécial.

6 Le Gouvernement Impérial n'aurait pas d'objections à cet article, mais vu les droits souverains de la Chine aux territoires énumérés, la Russie ne pourrait céder ses droits au Japon sans un accord préalable avec la Chine. Il va sans dire que les droits des particuliers dans toute la région sur laquelle s'étend le bail conclu entre la Russie et la Chine, devront rester intacts.

8 Cet article ne soulèvera pas d'objections. La Compagnie du Chemin de fer se conformera strictement—en ce qui concerne l'exploitation de la ligne magistrale de la Manchourie ainsi que du tronçon de la branche sud-manchourienne qui restera en sa possession—aux termes de l'acte de la concession du 27 Août (8 Septembre) dont le § 8 stipule que les troupes ainsi que le matériel de guerre russe qui seraient transportés sur la ligne, ne doivent pas subir d'arrêts sur le territoire chinois.

9 La Russie ne saurait consentir aux stipulations de cet article. Seuls les pays vaincus remboursent les frais de guerre, mais la Russie n'est pas vaincue. Un pays ne saurait se reconnaître comme tel, alors que son territoire a été à peine attaqué par l'ennemi. Quand même le Japon se serait emparé de toute la Province Maritime de l'Amour, les forces vitales de la Russie ne s'en trouveraient nullement atteintes et elle continuerait la lutte. Dans le cas seulement où les Armées Japonaises victorieuses envahiraient l'intérieur de la Russie l'annexion pourrait comprendre qu'on soulèverait des questions de remboursement de frais de guerre. Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon sur le fait que même au Congrès de Paris qui a eu lieu après la prise de Sébastopol, les alliés n'ont pas cru possible de soulever la question d'un remboursement de frais de guerre. Ceux-ci ne sont remboursés que par les pays qui n'ont plus de moyens de continuer la guerre, ce qui n'est en aucune façon le cas de la Russie.

Mais tout en refusant de rembourser les frais de guerre, le Gouvernement Imperial reconnaitra équitable d'indemniser le Japon de celles des dépenses qu'il aurait effectuées non pas pour la guerre elle-même et au préjudice de la Russie, mais pour le bien de ceux des Russes qui ont souffert par le fait de la guerre. Telles sont les dépenses pour l'entretien des prisonniers de guerre, pour le soin des malades et autres.

10. La Russie ne saurait consentir à cette demande. Il paraît qu'il est difficile de trouver dans la pratique de relations internationales des précédents qui pourraient servir à l'appui d'une pareille exigence. En outre, cette demande ne s'accorde guère avec les intentions pacifiques qui devraient animer les deux Parties négociantes. Les avantages matériels qui seraient acquis par le Japon si les navires russes se trouvant dans des ports neutres lui étaient remis, seraient comparativement minimes. Mais le consentement à une pareille clause serait incompatible avec la dignité de la Russie.

11. La Russie ne saurait consentir à un pareil engagement imposé par une Puissance Etrangère, car ce serait également incompatible avec sa dignité. Le Gouvernement Imperial se croit cependant à même de pouvoir déclarer qu'il n'entre pas dans ses vues, dans un avenir proche, d'entretenir dans les eaux du Pacifique des forces navales considérables.

12. La Russie serait prête à s'entendre avec le Japon pour concéder aux sujets japonais des droits de pêche sur les côtes des Mers du Japon, d'Okhotsk et de Behring. Ces droits ne pourraient cependant s'étendre que sur les côtes des mers elles-mêmes, sans toucher aux anses et fleuves. Il va sans dire que les droits déjà appartenants dans cette région à des sujets russes ou étrangers devraient rester en vigueur.

ANNEXE No. II.

In the sitting of Saturday morning this August 12, Their Excellencies Plenipotentiaries of Russia have handed their reply in writing to the note presented the day before yesterday by Their Excellencies Plenipotentiaries of Japan. It has been decided that the next Conference meet when Their Excellencies Plenipotentiaries of Japan notified that they have studied the document and are ready to continue the deliberation which will be held to-day at 3 o'clock or to-morrow afternoon same hour.

ANNEXE No. III.

1. The Imperial Russian Government, recognizing that Japan possesses in Corea paramount political, military and economical interests, is ready to engage neither to obstruct nor interfere with the measures of guidance, protection and control which Japan will consider necessary to take in Corea. It is a matter of course that, subject to the above engagement, Russia and Russian subjects will enjoy all rights that belong to any other Powers and their subjects or citizens. It is further understood that in order to remove all causes of misunderstanding Japan and Russia will mutually abstain from taking the measures on the Russo-Corean frontier, which might menace the security of Russian or Korean territory.

ANNEXE No. IV.

Les Plenipotentiaires Japonais ayant étudié la réponse russe à leurs Conditions de paix, la Conférence s'est réunie de nouveau à 3 h. de l'après-midi pour procéder à leur discussion article par article. La séance a été levée à 7 heures. Demain, étant dimanche, il n'y aura pas de séance matinale, et les Plenipotentiaires se réuniront à 3 heures de l'après-midi pour continuer leurs délibérations.

PROTOCOLE No. III.

SÉANCE DU 14 AOUT 1905.

La séance a été ouverte à 10 heures du matin. Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adachi et Otchiai, Secrétares de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plancon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétares de la Conférence.

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont présenté le texte du premier Article rédigé en conformité des principes émis au cours des discussions qui ont eu lieu à ce sujet à la séance précédente (Annexe No. I).

Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon n'ayant trouvé aucune objection à cette rédaction, le texte du premier Article a été reconnu comme définitivement fixé.

Les Plenipotentiaires ont procédé à l'examen du deuxième Article dont un projet a été présenté par le Baron Komura (Annexe No. II).

Après avoir pris connaissance de ce document, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont fait remarquer qu'en stipulant les engagements de la Russie, ce projet ne disait rien des engagements du Japon et que dans le but de maintenir dans cette question une entière réciprocité, il fallait étendre les mêmes engagements sur le Japon et dire que la Russie et le Japon s'engagent mutuellement &c.

Le Baron Komura a répondu que les engagements du Japon se trouvaient déjà stipulés dans l'Article III et que l'Article présent ne concernait que la Russie.

M. Witte a fait remarquer qu'il n'avait pas d'objection à consigner les obligations des deux Parties dans deux articles différents, mais que dans ce dernier cas les obligations des deux côtes devraient être rédigées identiquement. Il a ajouté qu'à son avis il était préférable de combiner les deux engagements dans un seul article.

Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont accédé à cet avis. Ils ont proposé d'omettre entièrement l'Article III, et de réunir les engagements du Japon qu'il contenait avec ceux de la Russie faisant l'objet du second Article.

Cette proposition a été unanimement adoptée par la Conférence et la première partie du deuxième Article a été définitivement arrêtée comme suit :

"Le Japon et la Russie s'engagent mutuellement : 1° à évacuer complètement et simultanément la Manchourie, l'exception du territoire sur lequel s'étend le bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung, conformément aux dispositions d'un article additionnel ; 2° à restituer entièrement et complètement à l'administration exclusive de la Chine toutes les parties de la Manchourie qui sont occupées maintenant par les troupes russes ou japonaises ou qui sont sous leur contrôle, à l'exception du territoire susmentionné."

Continuant l'étude du deuxième Article, les Plenipotentiaires ont échangé leurs opinions sur le passage du projet concernant l'engagement de la Russie de n'emettre ni d'appuyer à l'avenir aucune prétention à des privilèges &c. en Manchourie qui porterait atteinte à la souveraineté de la Chine ou qui serait incompatible avec le principe d'opportunité égale.

M. Witte a développé à ce sujet les idées suivantes :

1° Il tenait à préciser que tout droit acquis en conformité des lois, dans des limites déterminées, et sans restriction à d'autre d'acquiescer pareils bénéfices, ne peut être considéré comme privilège ou monopole, mais doit être reconnu comme droit légal et indiscutable. La Russie n'a jamais fait de restriction ni aux sujets russes ni aux étrangers d'acquiescer pareils droits en Manchourie et elle tient à ce que tous les droits qui existent déjà à ce titre soient maintenus. Mais la Russie n'a jamais émis, appuyé ou sanctionné des droits exclusifs qui reparaissent à l'idée de monopole ou de privilège et qui porteraient atteinte à la souveraineté de la Chine.

Le Baron Komura a fait remarquer que certains engagements passés entre les Tsian-Tsuns de Manchourie et des autorités russes concernant, par exemple, l'exploitation de mines dans la province de Girin portaient le caractère de monopole ou de privilège exclusif incompatible avec le principe précité. Il a signalé en outre que le Gouvernement Russe exerçait dans certains endroits—à Harbine par exemple—sur un terrain beaucoup plus étendu qu'il ne fût nécessaire pour l'exploitation du chemin de fer, une autorité administrative, de sorte que les sujets japonais s'y trouvaient à la merci du Gouvernement Russe ne pouvant jouir des droits qu'ils possédaient en vertu du traité entre le Japon et la Chine.

M. Witte a répondu qu'il ne connaissait pas d'engagements ou concessions de mines qui auraient le caractère de monopole ou de privilège exclusif, et que s'il existait réellement de pareils engagements ou concessions, ils n'étaient que des actes des agents russes dépourvus de la sanction impériale et qu'ils devraient et seraient annulés. En ce qui concerne l'état de choses à Harbine, il a déclaré que la seule autorité exercée par la Russie à Harbine était celle du propriétaire dans son bien acquis légalement et de police—ce qui était aussi stipulé par la concession. Il a ajouté que par ces actes les droits publics, tels que le droit de juridiction des étrangers n'étaient nullement atteints. Quant à la concession du chemin de fer de l'Est Chinois, elle a été accordée par la Chine elle-même en vertu d'un traité et aucun paragraphe de cette concession ne contient d'infraction aux droits de toute autre personne ou compagnie d'acquiescer les mêmes droits en Manchourie.

2° M. Witte a déclaré en outre que les Plenipotentiaires de Russie n'auraient pas d'objections à constater dans l'article en question l'état actuel de choses, à savoir que pour le moment il n'y a pas de concessions ou monopoles en Manchourie, mais que la Russie ne pouvait prendre aucun engagement à ce sujet pour l'avenir, à moins que cet engagement ne fut mutuel pour la Russie et le Japon.

Après cet échange de vues, les Plenipotentiaires ont décidé sur la proposition du Baron Komura de terminer l'Article II par la déclaration suivante :

"Le Gouvernement Imperial de Russie déclare qu'il n'a point en Manchourie d'avantages territoriaux ou concessions ou franchises préférentielles ou exclusives de nature à porter atteinte à la souveraineté de la Chine ou incompatibles avec le principe d'opportunité égale."

Quant à la concession du chemin de fer de l'Est Chinois, les Plenipotentiaires ont décidé de ne pas en faire mention dans l'Article II, vu que cette question est traitée spécialement dans d'autres articles, mais d'enregistrer dans le Protocole la clause suivante :

"Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon et de Russie, dans le but d'éviter toute cause de malentendu à l'avenir, déclarent que la concession de la construction et de l'exploitation du chemin de fer de l'Est Chinois en Manchourie n'est pas incompatible avec le principe de la porte ouverte et du traitement égal, et que dans les limites du terrain acquis en vertu de cette concession les sujets de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon ainsi que les ressortissants d'autres Puissances étrangères jouiront des mêmes droits et privilèges que ceux de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de Russie."

Il a été également convenu que la même clause serait insérée dans le protocole de la séance qui aurait pour objet la ligne de chemin de fer Sud-Manchourienne.

Les discussions terminées, le texte du deuxième Article a été reconnu définitivement arrêté.

Après avoir rédigé un communiqué à la presse (Annex No. III), la Conférence a été terminée à 6 h. du soir.

ANNEXE No. I.

(ENGLISH TEXT)

The Imperial Russian Government, acknowledging that Japan possesses in Corea paramount political interests, engage neither to obstruct nor interfere with the measures of guidance, protection and control which Japan will find it necessary to take in Corea. It is understood that Russian subjects in Corea shall be treated exactly in the same manner as the subjects or citizens of other foreign Powers, that is to say, they shall be placed on the same footing as the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nation. It is also agreed that, in order to avoid all cause of misunderstanding, Japan and Russia will abstain, on the Russo-Corean frontier, from taking any military measure which may menace the security of Russian or Korean territory.

ANNEXE No. II.

(ENGLISH TEXT)

2. Taking note of the acceptance by the Plenipotentiaries of Russia of the first part of Article 2 and having regard to their declaration concerning the remaining portions of the same Article, the Plenipotentiaries of Japan propose to modify the stipulation in the following sense :

The Imperial Russian Government engage completely to evacuate Manchuria simultaneously with Japan in accordance with the provisions of the separate Article annexed to the Treaty of Peace. The Imperial Russian Government also engage fully and completely to restore to the exclusive administration of China all portions of Manchuria which are in their occupation or under their control and they declare that they have not now, and that they will not hereafter advance or support, any claim to any territorial advantages or preferential or exclusive concessions or franchises in Manchuria in impairment of Chinese sovereignty or inconsistent with the principle of equal opportunity.

The Plenipotentiaries of Japan deem it essential to fix definitely by means of a separate Article, the details and terms of simultaneous evacuation. The Plenipotentiaries of Japan were under the impression that Russia and Russian subjects possessed several concessions and franchises in Manchuria which trench upon the sovereignty of China or disregard the principle of equal opportunity. The sole desire of the Imperial Government is to fully restore Chinese sovereignty and administration in that region and to revive the principle of equal treatment for all.

The questions connected with the Eastern Chinese Railway will be considered under Articles VII and VIII.

ANNEXE No. III.

Dans la séance du matin du 14 Août, le texte de l'Article I a été définitivement arrêté. Dans la séance de l'après-midi, les Articles II et III ont été discutés et arrêtés, et à 6 heures la séance a été levée.

PROTOCOLE No. IV.

SEANCE DU 15 AOUT 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 10 h. du matin.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adatci et Otchiai, Secrétares de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétares de la Conférence.

Les Plenipotentiaries ont procédé à la discussion de l'Article IV, concernant l'engagement de la Russie et du Japon de ne pas obstruer les mesures que la Chine pourra prendre pour le développement du commerce et de l'industrie en Manchourie.

Prenant acte de l'assentiment de la Russie à cet Article, les Plenipotentiaries du Japon ont exprimé leur satisfaction à ce sujet.

Le Baron Komura, signalant ensuite le fait que, lorsque le Japon, au cours de la négociation d'un nouveau traité sino-japonais à la suite de l'arrangement général intervenu après les désordres des boxeurs en 1900, a demandé à la Chine d'ouvrir quelques endroits en Manchourie au commerce étranger, la Russie a présenté une objection, qui, quoique retirée plus tard, restait toujours pour les villes le long du chemin de fer—à exprimer, dans le but d'éviter tout malentendu à l'avenir, le désir de s'assurer des intentions de la Russie relativement à des ports et endroits ouverts ou à être ouverts au commerce étranger en Manchourie. M. Witte a répondu que ces faits se rapportaient à une époque où la Manchourie, était dans un état de trouble et se rattachaient seulement à quelques stations de chemin de fer. Il a ajouté que la Russie s'engageait à ne point s'opposer à l'ouverture de n'importe quels ports et endroits en Manchourie au commerce étranger, mais que ce serait à condition que cet engagement fût réciproque et comprît la région de Liaotung.

Le Baron Komura a accepté cette manière de voir et a déclaré que le Japon n'aurait pas d'objection à maintenir le port de Dalny ouvert au commerce étranger dans les mêmes conditions qu'il l'a été lors de l'administration russe.

Les Plenipotentiaries étant tombés d'accord sur les points ci-dessus, l'Article IV. a été reconnu comme définitivement arrêté (Annexe No. I).

La Conférence a procédé ensuite à la discussion de l'Article V., concernant l'île de Sakhaline.

Les Plenipotentiaries du Japon ont présenté un mémoire en langue anglaise avec traduction française (Annexes Nos. II et III) qui énuméreraient les raisons pour lesquelles ils ne pouvaient partager les vues et conclusions à ce sujet des Plenipotentiaries de Russie.

Ayant pris connaissance de ce document, les Plenipotentiaries de Russie ont déclaré qu'ils se voyaient néanmoins l'impossibilité de changer l'opinion exprimée dans leur réponse à l'Article V ; ils ont ajouté que la Russie se rendait bien compte de la situation actuelle en Extrême Orient, mais qu'elle ne pouvait envisager la prise de Sakhaline autrement que comme un acte de fait et non de droit.

Sur l'invitation du Baron Komura d'exposer les motifs de ce point de vue, M. Witte a dit :

La Russie est prête à faire toutes les concessions qui sont compatibles avec sa dignité nationale ; la preuve en est toutes les concessions déjà faites à cette même Conférence dans des questions d'une bien plus grande importance matérielle, mais ne touchant pas à la dignité de la Russie. Mais la cession d'un territoire qui a été acquis de plein droit, en vertu d'un traité reconnu par le Japon et par l'univers entier, territoire qui a fait partie de l'Empire pendant une période de plus de 30 ans serait un acte, auquel la Russie, dans l'état actuel des choses, ne se voit pas réduite à consentir.

Vu un grand nombre de précédents historiques de cessions territoriales par des grandes Puissances, il ne pourrait y avoir aucune question de susceptible nationale dans le cas présent. La Russie qui a souvent demandé des cessions territoriales maintient pourtant de bons rapports avec les pays voisins. Il est d'ailleurs nécessaire de régler ici cette question, pour ne pas pousser les choses à l'extrême. La possession de Sakhaline est pour le Japon une question essentiellement vitale et de sécurité nationale, tandis qu'elle n'est pour la Russie qu'une question d'intérêts ayant peu de rapport avec les parties vitales de la Russie.

Depuis près de 250 ans, lorsqu'il n'y avait encore point de russes dans ces parages, le Japon exerçait déjà son droit sur certaines parties de l'île. En 1624, les premiers officiers japonais ont occupé l'île, et ce n'est qu'en 1803 que les russes l'ont visitée ; ils n'ont occupé l'Amour et Sakhaline qu'en 1850. Les négociations entre le Japon et la Russie commencées en 1851 et terminées par le traité de 1875 ont créé, il est vrai, un titre de droit en faveur de la Russie. Mais le sentiment populaire au Japon ne reconnaît pas l'équité de cette transaction et a toujours envisagé les actes de la Russie par rapport à Sakhaline comme agressifs et comme cas de force majeure. Au point de vue géographique, Sakhaline est la continuation de la chaîne des îles japonaises ; au point de vue stratégique, sa possession est indispensable pour sauvegarder la sécurité du Japon.

M. Witte a dit : "Voici les faits historiques tels qu'ils ressortent de documents indiscutables. Jusqu'en 1875 le Japon n'avait à Sakhaline que quelques pêcheries dans l'extrême Sud, peu nombreuses et éparses. Quant à la partie Nord de l'île, elle était à peu près inconnue et n'appartenait à personne.

"Le premier titre de possession a été créé par le traité de 1875, en vertu duquel le Japon a reconnu les droits de la Russie à Sakhaline en échange des îles Kouriles. Au point de vue économique, je reconnais sa grande importance pour le Japon et c'est là, à mon avis, la principale raison pour laquelle le peuple japonais tient à la possession de l'île. C'est pour cela aussi que nous sommes disposés à faire au Japon toutes les concessions possibles surtout pour les pêcheries ; mais la jouissance de ces pêcheries n'exige pas une possession politique de l'île. A ce point de vue, je me réfère à une phrase que le Baron Komura a prononcée tout à l'heure, il a dit qu'en 1850, quand les russes s'étaient rendus maîtres du territoire de l'Amour, ils ont aussi pris possession de Sakhaline. Cela prouve que, déjà à cette époque, la possession de Sakhaline était reconnue indispensable pour la sécurité de la région de l'Amour. La guerre actuelle a suffisamment démontré que la Russie n'a jamais eu l'intention de faire de Sakhaline une base d'agression contre le Japon, mais elle a pour nous une grande valeur défensive ; c'est une sentinelle à notre porte, et c'est peut-être cela qui tente le Japon ; il voudrait être cette sentinelle à la porte du voisin. Si l'on envisage la question au point de vue de la stabilité de la paix à laquelle nous travaillons ici, j'affirme qu'elle le sera bien davantage si Sakhaline reste dans la possession de la Russie que si elle passe au Japon. L'histoire nous démontre que l'annexion de territoires après les guerres entre voisins créait toujours des rancunes prolongées. L'annexion de l'Alsace et de la Lorraine par l'Allemagne en 1871, reste jusqu'à présent la principale source de discord entre les deux peuples voisins. Au contraire, en 1866 l'Allemagne, sur les instances du Prince Bismarck s'est abstenue d'annexer aucune partie de l'Autriche—et le résultat de cette sagesse a été une alliance qui dure jusqu'à aujourd'hui. Le sentiment national russe ne pourrait admettre la perte d'un territoire qui a été longtemps dans la possession légale et paisible de la Russie ; un événement pareil créerait dans tout le pays un sentiment unanime de mécontentement, peu favorable à l'œuvre de pacification de l'Extrême Orient qui est l'objet de nos plus ardens desirs."

Le Baron Komura revenant sur la question des droits historiques du Japon, a cité le fait de la découverte en 1800 d'un détroit par un japonais Mamiya dont le nom lui fut donné, et a affirmé que déjà en 1803 le Gouvernement japonais s'occupait de l'île, quoique, faute de communication convenable, son action ne pût s'exercer d'une manière très efficace. En 1853, il commençait à administrer activement cette île, de sorte que sa prise de possession par la Russie soit par l'occupation soit par la diplomatie a été toujours regardée par les japonais comme un acte d'agression. Le peuple japonais, conscient de son droit historique sur l'île, est invariablement pénétré de profonds sentiments qui sont vivifiés à un suprême degré par sa récente occupation.

Pour ce qui est de la remarque de M. Witte que "la guerre actuelle a suffisamment démontré que la Russie n'a jamais eu l'intention de faire de Sakhaline une base d'agression contre le Japon," le Baron Komura lui a fait observer que, si le théâtre principal de la guerre présente était dans les Provinces Maritimes et d'Amour, au lieu de la Manchourie, Sakhaline aurait certainement servi à la Russie comme une base importante.

Faisant ensuite allusion aux germes de discord entre les deux pays invoqués par M. Witte, le Baron Komura a fait remarquer que des discordes futures ne pourraient exister que dans le cas où des cessions territoriales manqueraient de base raisonnable, ce qui n'est pas du tout le cas de la cession de Sakhaline. D'ailleurs la Russie est seulement invitée à reconnaître un fait accompli. Le Gouvernement japonais serait disposé à donner à la Russie des garanties sérieuses pour assurer la sécurité des possessions de l'Amour contre toute agression du côté de Sakhaline, si le Japon devenait maître de cette île. Le Baron Komura a exprimé de plus l'espoir que les raisons développées ci-dessus seraient considérées comme suffisantes par les Plenipotentiaries de Russie, et qu'il ne serait pas obligé d'invoquer d'autres arguments basés sur le droit de guerre.

M. Witte a répondu qu'il ne voyait pas de raison pour changer son avis. Les droits historiques du Japon lui paraissaient peu fondés. Il ignorait le fait de la découverte du détroit par un japonais, mais ce fait ne change pas la situation. Bien longtemps après cette découverte, personne au Japon ne songeait à Sakhaline. Ce n'est que la prise de possession de cette île par Mouraviev qui a attiré l'attention des japonais en leur donnant pour la première fois l'idée que Sakhaline devait avoir quelque importance puisque les russes ont trouvé utile de l'annexer. Par conséquent, le sentiment populaire au Japon ne peut être basé sur un regret de n'avoir pas annexé l'île quand c'était possible. "Chez nous, le sentiment populaire est donc bien plus sérieux et il nous est impossible de le reconnaître si nous voulons arriver à une paix solide." Pour ce qui est de l'occupation de l'île par les japonais à la veille de la Conférence, ce n'est qu'un acte de guerre qui ne crée pas encore un titre de possession légale.

Le Baron Komura a demandé aux Plénipotentiaires de Russie de reconsidérer cette question dans un esprit de conciliation, en resumant les principaux arguments suivants :

1. Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ne méconnaissent nullement le sentiment du peuple russe ; mais le sentiment de la nation japonaise existant toujours depuis un demi siècle, vient d'être vivifié à un suprême degré à la suite de l'occupation actuelle de l'île.

2. Quoique la possession de Sakhaline puisse être importante aussi bien pour l'un que pour l'autre des deux pays, il existe une grande différence entre les deux cas. Pour la Russie, elle n'est qu'une question d'intérêt, tandis qu'elle est pour le Japon une question de sécurité nationale.

3. Comme la possession de Sakhaline par le Japon n'a pour but que la défense du pays, elle ne peut être ni une menace contre la Russie ni un danger pour la paix de l'Extrême Orient.

4. La Russie a deux moyens, soit reconnaître tacitement l'occupation japonaise, en la laissant sans rien faire ; soit s'entendre avec le Japon au sujet de la disposition de Sakhaline.

5. Il est avantageux, pour les relations amicales des deux pays à l'avenir, de résoudre à présent d'une manière satisfaisante cette question d'un commun accord.

M. Witte a dit qu'il avait déjà suffisamment répondu à tous ces arguments du Baron Komura et qu'il n'avait pas à revenir sur eux.

Les explications des Plénipotentiaires de Russie au sujet de ces arguments peuvent être resumées comme suit :

1. Le sentiment populaire en Russie est bien plus sérieux que celui du peuple japonais, car il est basé non pas sur un regret de n'avoir pas pris possession d'un territoire voisin quand c'était possible, mais sur le regret de perdre une partie intégrale de l'Empire de Russie.

2. La possession de Sakhaline n'est pas seulement une question d'intérêt pour la Russie, mais surtout une question de sécurité nationale, car cette île par sa situation géographique même, protège l'accès à la Province de l'Amour.

3. La possession de Sakhaline par la Russie a bien démontré que cette île n'a jamais été, et ne peut être ni une menace contre le Japon ni un danger pour la paix de l'Extrême Orient.

4. La Russie n'a qu'un seul moyen d'agir en vue de l'occupation de Sakhaline par le Japon, celui de ne pas reconnaître cette occupation pour un acte de droit, et de laisser à l'histoire le temps de prononcer son jugement.

5. Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie partagent entièrement l'avis du Baron Komura qu'il serait avantageux, pour les relations amicales des deux pays à l'avenir, de résoudre à présent d'une manière satisfaisante cette question d'un commun accord ; c'est pour cela qu'ils espèrent que les Plénipotentiaires du Japon reconsidéreront leur opinion au sujet de Sakhaline.

Après quoi les Plénipotentiaires ont constaté qu'ils ne pouvaient tomber d'accord pour la question de Sakhaline et ont décidé passer à la délibération de l'Article VI.

Une communication à la presse a été rédigée et confirmée par les Plénipotentiaires (Annexe No IV).

La séance a été suspendue à midi et demi jusqu'à 3 h. de l'après-midi.

La séance est reprise à 3 heures.

Les Plénipotentiaires ont procédé à la discussion de l'Article VI, qui avait été proposé par les Plénipotentiaires du Japon dans les termes suivants :

"Le bail de Port Arthur, de Talien, des territoires et eaux territoriales et eaux territoriales adjacents ainsi que les droits, privilèges, concessions et franchises acquis par la Russie de la Chine comme ayant rapport avec ou comme partie de ce bail, de même que tous les travaux et propriétés publiques seront cédés au Japon." (Texte anglais, Annexe No. V).

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie avaient

exprimé à ce sujet dans leur réponse que le Gouvernement Impérial n'aurait pas d'objection à cet article, mais que, vu les droits souverains de la Chine sur le territoire ennuméré la Russie ne pourrait céder ses droits au Japon sans un accord préalable avec la Chine et qu'en outre les droits des particuliers dans tout le territoire en question devaient rester intacts.

Afin de concilier les deux points de vue les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont présenté à cette séance une nouvelle rédaction de l'Article VI (Annexe No. VI) qui, à leur avis, tenait compte des remarques russes. Dans ce projet les mots "seront cédés au Japon" se trouvent remplacés par l'expression "le Gouvernement de Russie renonce en faveur du Japon," ce qui, à l'avis des Plénipotentiaires du Japon, rendait inutile le consentement préalable de la Chine à la transaction dont il s'agit et laissait tous les soins d'obtenir un pareil consentement au Japon lui-même.

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie n'ont pas cru possible de partager cet avis. La convention formelle conclue avec la Chine au sujet du territoire de Liaotong obligeait la Russie de respecter les droits de la Chine et de ne pas entreprendre aucune modification de l'engagement consigné dans la convention, encore moins un transfert complet de tous ses droits et obligations à une tierce Puissance, sans le consentement formel de la Chine.

Le Baron Komura a fait remarquer qu'il ne doutait certainement pas de la bonne foi de la Russie, mais que la nécessité même d'obtenir le consentement de la Chine avant que la stipulation de cet Article puisse entrer en vigueur, rendrait nulle la valeur de cette stipulation.

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont répondu qu'ils consentaient à ajouter à l'Article VI un engagement formel de la Russie de prêter son concours à obtenir de la Chine le consentement nécessaire.

Après échange d'opinions sur la meilleure manière d'exprimer l'Article VI, les Plénipotentiaires des deux Puissances ont accepté définitivement la rédaction suivante de cet Article :

"Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie cède au Japon à condition du consentement du Gouvernement de Chine, le bail de Port Arthur, de Talien, des territoires et eaux territoriales adjacents, ainsi que tous les droits, privilèges, concessions et franchises se rattachant à ce bail ou en faisant partie, et il cède au Japon tous les travaux et propriétés publiques dans le territoire sur lequel s'étend le bail susmentionné.

"Les Hautes Parties Contractantes s'engagent mutuellement à obtenir le consentement du Gouvernement Chinois, mentionné dans la stipulation ci-dessus.

"Le Gouvernement Impérial du Japon donne, de sa part, l'assurance que les droits de propriété des sujets russes dans le territoire indiqué ci-dessus, seront parfaitement respectés." (Texte anglais, Annexe No. VII).

Après avoir rédigé une communication à la presse (Annexe No. VIII.) la séance a été levée à 6 heures du soir.

4. Japan and Russia reciprocally engage not to obstruct any general measures common to all countries, which China may take for the development of the commerce and industries in Manchuria.

ANNEXE No. II.

(ENGLISH TEXT)

5. The Plenipotentiaries of Japan regret to say that they are unable to share the views and conclusions of the Plenipotentiaries of Russia on the subject of Article V. They believe that Japan's title to at least a large part of Saghalien can readily be traced to a period anterior to the Russian occupation, and it seems to them that instead of being a natural continuation of the continental system of Asia, it forms a natural and necessary link in the chain of insular units of which the Empire of Japan is exclusively composed. But the main considerations which led Japan to ask for the cession of the Island are that

(1st) the permanent security of the Japanese Empire requires the exclusive control of the Island by Japan and (2nd) by the hazard of war Saghalien has come into the complete possession and occupation of Japan and it is now under her exclusive administration, the authorities of Russia having been replaced by those of Japan. What the Plenipotentiaries of Japan desire is to have the title thus acquired confirmed by a formal cession from Russia.

ANNEXE No. IV.

In the morning sitting of August 15th the Conference has discussed Articles IV. and V. Article IV. was unanimously agreed upon. Not being able to arrive at an unanimous decision on Article V. the Plenipotentiaries have decided to take note of the divergence of views and to proceed with the discussion of the other Articles. The meeting will be resumed at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

ANNEXE No. V.

The lease of Port Arthur, Talien and adjacent territory and territorial waters together with all rights, privileges, concessions and franchises acquired by Russia from China, in connection with or as a part of such lease and all public works and properties to be transferred and assigned to Japan.

ANNEXE No. VI.

(ENGLISH TEXT)

6. The Plenipotentiaries of Russia having no objection in principle to this Article, the Plenipotentiaries of Japan believe that the technical difficulties may readily be removed. The Imperial Government of Japan are prepared to accept the transfer in such manner as to relieve the Imperial Government of Russia of all responsibility towards China. That result would be realized if the stipulation were made to read :—

The Imperial Russian Government relinquish in favour of Japan the lease of Port Arthur, Talien and adjacent territory and territorial waters and all rights, privileges, concessions and franchises connected with or forming part of such lease and they also assign and transfer to Japan all public works and properties in the territory affected by the above mentioned lease. The Imperial Government of Japan on their part undertake that the proprietary rights of individuals in the territory above referred to, shall be respected.

ANNEXE No. VII.

6. The Imperial Russian Government transfer and assign to Japan, subject to the consent of the Chinese Government, the lease of Port Arthur, Talien and adjacent territory and territorial waters and all rights, privileges, concessions and franchises connected with or forming part of such lease and they also assign and transfer to Japan all public works and properties in the territory affected by the above mentioned lease.

The High Contracting Parties mutually engage to obtain the consent of the Chinese Government mentioned in the above stipulation.

The Imperial Government of Japan on their part undertake that the proprietary rights of Russian subjects in the territory above referred to, shall be perfectly respected.

ANNEXE No. VIII.

In the afternoon sitting of the Conference of August 15, Article VI has been discussed and agreed upon with common accord and adjourned until to-morrow morning, 9.30.

PROTOCOLE No. V.

SEANCE DU 16 AOUT, 1905.

La séance était ouverte à 9 heures 45 du matin. Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adatci et Otchiai, Secrétares de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétares de la Conférence.

Les Plénipotentiaires ont procédé à la discussion de l'Article VII.

La réduction primitive de cet Article dans le projet japonais était ainsi conçue :

"La Russie s'engage à céder au Japon, libre de toutes réclamations, le chemin de fer entre Kharbine et Port Arthur, et tous ses embranchements avec tous les droits, privilèges et propriétés y appartenant, de même que toutes les mines de charbon appartenant au susdit chemin de fer ou en exploitation pour son profit."

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie, tout en acceptant cet Article en principe, avaient fait à ce sujet dans leur note responsive, les remarques suivantes :

Le Gouvernement Imperial de Russie, ne pourrait se dessaisir que de la partie du chemin de fer se trouvant actuellement occupée de fait par les troupes japonaises. La station terminale du tronçon à céder dans ces conditions devra être déterminée d'un commun accord. Il est cependant indispensable d'avoir en vue que c'est à une compagnie privée que la concession pour construire et exploiter la ligne a été accordée par la Chine qui en conserve les droits souverains, et que l'occupation militaire ne devrait porter aucune atteinte aux droits de cette compagnie. Le Gouvernement Imperial de Russie est prêt à prendre sur lui de s'entendre sur lui de s'entendre avec la dite compagnie tout en autorisant le Gouvernement de Chine à user dès à présent du droit de racheter la ligne en question. La prime de rachat qui revient à la compagnie serait cédée au Japon.

Dans une note présentée à la Conférence (Annexes Nos. I et II), les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont fait observer que le droit de la construction et de l'exploitation du chemin de fer entre Kharbine et Port Arthur constituait une partie importante du bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung ; que c'est une conséquence logique que le chemin de fer devait suivre, dans toutes ses parties et extensions ; le sort du bail en vertu duquel il a été construit et est maintenant exploité ; que, de plus, le point naturel de division des deux lignes de chemin de fer est le point d'intersection de ces lignes ; et qu'enfin, au sujet de l'exercice immédiat, de la part de la Chine, du droit de rachat, les Plenipotentiaires du Japon desirant déclarer que le Gouvernement Imperial du Japon posséderait et exploiterait la ligne en question, en se conformant aux dispositions de la concession relatives au droit de rachat de Chine et à d'autres conditions de la même manière que le Gouvernement Imperial de Russie posséderait et exploiterait la ligne Trans-Manchourienne.

Pour répondre à ces observations, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont expliqué que l'embranchement Sud-Manchourien ne pouvait être considéré comme une partie du bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung, et que la cession de cet embranchement n'était donc pas une conséquence logique de la cession du bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung. Ils ne pouvaient non plus admettre que Kharbine soit un point naturel de division des deux lignes, la Russie pouvant seulement consentir à céder au Japon le tronçon de la ligne actuellement occupée par les troupes japonaises selon le mode indiqué dans leur note responsive précitée. Ils ont de plus fait remarquer que le point de division devait être une place importante et que l'engagement que la Russie a contracté pour le tronçon du chemin de fer qui resterait en sa possession (Protocole No. III), devait être réciproquement pris par le Japon en ce qui concerne la partie du chemin de fer qui va passer au Japon.

Le Baron Komura a constaté qu'il y avait entre les deux Parties une différence essentielle sur la manière de voir dans cette affaire ; et pour bien éclaircir la position du Japon vis-à-vis de cette question, il l'a expliquée dans le sens suivant :

La construction de cet embranchement fut originairement concédée par l'Article VIII de la convention relative au bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung et par conséquent cet embranchement constitue une partie essentielle et intégrante du bail en question ; au point de vue de fait, le bail de Port Arthur ayant été conclu au mois de mars 1898, un contrat basé sur ce bail a été passé au mois de juin de la même année entré le Gouvernement Chinois et la compagnie du chemin de fer pour la construction et l'exploitation du chemin de fer de l'Est Chinois, ce qui prouve l'existence de rapports étroits entre le bail et le chemin de fer. C'est pour cette raison que le Japon réclame la cession de l'embranchement tout entier, d'autant plus que cet embranchement, ayant été construit dans le seul but de communication avec Port Arthur, perdrait sa raison d'être pour la Russie après la cession du bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung au Japon.

D'ailleurs la cession du chemin de fer étant de la même nature que celle de ce bail, elle devait être faite directement au Japon, avec le consentement du Gouvernement de Chine.

Pour répondre à ce point, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont expliqué que le chemin de fer Sud-Manchourien, quoique mentionné dans la convention du 25 avril 1898, concernant le bail de Liaotung, n'avait rien de commun avec ce bail ; que c'étaient deux questions tout à fait différentes et qu'elles devaient par conséquent être traitées séparément. La question du territoire cédé à bail concernait la Russie et la Chine, tandis que la question du chemin de fer ne pouvait être réglée sans tenir compte en outre des intérêts de la compagnie du chemin de fer. Or, le contrat de cette compagnie stipulait que le seul mode de transmission de ce chemin de fer était le rachat de l'entreprise par la Chine. La Russie ne pouvait donc pas enfreindre les droits de la Chine et ceux de la compagnie en transmettant le chemin de fer directement au Japon comme le proposaient ses Plenipotentiaires. Le Gouvernement de Russie pouvait seulement autoriser la Chine à racheter le chemin de fer avant le terme et à transmettre la prime de rachat au Japon en se chargeant lui-même de satisfaire la compagnie. A la remarque du Baron Komura qu'une telle manière de procéder procurerait au Japon une somme d'argent, et non pas le chemin de fer lui-même et qu'elle rendrait nulle la valeur de la cession. M. Witte a dit que par là, la Russie perdrait, en tout cas, tout rapport avec la partie du chemin de fer à céder et que par conséquent le Japon pourra s'entendre avec la Chine pour le reste de l'affaire. Il a ajouté que la Russie n'aurait aucune objection à ce que la Chine transmitt au Japon le chemin de fer en nature et que le même procédé soit adopté en cette affaire que celui convenu pour le cas de la cession du bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung.

Le Baron Komura a ensuite développé la raison pour laquelle le Japon devait réclamer l'embranchement tout entier et en conséquence le point de division des deux lignes devait être Kharbine. Après avoir exposé les raisons politiques pour lesquelles le Japon devait insister sur la cession de l'embranchement tout entier, le Baron Komura a ajouté que le bail en question une fois cédé, il était naturel que l'embranchement tout entier suivit le même sort. En ce qui concerne la question de déterminer le point de division entre les deux lignes de chemin de fer, M. Witte a exposé les considérations suivantes :

Kharbine n'a pas les qualités nécessaires pour en faire une station terminale entre les deux lignes. C'est une localité qui a été choisie, pendant la construction du chemin de fer, pour des considérations purement techniques, comme point commode par sa situation topographique à la construction d'un pont sur le Soungari. Mais l'absence d'un centre de commerce dans cette localité présenterait des difficultés à en faire une station terminale. Une autre considération encore se pose contre le choix de Kharbine comme point de démarcation des deux lignes. Les Armées japonaises ne l'ont pas atteint et il serait juste de ne céder au Japon que ce qui est effectivement occupé par ses troupes. A ce point de vue, la situation d'une place comme Goundjouline par exemple où sont campés les avant-postes japonais et russes serait peut-être le point de démarcation le plus juste.

Le Baron Komura a dit que s'il était absolument impossible pour la Russie de céder la ligne jusqu'à Kharbine, il proposerait, considérant que le point de cette division doit être une place importante au point de vue géographique et naturel, à point ou le chemin de fer passe pour la deuxième fois le Soungari, comme point de division.

M. Witte ayant fait remarquer que ce point de division devait être fixé sur une ville importante et non pas sur un endroit d'une importance géographique, a ajouté qu'il serait disposé à déroger au principe de le fixer sur la limite du campement des avant-postes japonais et à transporter le point de démarcation jusqu'à la première grande ville au nord de Goundjouline, c'est-à-dire à Kouan-

Tchen-Tsy (Tchan-Tchoun) grand centre de commerce et station débarquant pour Girin.

Le Baron Komura a répondu que si l'embranchement entre Kouan-Tchen-Tsy et Girin est remis au Japon, il pourra accepter Kouan-Tchen-Tsy comme le point de division. Il croyait, d'ailleurs, savoir que cette ligne entre Kouan-Tchéu-Tsy et Girin n'était pas encore construite, au moins d'une manière permanente.

M. Witte a déclaré que si cet embranchement n'était pas encore construit, d'une manière permanente, il ne voyait pas d'objection à ce qu'il fut laissé aux soins des Japonais. Il a dit que, ignorant l'état actuel à ce sujet, il allait tout de suite s'en renseigner par télégraphe, et que si cet embranchement existe déjà, il appartiendra à ceux qui en sont les propriétaires actuels.

Sur ce, les Plenipotentiaires des deux côtes sont convenus que le choix définitif de Kouan-Tchen-Tsy comme le point de division était réservé jusqu'à ce que M. Witte ait été renseigné sur l'existence de l'embranchement entre Kouan-Tchen-Tsy et Girin, et ont reconnu comme définitivement arrêtée la rédaction suivante pour l'Article VII :

"La Russie s'engage à céder au Japon, sans compensation, à condition du consentement du Gouvernement de Chine, la portion du chemin de fer entre..... et Port Arthur et tous ses embranchements, avec tous les droits, privilèges et propriétés qui lui appartiennent dans cette région ainsi que toutes les mines de charbon qui se trouvent dans la même région appartenant au chemin de fer ou en exploitation pour son profit.

"Les deux Hautes Parties Contractantes s'engagent mutuellement à obtenir le consentement du Gouvernement de Chine mentionné dans la stipulation ci-dessus." (Texte anglais, Annexe No. III).

En outre, conformément à ce qui a été convenu lors de la discussion sur l'Article III (voir Protocole No. III), la clause suivante est enregistrée par rapport à l'Article présent, c'est-à-dire l'Article VII :

"Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon et de Russie, dans le but d'éviter toute cause de malentendu à l'avenir, déclarent que la concession de la construction et de l'exploitation du chemin de fer Sud-Manchourien qui passe au Japon n'est pas incompatible avec le principe de la porte ouverte et du traitement égal, et que dans les limites du terrain acquis en vertu de cette concession les sujets de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de Russie ainsi que les ressortissants d'autres Puissances étrangères jouiront des mêmes droits et privilèges que ceux de Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon."

La Conférence a ensuite procédé à la discussion de l'Article VIII concernant le mode d'exploitation par la Russie du chemin de fer Trans-Manchourien.

Le Baron Komura a fait remarquer aux Plenipotentiaires de Russie que les observations qu'ils ont faites dans leur note responsive disant que "la compagnie du chemin de fer se conformera strictement aux termes de l'acte de la concession du 27 Août (8 Septembre) 1896, dont le paragraphe 2 stipule que les troupes ainsi que le matériel de guerre russe qui seraient transportés sur la ligne, ne doivent pas subir d'arrêts sur le territoire chinois" sembleraient indiquer que la signification exacte de la proposition faite par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon n'était pas suffisamment claire aux yeux des Plenipotentiaires de Russie ; il lui semblait en effet que le transport des troupes et du matériel de guerre russe sur la ligne traversant le territoire chinois n'était pas conforme au principe de l'usage exclusivement commercial et industriel du chemin de fer.

M. Witte lui a expliqué que ce transport n'était que le besoin de déplacement des soldats russes en nombre peu considérable, d'une partie à l'autre du territoire russe en temps de paix, la possession russe des Provinces Maritimes et de l'Amour exigeant cette mesure. Il affirmait que le transport par d'autres moyens n'était pas praticable, cette mesure, soumise à la condition que les troupes et le matériel de guerre russe, transportés par la ligne en question ne soient pas autorisés à s'arrêter dans le territoire chinois, n'était pas incompatible avec le principe de l'usage exclusivement commercial et industriel de ce chemin de fer.

Le Baron Komura lui a dit qu'il ne volait qu'éclaircir la signification de la proposition des Plenipotentiaires du Japon et cette proposition avait pour but de déterminer l'usage exclusivement commercial et industriel, mais nullement dans un but stratégique, du chemin de fer en Manchourie.

M. Witte a dit qu'il consentait à l'engagement de Russie à ce principe, à condition que le même engagement soit accepté par le Japon concernant le chemin de fer qui sera retenu et exploité par lui en Manchourie.

Le Baron Komura ayant consenti à cette proposition de reciprocité, à condition que l'engagement de la part du Japon ne s'appliquât pas au chemin de fer se trouvant dans le territoire sur lequel s'étend le bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung, l'Article VIII a été arrêté comme suit :

"Le Japon et la Russie s'engagent à retenir et à exploiter leurs lignes de chemin de fer respectives en Manchourie exclusivement dans un but commercial et industriel, mais nullement dans un but stratégique. Il va sans dire que cette restriction ne se rapporte pas aux régions sur lesquelles s'étend le bail de la presqu'île de Liaotung." (Texte anglais, Annexe No. IV.)

La séance a été suspendue de 1 heure à 3 heures de l'après midi. Elle a été terminée à 6 heures 30 du soir.

ANNEXE No. I. (ENGLISH TEXT)

7. The Plenipotentiaries of Japan take note of the acceptance of this Article in principle by the Imperial Russian Government. The right to construct and exploit the railway between Harbin and Port Arthur forms an important part of the lease of the Liao-tung Peninsula. It is a logical consequence that the railway in all its parts and extensions should follow the destiny of the lease under which it was built and is now worked. Besides, the natural point of division of the two lines of railway is the point of intersection of those lines. On the subject of the immediate exercise by China of the right of purchase of the line, the Plenipotentiaries of Japan wish to say that the Imperial Government of Japan will hold and work the line in question subject to the provisions of the concession as to China's right of purchase and other conditions in the same manner as the Imperial Russian Government will hold and work the Trans-Manchurian line.

ANNEXE No. III.

Article VII. Russia engages to assign and transfer to Japan, without compensation and subject to the consent of the Chinese Government, the portion of railway between..... and Port Arthur and all its branches together with all rights, privileges and properties which appertain to it in that region, as well as all coal mines in that region belonging to or worked for the benefit of the railway.

The High Contracting Parties mutually engage to obtain the consent of the Chinese Government mentioned in the above stipulation.

ANNEXE No. IV.

Article VIII. Japan and Russia engage to retain and exploit their respective railway lines in Manchuria exclusively for commercial and industrial purposes and in no wise for strategic purposes.

It is a matter of course that this restriction does not relate to the territory affected by the lease of Liao-tung Peninsula.

ANNEXE No. V.

In the morning sitting of August 16th, the Conference has discussed Article VII, until 1 o'clock when a recess was taken.

ANNEXE No. VI.

In the afternoon sitting of August 16th, the Conference has discussed Articles VII. and VIII. Article VII has been settled in principle and Article VIII. accepted unanimously. The Conference adjourned at 6.30 to 9.30 to-morrow morning.

PROTOCOLE No VI.

SEANCE DU 10 AOUT 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 9 h. 45 du matin.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adatci et Otchiai, Secrétares de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétares de la Conférence.

Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont proposé de procéder à la discussion de l'Article IX, sur le remboursement des frais de guerre, et ont présenté à la Conférence une nouvelle note à ce sujet. (Annexe N° I)

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont répondu qu'ils ne manqueraient pas de présenter leur réponse par écrit à cette note, mais que, ayant déjà exposé leur avis très catégorique sur cette question dans la réponse générale annexée au Protocole N° II, ils ne voyaient pas la nécessité d'un retour sur la discussion du même objet.

Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon leur ont demandé s'ils entendaient refuser d'entrer en discussion sur cette question, même sur les motifs de divergence, et ont exprimé l'avis qu'une délibération de la question litigieuse dans un esprit de conciliation serait peut-être le meilleur mode d'arriver à une entente.

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ne se refusaient pas à une délibération amicale afin de préciser les motifs de la divergence, mais ils ne prevoient pas la possibilité d'atteindre le but et de concilier les opinions si différentes des deux Parties, à moins qu'on réussisse à trouver un nouveau terrain parfaitement favorable pour la discussion. Un essai dans ce sens a été fait par les Plenipotentiaires de Russie, qui dans leur note responsive avaient attiré l'attention de la Conférence sur le remboursement de certaines dépenses japonaises effectuées dans un but humanitaire, comme base possible des négociations sur ce point délicat. Quant à l'idée de rembourser les frais de guerre proprement dits, elle ne correspondait pas du tout avec la situation réelle de la Russie, qui préférerait reprendre les armes que de subir des conditions incompatibles avec sa dignité nationale.

L'argumentation du Baron Komura portait, en substance, sur les idées suivantes :

Il admet que la Russie a encore la force de continuer la guerre, mais le Japon est aussi prêt à la poursuivre, et l'expérience d'un an et demi fait voir clairement quel en sera l'avenir. Ce dont il s'agit ici est cependant de trouver une solution avant de pousser les choses à l'extrême. Si la Russie envisage l'ensemble des intérêts de son pays, elle jugera avantageux de faire quelques sacrifices pécuniaires pour sauvegarder d'autres intérêts plus graves. Les plus grandes Puissances ont eu des moments où elles ont dû faire des sacrifices dans pareilles circonstances. Les conditions de paix très modérées, proposées par le Japon, ont été élaborées par le Gouvernement exclusivement en vue des résultats de la guerre déjà atteints et comparativement à ces résultats elles sont minimes. L'histoire du passé prouve si la fortune de la guerre avait favorisé la Russie, elle aurait présente des conditions bien plus onéreuses. Et si le Japon, malgré sa situation très sûre de pouvoir avantageusement continuer la guerre, a proposé des conditions aussi modestes, c'est qu'il est sincèrement animé des principes humanitaires et d'un désir ardent de conclure la paix dans l'intérêt commun des deux pays et pour le bien-être du monde entier. Pendant que les deux adversaires continuent la lutte des armes, les autres pays se livrent à une concurrence économique et gagnent du terrain, tandis que le Japon et la Russie restent en retard. L'intérêt véritable des deux pays serait de cesser la lutte et de rentrer dans la concurrence économique de l'univers.

M. Witte a exposé les idées suivantes :

La Russie est désireuse de paix, mais elle n'est pas réduite à demander la paix à tout prix ; elle continuera la lutte, s'il le faut, et trouvera pour cela les moyens nécessaires plus facilement encore qu'elle n'en trouverait pour acheter une paix humiliante. Il pense que la prudence oblige de ne pas faire des suppositions concernant les résultats de la guerre dans le futur. Les conditions présentées par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon, bien loin d'être modérées et de témoigner des sentiments humanitaires et pacifiques.—prouvent au contraire l'intention du Japon de profiter des circonstances pour arracher à la Russie tout ce qui est possible en escomptant les succès que les Japonais considèrent probable. Si la Russie était dans une situation analogue, elle n'aurait certainement pas songé à exiger le remboursement des frais de guerre, à moins qu'elle ait pris possession de la capitale du pays adverse. Le Japon se fait fort des faits accomplis et des territoires occupés. Mais, en droit international, il ne suffit pas d'occuper un territoire, il faut encore savoir le garder. M. Witte partage entièrement l'avis du Baron Komura qu'il serait avantageux pour les deux pays de cesser la lutte et de rentrer dans le courant des intérêts économiques de l'univers, mais il ne voit pas de la part des Plenipotentiaires du Japon un désir sincère et réel d'arriver à ce but. Toute la marche des négociations présentes n'a été, de la part de la Russie, qu'une série de concessions dans toutes les questions où cela était possible. Mais à présent on était arrivé à un point qui touche à la dignité de la Russie et où il n'y a plus de concession possible.

Le Baron Komura a fait observer que tout ce que M. Witte considérait jusqu'ici comme des concessions russes n'était en réalité qu'une simple exposition de l'état de choses existant, que n'exige point d'être reconnu à la rigueur par la Russie et qu'il était indispensable que la Russie reconnût la justice de cette demande basée sur les succès militaires ininterrompus du Japon, si elle était pénétrée d'un sincère sentiment de conciliation. Il a en outre signalé que M. Witte avait même refusé de reconnaître un fait accompli important.

M. Witte a répondu qu'il reconnaissait le fait de l'occupation de Sakhaline par les forces japonaises, mais qu'il ne reconnaissait pas la valeur juridique de cet acte, tant qu'il n'a pas été sanctionné par un traité.

Après cet échange de vues les Plenipotentiaires des deux Puissances ont constaté qu'ils ne pouvaient tomber d'accord sur l'Article IX et ont décidé de passer aux articles suivants.

La séance a été suspendue à 12 h. 45, pour être reprise à 3 heures.

La séance a été rouverte à 3 heures.

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont remis à la Conférence leur réponse par écrit à la note sur l'Article IX, présentée par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon, dans la séance du matin. (Annexe No. II).

La Conférence a procédé ensuite à la discussion de l'Article X du projet japonais, concernant la demande de remettre au Japon tous les vaisseaux de guerre internes dans les ports neutres.

Dans leur note responsive, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie avaient déjà expliqué qu'une pareille exigence était contraire au droit international et à la dignité de la Russie, et qu'elle ne pouvait par conséquent être acceptée par ses représentants.

A la séance présente, les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont remis aux Plenipotentiaires de Russie une nouvelle note (Annexes Nos. III et IV) à l'appui du point de vue japonais.

Ayant pris connaissance de cette note, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont déclaré qu'ils ne pouvaient s'associer à cet avis. Le principe du droit international est tel que si un corps d'armée ou un navire cherche asile sur un territoire ou dans un port neutre, ce corps ou navire doit être désarmé, mais pas remis à l'adversaire. S'il n'y avait divergence entre nous que sur cette question —là, elle pourrait être présentée à un tribunal d'arbitrage et on ne pourrait guère douter du jugement qu'il prononcerait.

Le Baron Komura a répondu qu'en présentant la demande en question, le Japon se basait sur les considérations suivantes :

Quoique la Chine ait déclaré au début de la guerre son intention de conserver une parfaite neutralité, elle n'a jamais eu de force nécessaire pour remplir ses devoirs de puissance neutre.

Les navires russes, ayant subi des avaries pendant les combats navals—et l'on n'envisage ici que les vaisseaux internes à la suite des avaries causées par les combats navals—ont cherché l'asile dans des ports chinois, et malgré les règles de la neutralité chinoise exigeant à ces vaisseaux de se désarmer s'ils ne reprennent pas la mer dans 24 heures, n'ont pris aucune décision pendant quelques semaines, et s'il en ont été enfin desarmes, ce n'est ni par leur acte spontané ni par l'autorité chinoise, mais uniquement par la pression des forces navales japonaises. Dans ces circonstances, les forces navales japonaises avaient un droit indiscutable afin de défendre leurs droits de belligérant d'entrer dans les ports de Chine pour les mettre en exécution et s'ils ne l'ont pas fait à Shanghai, c'est uniquement pour ne pas porter préjudice aux intérêts commerciaux des Puissances étrangères, conformément à la déclaration du Japon faite au début de la guerre.

M. Witte a déclaré qu'il a interprété tout autrement le principe du droit international en question et qu'il n'avait jamais entendu dire qu'une escadre belligérante ait le droit d'entrer dans un port neutre et d'y exercer des actes de guerre sur son adversaire. Le seul mode de procéder qui appartenait aux escadres japonaises était, à son avis, d'attendre les vaisseaux russes en pleine mer et de les attaquer à leur sortie des ports neutres. Le fait est tel que les navires sont desarmés et qu'ils restent dans les ports neutres jusqu'à la fin de la guerre. Une fois la guerre finie, il ne peut y avoir aucune question à qui ces navires appartiennent. M. Witte ne pouvait par conséquent changer son avis sur cette question, ni reconnaître l'équité de l'exigence japonaise.

Le Baron Komura a répondu que d'après le principe et les précédents du droit international, dans le cas où un pays neutre ne peut pas s'acquiescer de ses devoirs, le belligérant peut exercer lui-même ses droits de belligérant dans le domaine du pays neutre, et que si le Japon s'est abstenu de les exercer durant la guerre, c'est qu'il entendait y donner suite dans les négociations avec la Russie.

La discussion n'ayant pas amené à concilier les opinions des Plénipotentiaires des deux Parties, ils ont décidé de constater cette divergence et de passer à la délibération de l'Article XI.

Le texte de cet Article, dans le premier projet japonais était ainsi conçu : "La Russie s'engage à limiter sa force navale dans les eaux de l'Extrême Orient."

Dans leur réponse les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont dit : "La Russie ne saurait consentir à un pareil engagement imposé par une Puissance étrangère, car ce serait incompatible avec sa dignité. Le Gouvernement Impérial se croirait cependant à même de pouvoir déclarer qu'il n'entre pas dans ses vues dans un avenir proche d'entretenir dans les eaux du Pacifique des forces navales considérables."

Tout en confirmant cette réponse, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont expliqué qu'ils n'avaient pas d'objection à ce qu'elle fût enregistrée dans le protocole ou consignée dans quelque autre acte, sans en changer la rédaction. Ils ont même proposé d'en faire l'objet d'une déclaration spéciale qui serait signée par les deux Plénipotentiaires et soumise à la confirmation de l'Empereur de Russie.

Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont répondu qu'ils acceptaient en principe ces paroles, mais que le texte de la déclaration projetée leur paraissait trop vague, vu la grande importance de la question pour la sécurité nationale du Japon. Ils insistaient surtout sur la précision des mots "force navale considérable," puisque malgré que la Russie eût intérêt à maintenir des escadres suffisamment fortes dans la Baltique et dans la Mer Noire, elle n'a cessé d'envoyer de puissants renforts navals en Extrême Orient dans le but de s'assurer de la suprématie maritime sur le Japon. A quoi, M. Witte a répondu qu'il était très difficile de préciser ce mot, car ce qui est reconnu considérable à une époque, ne l'est pas à une autre et que d'ailleurs les mots ne signifiaient que peu de choses quand les deux Parties sont sincèrement animées du désir d'entretenir de bonnes relations de confiance.

Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont attiré l'attention des Plénipotentiaires de Russie sur une autre expression encore dans la déclaration projetée qui ne leur paraissait pas assez précise et qui, à leur avis, demandait à être déterminée, à savoir les mots "dans un avenir proche," en faisant remarquer qu'une rédaction aussi vague ne saurait produire l'effet désiré par eux.

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont répondu qu'ils ne voyaient pas d'autre manière d'exprimer ces idées avec plus de précision ; après quoi ils ont proposé de remettre la décision sur l'Article XI à la prochaine séance.

Cette proposition a été acceptée par les Plénipotentiaires du Japon.

La séance a été levée à 6 heures et demie du soir.

ANNEXE No. I.

(ENGLISH TEXT)

9. The Plénipotentiaires of Japan have given their most serious consideration to the observations of the Plénipotentiaires of Russia on the subject of this Article. They are unable to share the conclusions which the Plénipotentiaires of Russia would draw from the admission of the claim of Japan under this head. In such an admission there could exist no inference that Russia was no longer able to continue the struggle. The Plénipotentiaires of Japan have no intention to claim any terms that will be humiliating to Russia, as that would not consist with a just sense of the dignity of a great Power, and they believe that the whole civilized world would find, in the admission of the principle of reimbursement in the actual circumstances of the case, nothing more than the recognition of the historical fact that up to this time the arms of Japan have been successful. The claim of Japan contains nothing of an indirect or consequential nature. It is strictly limited to the actual direct expenses of the war and to that extent the Imperial Government of Japan firmly believe that they are justly entitled to reimbursement. The Plénipotentiaires of Japan accordingly do not find it possible to abandon the claim. They are nevertheless prepared to approach the question of the formula to be used as well as the adjustment of the amount to be reimbursed in the spirit of conciliation and accommodation and they feel compelled to earnestly urge Plénipotentiaires of Russia to reconsider the question in the light of these remarks.

ANNEXE No. II.

Les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont pris en sérieuse considération la note que Leurs Excellences les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont bien voulu leur remettre relativement à l'article concernant le remboursement au Japon des frais de la guerre. Ils prennent acte avec satisfaction de la déclaration de Messieurs les Plénipotentiaires du Japon qu'en mettant en avant cette demande, il n'entrerait en aucune façon dans leur intention de faire à la Russie une proposition incompatible avec la dignité d'une grande Puissance.

Toutefois malgré leur désir le plus sincère d'arriver à une entente qui puisse mettre fin à la guerre, les Plénipotentiaires de Russie se voient obligés de déclarer d'une manière catégorique que la Russie ne saurait signer un traité de paix en vertu duquel elle s'engagerait à un adversaire, même favorisé par de grands succès militaires, ses frais de guerre.

Ni l'histoire des relations internationales, ni les principes de l'équité ne sauraient justifier une pareille demande adressée à la Russie qui, bien que n'ayant pas jusqu'ici été favorisée par la fortune des armes, ne se trouve en aucune façon dans la position d'une Puissance vaincue réduite à subir la volonté du vainqueur.

Dans ces conditions la recherche d'une forme à adopter pour couvrir une semblable transaction, aussi bien que l'ajustement du montant qui serait à rembourser, devient inutile.

ANNEXE No. III.

(ENGLISH TEXT)

10. The Plénipotentiaires of Japan advanced this claim not so much on account of the material advantages likely to accrue to Japan from its acceptance, as from the conviction that was in accordance with the principles of the law of nations. It is no doubt true that the claim is without the support of exact precedent in international relations, but that circumstance is due to the fact that no cases have arisen in which belligerent ships of war have in the sequel of battle sought asylum in neutral ports and been there interned. If prolonged sanctuary had not been extended to the vessels in question it is probable that the larger part of them would ultimately have fallen into the hands of the Japanese forces. It does not seem to be consistent with the principle of justice that vessels by seeking the hospitality of neutral ports, should be permitted to escape the consequences of battle. There can be no question of national dignity in connection with fulfilment of international obligations. The claim of Japan applies only to vessels that were damaged in battle. In the circumstances of the case the Plénipotentiaires of Japan feel justified in maintaining the claim.

ANNEXE No. V.

In the morning sitting of August 17th, the Conference has discussed Article IX. Not being able to arrive at an agreement, the Plénipotentiaires have decided to take note of the divergence of views, and the Conference adjourned to 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

ANNEXE No. VI.

In the afternoon sitting of August 17th, Articles X and XI have been discussed. Regarding Article X, the Plénipotentiaires have shown a divergence of views which has not been settled. Article XI has been reserved for further discussion. Conference adjourned till to-morrow August 18th.

PROTOCOLE No VII.

SÉANCE DU 18 AOÛT 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 10 h. du matin.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adachi et Otchiai, Secrétaires de la Conférence.

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétaires de la Conférence.

Les Plénipotentiaires ont décidé de continuer la discussion sur l'Article XI commencée à la séance précédente.

Le Baron Komura a déclaré que les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ont étudié la question de l'Article XI d'une manière très réfléchie, qu'ils ont jugé qu'il serait difficile de trouver une formule de déclaration de nature à satisfaire les deux Parties et qu'ils se proposent de faire à cette occasion une déclaration spéciale.

Cette déclaration a été présentée à la Conférence tenante. (Annexes Nos. I, et II.)

Bientôt après, les quatre Plénipotentiaires ont eu une conférence privée.

La séance a été reprise à 3 h. et demie de l'après-midi.

Les Plénipotentiaires ont décidé de constater la divergence de vues sur l'Article XI et de procéder à la discussion de l'Article XII, concernant la pêche le long des côtes russes.

Le projet de cet Article propose par les Plénipotentiaires du Japon était ainsi conçu : "La Russie concèdera aux sujets japonais les pleins droits de pêche le long des côtes ainsi que dans les baies, havres, anses et rivières en ses possessions dans les Mers du Japon, d'Okhotsk et de Behring."

Dans leur note responsive les Plénipotentiaires de Russie ont expliqué que la Russie était prête à s'entendre avec le Japon pour cette question, mais que les droits de pêche ne pourraient s'étendre que sur les côtes des mers elles-mêmes, sans toucher aux anses et fleuves, et que les droits déjà existants devraient rester en vigueur.

Les Plénipotentiaires du Japon ayant accédé à cette réserve, le texte de l'Article XII a été définitivement arrêté comme suit :

"La Russie s'engage à s'entendre avec le Japon pour concéder aux sujets japonais des droits de pêche le long des côtes des possessions russes dans les Mers du Japon, d'Okhotsk et de Behring. Il va sans dire que les droits déjà appartenant dans cette région à des sujets tant russes qu'étrangers, resteront en vigueur."

La séance est terminée à 4 heures et demie de l'après-midi.

ANNEXE No. I. (ENGLISH TEXT)

The Plenipotentiaries of Japan declare that animated by the sincere desire to bring about a satisfactory adjustment of all the questions on which agreement has not been reached, they will be prepared to withdraw the conditions concerning the limitation of the naval strength and the surrender of interned ships if the Plenipotentiaries of Russia are disposed to consider in a spirit of conciliation the questions of the cession of Sakhalien and the reimbursement of the war expenses.

ANNEXE No. III.

In the morning sitting of August 18, the Conference has continued the discussion of Article XI which will be resumed at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

ANNEXE No. IV.

In the afternoon sitting of August 18, not being able to arrive at an agreement on Article XI the Conference has passed to the discussion of the last Article which has been settled unanimously. The next sitting will be held next Tuesday, August 22, at 3 o'clock p.m.

PROTOCOLE No. VIII.

SEANCE DU 23 AOÛT, 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 2 h. et demie.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistés de M. M. Sato, Adachi et Otchiai, Secrétaires de la Conférence ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistés de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secrétaires de la Conférence.

Les Plenipotentiaires ont procédé à la signature des Protocoles des séances précédentes.

M. Witte a fait observer que les travaux de cette Conférence ayant abouti à une entente sur la plupart des articles proposés par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon, il restait pourtant quatre points sur lesquels on n'était pas arrivé à tomber d'accord, et il a émis l'idée qu'il serait peut-être utile de rechercher les causes de cette divergence afin de tâcher de les éloigner dans la mesure du possible.

Le Baron Komura a répondu que les Plenipotentiaires du Japon partageaient cet avis, et a déclaré qu'au cours des négociations dans cette Conférence, ils se trouvaient satisfaits d'avoir pleinement démontré la sincérité du désir de leur Gouvernement de mettre fin aux calamités de la guerre, par la moderation de leurs conditions de paix, et en outre, par leur empressement de retirer les points 10 et 11 à condition que les questions de la cession de Sakhaline et du remboursement des dépenses de la guerre puissent être ajustées d'une manière satisfaisante. Il a ajouté que, comme un témoignage additionnel de la sincérité de leur Gouvernement ils étaient maintenant prêts à faire encore des concessions et qu'ils soumettaient aux Plenipotentiaires de Russie un plan de concessions mutuelles espérant que ce plan ferait l'objet, de la part des Plenipotentiaires de Russie, de la plus sérieuse considération qu'exige son importance suprême. Il a ensuite remis à M. Witte une note (Annexes Nos. I. et II.), en disant que cette note comprend le plan des concessions mutuelles que les Plenipotentiaires du Japon proposent avec l'approbation de leur Gouvernement.

M. Witte a déclaré que les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont fait de leur part aussi tous les efforts possibles pendant la durée de la Conférence pour arriver à une entente et pour faire cesser cette guerre qui afflige le monde. Ils étaient très reconnaissants aux Plenipotentiaires du Japon de leur nouvelle démarche vers le but pacifique qui anime les deux Parties. M. Witte tenait, cependant, avant d'exprimer un avis, à se rendre bien compte de la situation et voudrait savoir si les Plenipotentiaires du Japon croyaient possible un arrangement ou combinaison quelconque excluant toute idée de remboursement de frais de guerre, sous quelque forme que ce fût, excepté les frais de l'entretien des prisonniers de guerre.

Le Baron Komura a répondu que le plan présenté par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon était élaboré dans le but de faire tomber toutes les difficultés dans la solution des deux questions importantes, celles de Sakhaline, et des dépenses de la guerre. Il pensait que, si cette suggestion était acceptée, elle serait d'un côté un compromis au sujet de la question de Sakhaline, dont la possession est considérée comme essentielle par le Gouvernement du Japon, surtout en vue de l'occupation actuelle de l'île et qu'elle était, de l'autre, un compromis sur la question des dépenses de la guerre que les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ne trouvaient pas possible de payer sous le nom du remboursement des dépenses de la guerre. Il a fait remarquer que cette formule écarterait les objections très fortes opposées par les Plenipotentiaires de Russie, qu'elle était en même temps, un mode de restauration de la partie nord de Sakhaline à la Russie, et que le Japon devait recevoir un tel montant d'argent que son Gouvernement se voyait justifié à recevoir en consentant à restaurer cette partie de l'île. Il a enfin prié les Plenipotentiaires de Russie d'avoir en vue que le retrait de la réclamation du Japon pour le remboursement des dépenses de la guerre n'était possible qu'à la condition que ce compromis fût accepté, comme il est d'ailleurs exposé dans la note.

Avant d'aborder la question de fond M. Witte a exprimé le désir de connaître l'avis des Plenipotentiaires du Japon sur un autre point, dont il voudrait leur faire part à titre de supposition tout à fait privée et personnelle, et qui pourrait être formulée comme suit : En supposant que la Russie consentit à céder au Japon toute l'île de Sakhaline, y aurait-il possibilité pour le Japon de se départir, à cette condition, de toute idée d'un remboursement pécuniaire ?

Le Baron Komura a répondu que si un pareil arrangement était possible, la solution des questions dont il s'agit aurait été comparativement facile, mais qu'il était aussi difficile au Gouvernement Japonais de se passer de sa réclamation du remboursement des dépenses de la guerre, qu'il le lui était de consentir à la restauration de toute Sakhaline. Il a ajouté que ce plan était proposé afin de faire face aux difficultés mi chemin et que l'idée essentielle était les concessions mutuelles des deux côtés.

M. Witte a fait remarquer qu'il envisageait avec satisfaction les efforts des Plenipotentiaires du Japon d'arriver à une entente, mais que la question pécuniaire rendrait ces efforts infructueux. Il voudrait par conséquent s'assurer si vraiment il n'existait pas de moyen de régler les questions litigieuses, sans aucun remboursement de frais excepté ceux de l'entretien des prisonniers de guerre, et si les Plenipotentiaires du Japon n'avaient pas quel que autre projet.

Le Baron Komura a répondu que les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ne pouvaient trouver aucun autre plan, et que, dans leur opinion, le plan proposé était très juste et le seul qui convînt à éliminer toutes les difficultés. Il a ajouté que si, toutefois, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie pouvaient suggérer quelque autre plan, les Plenipotentiaires du Japon le considéreraient volontiers.

M. Witte a répondu qu'il lui serait bien difficile de proposer un projet, dans l'état actuel des choses, qu'il croyait nécessaire, au préalable, de rechercher les éléments de quelque combinaison possible et que c'était justement le but auquel visait l'échange de vues présent. Le projet japonais contenait, en substance, la proposition suivante : Le Japon cède à la Russie la partie nord de Sakhaline ; la Russie paie en échange une somme d'argent. La Russie pourrait donc accepter cet offre ou non. Si elle l'accepte, elle paie la somme convenue et garde la partie nord de Sakhaline ; si elle n'accepte pas, elle garde au contraire l'argent et renonce à la possession de l'île. En supposant que la Russie acceptât cette dernière alternative, et en précisant bien nettement que ce n'était pas une proposition formelle de la Russie, mais seulement une deduction logique du projet japonais même, M. Witte a exprimé le désir de savoir quel pourrait être, le cas échéant, l'avis du Gouvernement du Japon, à une pareille combinaison.

Le Baron Komura a fait remarquer que bien que M. Witte considérât une pareille combinaison comme une conséquence logique du compromis en question, il désirerait faire comprendre que le plan proposé par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon était avec l'idée de ne pas abandonner la réclamation du remboursement des frais de la guerre, et qu'en conséquence la conclusion de M. Witte, bien qu'elle fût une deduction logique du plan japonais du côté de la forme, était tout à fait contraire à ce plan en substance.

A la question de M. Witte s'il pouvait conclure de tout ce qui s'était passé que toute combinaison excluant entièrement un remboursement des frais de la guerre serait inacceptable au Japon, le Baron Komura a répondu affirmativement et a expliqué que toute combinaison autre que celle sous la forme proposée était inacceptable. Il a ensuite fait remarquer qu'en formulant ce plan, les Plenipotentiaires du Japon avaient en vue une chose beaucoup plus importante : c'était que, si ce plan était accepté, il aurait le résultat de ne laisser exister aucune cause d'irritation des deux côtés, car, l'idée essentielle en étant les concessions mutuelles, celles-ci étaient la conséquence d'une action spontanée de chaque côté et non pas celle d'une contrainte. Il a de plus exprimé, en vue de ces considérations, un ardent espoir des Plenipotentiaires du Japon que les Plenipotentiaires de Russie pourront trouver un moyen de prendre en due considération ce plan de compromis et qu'il pourra savoir, puisque M. Witte avait déclaré de n'avoir aucun formule ou plan comme un mode de solution, approuvé par le Gouvernement Russe, si ce plan de compromis indiquait plus haut serait ou non acceptable à ce Gouvernement.

A quoi M. Witte a répondu qu'après les explications du Baron Komura il était tout à fait évident que le projet japonais contenait en substance une demande de remboursement de frais de guerre sous une nouvelle forme et que tout autre projet sans cette clause serait inacceptable pour le Japon. Et, comme la Russie, de sa part, ne pourrait consentir à un remboursement autre que pour l'entretien des prisonniers de guerre, M. Witte a déclaré qu'il n'y avait aucune probabilité que le plan en question fût accepté par la Russie.

Ayant reconnu que les positions des deux Gouvernements sur les questions en litige étaient suffisamment éclaircies par les discussions précédentes, les Plenipotentiaires ont décidé de lever la séance et de se rassembler à une séance finale le samedi 26 Août.

Après avoir élaboré une communication à la presse (Annexe No. III.), la séance est terminée à 3 h. et demie.

ANNEXE No. I.

1. The Island of Saghalien to be divided into two parts, the territory lying north of the 50th degree, North Latitude, to be restored to Russia and the territory lying to the south of that parallel to belong to Japan.

2. Japan and Russia to engage respectively not to take any measures which may impede the free navigation of the La Perouse and Tartary Straits.

3. Russia to pay to Japan yen 1,200,000,000, as compensation for the restoration of the portion of Saghalien Island to the north of the 50th parallel, North Latitude.

4. Upon the conclusion of an arrangement in the above sense, Japan to withdraw her demand concerning reimbursement of war expenses, but such withdrawal is not to apply to the expenses incurred by Japan for the care and maintenance of Russian prisoners of war.

ANNEXE No. III.

In the sitting of August 22nd, the Conference has proceeded to the examination and signature of the preceding sittings. It has been decided that the next sitting will be held next Saturday August 26th.

PROTOCOLE No. IX.

SEANCE DU 26 AOÛT 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 4 h. 30 du soir.

PROTOCOLE No. X.

SEANCE DU 29 AOUT, 1905.

La seance est ouverte a 10 heures 55 du matin.

Etaient presents :

Pour le Japon :

Le Baron Komura et M. Takahira, assistes de M. M. Sato, Adatci, et Otchiai, Secretaires de la Conference ;

Pour la Russie :

M. Witte et le Baron Rosen, assistes de M. M. de Plançon, Korostovetz et Nabokoff, Secretaires de la Conference.

Les Plenipotentiaires ont procede a la signature du Protocole de la seance precedente.

Sur la demande du Baron Komura de savoir la reponse officielle du Gouvernement Russe au projet presente par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon a la seance du 23 Aout (Protocole No. VIII), les Plenipotentiaires de Russie lui ont transmis une notice qui exprimait le consentement de Sa Majeste l'Empereur de Russie a ceder au Japon aux conditions exposees dans la notice la partie sud de Sakhaline (Annexe No. I).

Ayant pris connaissance de ce document les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont declare qu'ils avaient une communication speciale a faire a ce sujet, conformément aux instructions de leur Gouvernement, et ont presente une notice (Annexes Nos. II et III) portant que le Gouvernement du Japon est dispose a retirer sa reclamation de remboursement, "pourvu que la Russie reconnaisse comme un fait accompli l'occupation de l'Ile de Sakhaline par le Japon."

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont repondu qu'ils ne pouvaient consentir a la redaction de cette dernière reserve vu l'ordre categorique de S. M. l'Empereur, leur Auguste Maître, contenu dans la notice qu'ils viennent de presenter a la Conference.

Alors le Baron Komura a declare que le Gouvernement du Japon, anime d'un sincere desir de reetablir la paix, consentait a laisser en la possession de la Russie la partie nord de Sakhaline, sans aucun remboursement, mais a condition que la frontière entre les deux parties de l'Ile suive le 50e. degre de latitude nord et que la reserve sur les mesures militaires, contenue dans la notice russe, ainsi que l'engagement de garantir la liberte de navigation dans les Detroits de Laperouse et de Tartarie, fussent reciproques.

M. Witte, prenant acte du consentement susmentionne du Japon, a repondu que la Russie n'avait pris jusqu'a present et ne comptait prendre a l'avenir aucune mesure militaire sur le territoire en sur les cotes de Sakhaline, de sorte qu'il n'avait, a son avis aucune raison pour entretenir des doutes a ce sujet, mais qu'il n'avait pas d'objections a donner a l'engagement en question une valeur reciproque conformément a l'avis du Baron Komura. En ce qui concerne la ligne frontière entre les deux parties de l'Ile, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie n'avaient pas d'objection, en principe, a ce que cette ligne suivit le 50 degre, mais ils estimaient qu'une delimitation plus detaillee et plus conforme a la configuration du pays devait être faite sur les lieux par une commission speciale.

Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont repondu qu'ils partageaient cet avis, et la question fut reglee. Il y avait une autre question encore, se rapportant a Sakhaline, que les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont cru devoir soumettre a la Conference. C'était la question des colonies penitentiaires russes dont le voisinage a toujours cause beaucoup d'embarras au Gouvernement Japonais, même quand elles etaient separees de l'Ile de Hokkaido par un detroit. Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon esperaient que le Gouvernement de Russie voudrait bien tenir compte de cette consideration et ne pas pas maintenir des colonies penitentiaires dans la partie nord de de Sakhaline.

M. Witte a repondu que cette question n'était pas de sa competence, qu'elle relevait du domaine de l'Interieur et qu'il ne pouvait prendre sur lui aucun engagement a ce sujet. Il croyait cependant pouvoir affirmer, que si le Gouvernement de Russie trouve necessaire de maintenir a Sakhaline des colonies penitentiaires, il ne manquera pas de prendre en même temps toutes les mesures pour que ces colonies ne puissent devenir une source de desagrement pour les voisins.

La question de Sakhaline etant reconnue suffisamment elucidee, les Plenipotentiaires ont laisse aux soins des Secretaires de preparer la redaction de l'Article V.

M. Witte a ensuite suggere l'idee que la Conference ayant decide toutes les grandes questions de principe et etant arrivee aux questions secondaires et de detail, il serait opportun d'inviter les delegues a prendre part aux travaux de la Conference. Il tenait a inviter pour la seance de l'après-midi M. M. de Martens, Chipoff, Pokotiloff et Vermoloff.

Les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont repondu qu'ils n'avaient aucune objection a l'invitation des delegues susnommes a la Conference et qu'ils se reservaient de profiter du même droit quand ils le trouveront necessaire. Le Baron Komura a ajoute qu'il se proposait au prealable de soumettre a la Conference quelques questions de principe qui devraient, a son avis, être reglees par les Plenipotentiaires seance tenante.

Ces questions concernaient :

- 1<sup>o</sup>—Le mode d'evacuation de la Manchourie,
- 2<sup>o</sup>—La determination du point de demarcation entre les lignes de chemins de fer respectifs en Manchourie.
- 3<sup>o</sup>—La protection de la ligne du chemin de fer.

Concernant le premier point il avait ete stipule dans l'Article II. (Protocole No III.) que l'evacuation de la Manchourie se ferait conformément aux dispositions d'un article additionnel. En vue de cette stipulation le Baron Komura a propose a la Conference un plan special elabore par le Gouvernement du Japon (Annexes Nos. IV et V) et a prie les Plenipotentiaires de Russie d'examiner ce plan et de donner leur avis a ce sujet—ou bien de suggerer quelque autre projet.

M. Witte a repondu qu'il ne pouvait former de projets concernant l'evacuation, que c'était une question speciale, qui dependait en grande partie de la capacite de transport du chemin de fer et des conditions locales et qu'il ne pouvait ici tracer les bases principes d'un arrangement. Ces bases peuvent être formulees comme suit : 1.—l'evacuation doit se produire de maniere a ce que la quantite de troupes japonaises et russes qui restent en Manchourie a chaque epoque, soit a peu pres egale ; 2.—les troupes doivent être retirees d'abord des positions frontales ; 3.—ces principes doivent servir de base a une convention concernant le mode et les periodes d'evacuation qui doit être conclue par les Commandants en chef.

Le Baron Komura a dit qu'il n'avait aucune objection a ne mentionner dans le traite que les principales bases de l'arrangement en question, et a demande de proposer un projet, a quoi M. Witte a acquiesce.

La seconde question soulevee par le Baron Komura etait celle du point de demarcation entre les lignes du chemin de fer respectives, dont il s'agit dans l'Article VII. Cette question avait ete adjournee jusqu'a la reception d'informations precises sur l'existence d'un embranchement de chemin de fer entre Kouan-Tchen Tsy et Girin (Protocole No. V). La reponse ayant ete recue et portant que l'embranchement en question n'existait pas encore, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont consenti a declarer que, vu cet etat de choses, ils n'avaient pas d'objection a ce que les Japonais construisent un embranchement partant de Kouan-Tchen-Tsy ou de toute autre station qui sera en leur possession jusqu'a Girin. Il a ete decide ensuite que la ville de Kouan-Tchen-Tsy servirait de point de demarcation entre les lignes respectives et que l'Article VII devrait être complete en consequence.

La troisième question concernait la protection du chemin de fer manchourien. Dans une notice presentee a la Conference (Annexes Nos. VI et VII), les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont propose de conclure un arrangement special en forme de protocole annexe au traite de paix dans lequel il serait stipule que les deux Gouvernements se reservaient le droit de maintenir des gardes du chemin de fer en nombre n'excédant pas cinq hommes par kilometre.

M. Witte a fait observer qu'il serait difficile a present de determiner le nombre des gardes necessaires ; ce nombre devrait être plus considerable au debut, tant que l'on n'est pas sur de l'attitude de la population chinoise ; il pourrait être diminue ensuite a mesure que l'ordre normal s'etablirait en Manchourie. Il serait donc plus pratique de dire que les deux Gouvernements se reservaient le droit de maintenir en Manchourie des gardes de chemin de fer dont le nombre sera fixe de commun accord en conformite de l'extension de la voie.

Le Baron Komura etait du même avis en principe, mais il estimait necessaire de faire un arrangement definitif a ce sujet.

Vu la phase dans laquelle les negociations venaient d'entrer, M. Witte a emis l'avis qu'il serait opportun de prendre des mesures afin de faire cesser immediatement les hostilities. Il a propose de telegraphier aux Gouvernements respectifs en les priant de donner les ordres necessaires aux Commandants en chef pour les autoriser a declarer une suspension d'armes et a s'entendre pour etablir un armistice.

Le Baron Komura a dit qu'il demanderait par telegraphe des instructions de son Gouvernement a ce sujet et que jusqu'a la reception d'une reponse il ne pouvait donner d'avis d'une maniere precise.

La seance a ete levee a midi et demi.

La seance est reouverte a 3 heures.

Etaient presents outre les personnes mentionnees en tete du Protocole, M. M. de Martens, Chipoff, Pokotiloff et Vermoloff.

Le Baron Komura a attire l'attention de la Conference sur l'opportunité de regler les questions ci-dessous et a presente pour chacune de ces questions une notice en langue anglaise avec traduction française :

1. Echange des prisonniers de guerre (Annexes Nos. VIII et IX).
2. Relations de commerce entre les deux Puissances (Annexes Nos. X et XI).
3. Arrangement pour les services de racordement des chemins de fer japonais et russes en Manchourie (Annexes Nos. XII et XIII).
4. Echange des ratifications du Traite de Paix (Annexes Nos. XIV et XV).

Avant d'aborder ces questions, les Plenipotentiaires ont echange des vues sur la forme et la substance du Traite de Paix qui allait être conclu. Il a ete decide, afin de terminer cette oeuvre dans le plus bref delai, 1.—que le traite serait non pas preliminaire, mais definitif, 2.—qu'il contiendrait toutes les dispositions necessaires qui pourront être reglees a cette Conference, et en laissant seulement les questions de detail ou ayant un caractere local, ne permettant pas un reglement immediat, aux soins de Commissions speciales qui auraient a se conformer dans leur travail aux principes arretes dans le Traite de Paix.

Procedant a l'examen de la premiere question soulevee par le Baron Komura sur l'echange des prisonniers de guerre (Annexes Nos. VIII et IX) M. Witte a fait observer que, sauf la redaction française, il n'avait pas d'objection en principe au texte de l'article propose a ce sujet par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon, mais comme il pourrait se faire que le calcul des depenses reelles et directes effectuees par le Japon, la composition des comptes ainsi que l'examen eventuel par les autorites russes de ces documents exigent un certain laps de temps, il pense qu'il serait impossible de fixer dans l'article même la date exacte a laquelle devraient être payes les comptes des dépenses. M. Witte a ajouté qu'aussitôt que ces travaux seraient terminés le Gouvernement Russe procéderait au versement de la somme établie, dans un délai de quelques jours. Le Baron Komura consentant à dire dans l'article que ces comptes "seront payés dans le plus bref délai," cette rédaction a été adoptée par la Conférence.

Concernant la deuxième question relative à l'établissement des relations de commerce entre les deux Puissances (Annexes Nos. X et XI), les Plenipotentiaires du Japon ont exprimé dans leur notice que les traités de commerce entre le Japon et la Russie ayant été annulés par la guerre, il serait nécessaire d'insérer dans le Traité de Paix un article spécial stipulant que les Puissances adopteront comme base de leurs relations commerciales jusqu'à la conclusion d'un nouveau traité, le système du traitement réciproque sur le pied de la nation la plus favorisée.

M. Witte a fait remarquer qu'il croyait que la guerre une fois terminée, tous les traités et conventions qui étaient en vigueur avant la guerre reprenaient leur force, la guerre suspendant seulement leur force exécutoire, mais qu'il voudrait s'assurer de l'opinion de M. de Martens.

M. de Martens a expliqué qu'il est d'usage d'insérer dans le traité de paix un article spécial portant que les traités qui existaient avant la guerre rentreraient de nouveau en vigueur.

Le Baron Komura a fait observer que l'usage même d'insérer un tel article prouve qu'on ne considérerait pas comme un principe du droit international la remise en vigueur des traités par le fait même de la conclusion de la paix. Il prouverait au contraire le principe de l'annulation et non pas de la suspension de la force des traités par le fait de la guerre. Dans le cas présent, il y aurait deux moyens; soit faire revivre par un article spécial le traité qui était en vigueur avant la guerre, soit conclure un nouveau traité. Mais, estimant qu'il était plus avantageux pour les relations commerciales entre les deux pays de conclure un nouveau traité, il proposait de stipuler dans le Traité de Paix que, jusqu'à la conclusion d'un nouveau traité les deux Puissances adopteront la règle ci-dessus indiquée.

M. Witte a répondu qu'il n'avait aucune objection à l'élaboration d'un nouveau traité, au lieu de faire revivre l'ancien, mais qu'au point de vue pratique il serait préférable pour les deux Parties de dire simplement que les traités qui existaient avant la guerre entreraient de nouveau en vigueur et continueraient à être exécutoires jusqu'à la conclusion d'un nouveau traité.

Le Baron Komura a dit qu'il était préférable de conclure un nouveau traité, en stipulant le traitement des relations commerciales jusqu'à cette conclusion suivant la manière proposée par lui, parce qu'il y avait quelques détails dans l'ancien traité, qui ne pourraient peut-être pas être remis en vigueur au point de vue des intérêts commerciaux des deux pays. Il a ajouté qu'un nouveau traité à conclure ne différerait pas sensiblement, en principe, de l'ancien traité et que telle était d'ailleurs l'intention du Gouvernement Japonais. M. Witte a répondu qu'il consentirait à la proposition du Baron Komura, mais croyait nécessaire qu'on dit clairement dans l'article que le nouveau traité à conclure aura comme base l'ancien Traité de 1895. Le Baron Komura ayant consenti à l'insertion de cette pensée dans l'article la question a été réglée.

M. Witte a cependant fait remarquer que le dernier passage de l'article propose, sur la nomination d'un consul à Vladivostok devrait être traité à part et ne pas figurer dans le Traité de Paix. Il a ajouté que le consentement à cette proposition serait une concession unilatérale de la part de la Russie, et que par conséquent, pour y consentir, il lui faudrait probablement demander la nomination de consuls russes dans un port analogue japonais. Le Baron Komura a fait remarquer que cette question avait été l'objet de discussions prolongées entre les deux Puissances antérieurement à la guerre et que par conséquent il voulait la résoudre à cette occasion, mais qu'il n'avait aucune objection à ce qu'elle fût renvoyée à l'époque de la négociation du traité de commerce. Les Plenipotentiaires ont décidé d'adopter cet avis.

Concernant la troisième question, sur l'arrange-ment des services de raccordement des chemins de fer japonais et russes en Manchourie (Annexes Nos. XII et XIII) les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont accepté le projet d'article proposé par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon.

Passant à la quatrième question sur l'échange des ratifications du Traité (Annexes Nos. XIV et XV), les Plenipotentiaires des deux Parties, après avoir échangé leurs opinions à ce sujet, ont décidé dans le but d'accélérer cette affaire d'adopter le mode suivant: lorsque le Traité sera conclu et signé, les Plenipotentiaires le présenteront à leurs Gouvernements respectifs. Aussitôt qu'il aura obtenu la ratification Impériale, le Gouvernement du Japon en fera part par télégraphie à l'Ambassadeur des Etats Unis d'Amérique à Saint-Petersbourg, et le Gouvernement de Russie au Ministre de France à Tokyo pour qu'ils en saisissent les deux Gouvernements et que ces annonces tiendraient lieu de l'échange des ratifications en règle.

Toutes les questions de fond étant ainsi réglées, les Plenipotentiaires ont décidé de confier la rédaction du Traité de Paix à M. Denison, assisté de M. M. Adatci et Otchiaï et à M. M. de Martens et Pokotiloff, assistés de M. de Plancon.

Après avoir élaboré une communication à la presse (Annexe No. XVI), la séance est levée à 5 heures du soir.

ANNEXE No. I.

La notice présentée par les Plenipotentiaires du Japon à la séance du 23 Août et formulant en quatre points la proposition de restaurer à la Russie la partie nord de Sakhaline moyennant une somme de 1,200,000,000 iens, a fait l'objet de la plus sérieuse considération de la part du Gouvernement Impérial de Russie.

En réponse à cette notice, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont l'honneur d'informer les Plenipotentiaires du Japon que le versement de toute somme, exceptée celle pour l'entretien des prisonniers de guerre, étant contraire à l'une des principales bases exposées par la Russie lors de l'ouverture des négociations, le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie se voit dans l'impossibilité de consentir à la proposition précitée.

Les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont également présenté à la Conférence des raisons très sérieuses pour démontrer l'importance pour la Russie de la possession de toute l'île de Sakhaline.

Toutefois Sa Majesté l'Empereur, afin de donner un nouveau témoignage de son sincère désir de contribuer au rétablissement de la paix en Extrême Orient, consent à céder au Japon la partie sud de l'île de Sakhaline, à condition que la partie nord reste en la possession de la Russie, sans aucune compensation pécuniaire. Il est bien entendu que le Japon devra dans ce cas garantir la liberté de navigation dans le Détroit de Laperouse et s'engager à ne prendre aucune mesure militaire dans la partie de Sakhaline occupée par lui.

En présentant ce projet à la considération des Plenipotentiaires du Japon, les Plenipotentiaires de Russie ont l'honneur de déclarer sur l'ordre de leur Auguste Maître, que ce projet forme la dernière concession que la Russie puisse faire dans le but unique d'arriver à une entente.

ANNEXE No. II.

The Japanese Government sincerely believe that they are justly entitled to claim reimbursement of the expenses of the war, but taking note of the absolute refusal of the Russian Government to entertain such a claim, and considering the consequences that would inevitably ensue if they should persist in their demand, have, for the sake of humanity and civilization and in recognition of the true interest of Japan and Russia, authorized the Plenipotentiaires of Japan to offer to withdraw the claim to such reimbursement, provided Russia recognizes as a fait accompli the occupation of the Island of Saghalien by Japan.

ANNEXE No. IV.

The undersigned, Plenipotentiaires of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, in execution of the provisions of Article II of the Treaty of Peace signed this day, have agreed upon the following additional Article:

Japan and Russia mutually engage completely and simultaneously to withdraw their military forces from Manchuria and its neighbourhood in three periods as follows:

1st Period.—The withdrawals shall begin within ten days after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace and be completed within four months.

The Japanese forces in Manchuria are to be withdrawn within a line connecting Hsin-min-tun; Moukden; Fu-shun; Hseng-king; Hwai-jen and Chho-san, and the Japanese forces on the Russo-Corean frontier, are to be withdrawn to the right bank of the River Tumen. The Russian forces in Manchuria are to be withdrawn within a line connecting Petuna; Tao-lai-cho; Shan-ho-tun; Omoso, and Hunchun; and the Russian forces on the Russo-Corean frontier are to be withdrawn to the left bank of the River Tumen.

2nd Period.—The withdrawals shall be completed within four months from the expiration of the 1st period.

The Japanese forces are to be withdrawn within a line connecting Niu-cha-tun; Tashih-kiao; Hsiu-yen; Feng-Hwang-cheng and the mouth of the Anping River (Anping ho).

The Russian forces are to be withdrawn within a line connecting Hu-lar-chi; Tsi-tsi-har; Merguen and Aihun.

3rd Period.—The withdrawals shall be completed within two months from the expiration of the 2nd period.

The Japanese forces are to be withdrawn within the leased territory of Liao-tung and the frontiers of Corea.

The Russian forces are to be withdrawn within Russian territory.

The foregoing additional Article shall be considered as ratified with the ratification of the Treaty of Peace.

ANNEXE No. VI.

The Plenipotentiaires of Japan propose with a view to make provision for the due protection of the Japanese and Russian railways in Manchuria, and at the same time in order to avoid giving grounds for misunderstanding, that an arrangement to the following effect be concluded by means of a protocol to be annexed to the Treaty of Peace:

Until such time as China is able and ready to assume and fulfill the duty, the Imperial Governments of Japan and Russia reserve to themselves the right to maintain railway guards for the due protection of their respective Manchurian railway lines, properties and traffic. The two Governments, however, reciprocally engage that the guards to be so maintained, shall not in any case exceed five persons to each kilometre of railway.

ANNEXE No. VIII.

As soon as possible after the exchange of the ratifications of this Treaty, all prisoners of war shall be reciprocally restored. The Imperial Governments of Japan and Russia shall each appoint a special commissioner to take charge of prisoners. All prisoners in the hands of one Government, shall be delivered to and received by the special commissioner of the other Government, in such convenient numbers and at such convenient port or ports of the delivering State as such delivering State shall notify in advance to the special commissioner of the receiving State. The Governments of Japan and Russia shall present to each other within..... days after the delivery of prisoners has been completed, a statement of the expenditures respectively incurred by them for the care and maintenance of prisoners from the date of capture or surrender up to the time of death or delivery. Russia engages to repay to Japan within..... days after the exchange of the statements as above provided, the difference between the actual amount so expended by Japan and the actual amount similarly disbursed by Russia.

ANNEXE No. X.

All Treaties of Commerce between Japan and Russia having been annulled by the war, the Imperial Governments of Japan and Russia engage to adopt as the basis of their commercial relations, pending the conclusion of a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, the system of reciprocal treatment on the footing of the most favoured nation in which are included import and export duties, customs formalities, and transit and tonnage dues and the admission and treatment of the agents, subjects and vessels of one country in the territories of the other. The Imperial Russian Government agree to the appointment of a regular Japanese Consul to reside at Vladivostok.

ANNEXE No. XII.

The Imperial Governments of Japan and Russia, with a view to promote and facilitate intercourse and traffic, will, as soon as possible, conclude a separate convention for the regulation of their connecting railway services in Manchuria.

ANNEXE No. XIV.

Telegraphic exemplifications of this Treaty shall be submitted to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the Emperor of Russia for approval and certificates that approval has been accorded, shall be exchanged between the Representatives of Japan and Russia at..... as soon as possible, and not later than..... days from the date hereof. Such approval shall take the place of ratification and shall, in all respects, have the same value and effect as ratification and from the date of the certificates above mentioned, the said Treaty shall enter into full force and vigour and be binding in all its parts.

ANNEXE No. XVI.

In the morning sitting of August 29, complete agreement in principle on all points has been arrived at by the Conference and it has been decided to proceed to elaborate the details.

In the afternoon sitting of August 29, the Conference has discussed the details of the Treaty of Peace. It has been decided to entrust the drafting of the clauses of the Treaty to M. Denison, Legal Adviser to Foreign Office of Japan, and Privy Councillor de Martens, of the Foreign Office of Russia, so as to finish the work as soon as possible.

PROTOCOLE No. XI.

Plusieurs des questions qui ont été débattues et arrêtées en principe à la séance du 29 Août, exigeaient une délibération ultérieure concernant la forme en laquelle les décisions prises seraient exprimées, ainsi que la rédaction même des actes formulant ces décisions.

Au cours de plusieurs conférences privées qui ont eu lieu le 1er et le 2 Septembre, les Plénipotentiaires sont convenus de ce qui suit :

1° Les bases principales du mode d'évacuation de la Manchourie feraient l'objet d'un article additionnel, annexe au Traité de Paix et dont la rédaction a été arrêtée par les Plénipotentiaires. (Annexe No. I).

2° La question de Sakhaline formerait l'objet de deux articles du Traité et d'un article additionnel; la rédaction de ces trois pièces a été également arrêtée par les Plénipotentiaires. (Annexe No. II).

Les questions suivantes formeraient chacune un article du Traité, à savoir :

3° Adoption du système du traitement réciproque sur le pied de la nation la plus favorisée jusqu'à la conclusion d'un nouveau traité de commerce. (Annexe No. III).

4° Echange des prisonniers de guerre. (Annexe No. IV).

5° Mode de ratification du Traité de Paix. (Annexe No. V).

6° Règlement des services de raccordement des chemins de fer. (Annexe No. VI).

Les Plénipotentiaires sont en outre convenus de déclarer que le mot "contrôle" employé dans l'Article II du texte français du Traité devait être compris dans un sens aussi étendu que le mot "control" employé dans le même Article du texte anglais du dit Traité.

Portsmouth, le 5 Septembre 1905.

ANNEXE No. I.

Les Gouvernements Impériaux du Japon et de Russie s'engagent mutuellement à commencer le retrait de leurs forces militaires du territoire de la Manchourie simultanément et immédiatement après la mise en vigueur du Traité de Paix; et dans une période de dix huit mois à partir de cette date les Armées des deux Puissances seront complètement retirées de la Manchourie, à l'exception du territoire à bail de la presqu'île de Liaotong.

Les forces des deux Puissances occupant les positions frontales seront retirées les premières.

Les Hautes Parties Contractantes se réservent le droit de maintenir des gardes pour protéger leurs lignes de chemin de fer respectives en Manchourie. Le nombre de ces gardes n'excèdera pas quinze hommes par kilomètre; et dans la limite de ce nombre maximum, les Commandants des Armées japonaises et russes fixeront de commun accord, le nombre des gardes qui seront employés, le plus minime possible conformément aux exigences réelles.

Les Commandants des forces japonaises et russes en Manchourie s'entendront sur tous les détails relatifs à l'exécution de l'évacuation conformément aux principes ci-dessus énumérés, et prendront de commun accord, les mesures nécessaires pour effectuer l'évacuation aussitôt que possible et en tous cas pas plus tard que dans la période de dix huit mois.

ANNEXE No. II.

Le Gouvernement Impérial de Russie cède au Gouvernement Impérial du Japon en perpétuelle et en pleine souveraineté la partie sud de l'île de Sakhaline et toutes les îles qui y sont adjacentes, ainsi que tous les travaux et propriétés publiques qu'y trouvent. Le cinquième parallèle de latitude nord est adopté comme la limite du territoire cédé. La ligne frontière exacte de ce territoire sera déterminée conformément aux dispositions de l'Article additionnel II annexe à ce Traité.

Le Japon et la Russie conviennent mutuellement de ne construire dans leurs possessions respectives sur l'île de Sakhaline et sur les îles qui y sont adjacentes aucune fortification ni travaux militaires semblables. De même, ils s'engagent respectivement à ne prendre aucune mesure militaire qui pourrait entraver la libre navigation de Détroits de Laperouse et de Tartarie.

Il est réservé aux sujets russes habitants du territoire cédé au Japon de vendre leurs propriétés immobilières et de se retirer dans leur pays; mais, s'ils préfèrent rester dans le territoire cédé, ils seront maintenus et protégés dans le plein exercice de leurs industries et droits de propriété à la condition de se soumettre aux lois et à la juridiction japonaises. Le Japon aura la pleine liberté de retirer le droit de résidence dans ce territoire à tous les habitants se trouvant dans l'incapacité politique ou administrative, ou de les deporter de ce territoire. Il s'engage toutefois à ce que les droits de propriété de ces habitants soient pleinement respectés.

Aussitôt que possible après la mise en vigueur du présent Traité une Commission de Délimitation, composée d'un nombre égal de membres qui seront nommés respectivement par les deux Hautes Parties Contractantes, marquera, sur les lieux d'une manière permanente, la ligne exacte entre les possessions japonaise et russe de l'île de Sakhaline. La Commission sera tenue, autant que les considérations topographiques le permettent, à suivre le cinquième parallèle de latitude nord pour la ligne de démarcation, et dans le cas où des déviations de la dite ligne sur quelques points seront trouvées nécessaires, compensation en sera faite par des déviations corrélatives sur d'autres points. Il sera, de même, le devoir de la dite Commission de préparer une liste et description des îles adjacentes qui seront comprises dans la cession, et finalement la Commission préparera et signera les cartes constatant les limites du territoire cédé. Les travaux de la Commission seront soumis à l'approbation des Hautes Parties Contractantes.

ANNEXE No. III.

Le Traité de Commerce et de Navigation entre le Japon et la Russie ayant été annulé par la guerre, les Gouvernements Impériaux du Japon et de Russie s'engagent à adopter comme base de leurs relations commerciales, jusqu'à la conclusion d'un nouveau traité de commerce et de navigation sur la base du Traité qui était en vigueur antérieurement à la guerre actuelle, le système du traitement réciproque sur le pied de la nation la plus favorisée, y compris les tarifs d'importation et d'exportation, les formalités de douane, les droits de transit et de tonnage et l'admission et le traitement des agents, des sujets et des vaisseaux d'un pays dans le territoire de l'autre.

ANNEXE No. IV.

Aussitôt que possible après la mise en vigueur du présent Traité, tous les prisonniers de guerre seront réciproquement restitués. Les Gouvernements Impériaux du Japon et de Russie nommeront, chacun de son côté, un Commissaire spécial qui se chargera des prisonniers. Tous les prisonniers se trouvant entre les mains de l'un des Gouvernements seront remis au Commissaire de l'autre Gouvernement ou à son représentant dûment autorisé, qui les recevra en tel nombre et dans tels ports convenables de l'Etat remettant que ce dernier aurait notifié d'avance au Commissaire de l'Etat recevant.

Les Gouvernements du Japon et de Russie présenteront l'un à l'autre, le plus tôt possible après que la remise des prisonniers aura été achevée, un compte documenté des dépenses directes faites respectivement par eux pour le soin et l'entretien des prisonniers depuis la date de la capture ou de la reddition jusqu'à celle de la mort ou de la remise. La Russie s'engage à rembourser au Japon, aussitôt que possible après l'échange de ces comptes comme il est stipulé ci-dessus, la différence entre le montant réel ainsi dépensé par le Japon et le montant réel également déboursé par la Russie.

ANNEXE No. V.

Le présent Traité sera ratifié par Leurs Majestés l'Empereur du Japon et l'Empereur de toutes les Russies. Cette ratification sera, dans le plus bref délai possible et en tous cas pas plus tard que dans cinquante jours à partir de la date de la signature du Traité, notifiée aux Gouvernements Impériaux du Japon et de Russie respectivement, par l'intermédiaire du Ministre de France à Tokio et de l'Ambassadeur des Etats Unis d'Amérique à Saint Petersburg, et à partir de la date de la dernière de ces notifications ce Traité sera, dans toutes ses parties, mis en pleine vigueur.

L'échange formel des ratifications se fera à Washington aussitôt que possible.

ANNEXE No. VI.

Les Gouvernements Impériaux du Japon et de Russie, en vue de favoriser et de faciliter les relations et le trafic, concluront, aussitôt que possible, une convention séparée pour le règlement de leurs services de raccordement de chemins de fer en Manchourie.

PROTOCOLE FINALE (No. XII).

SEANCE DU 5 SEPTEMBRE 1905.

La séance est ouverte à 3 heures 50.

Etaient présents :

Pour le Japon :

✓ BARON KODAMA, Governor-General of Formosa, will leave Kelung on Jan. 22nd for Tokyo.

THE work of floating the Mikasa is in progress. Pumping operations were commenced on Jan. 10th.

THE cruiser Chikaya and destroyer Kamikaze have been ordered to join the South China Squadron.

COLONEL K. Tachibana has been appointed an attaché to the embassy in Washington. He was attached to Baron Komura's suite on the occasion of the Portsmouth Treaty and the Peking Convention.

THE destroyer Shiratsuyu will be launched on Feb. 12th at the Mitsu Bishi Shipbuilding Yard, Nagasaki.

THE fiji reports that Count Arco Valley, German Minister, will leave Tokyo at the beginning of March for home.

THE Egyptian Budget shows a surplus of £500,000. Taxation amounting to £332,000 will be remitted.

FIRE broke out on the morning of Jan. 17th in the Nakazawa-ro, Kakegawa, near Shidzuoka, destroying thirteen houses.

TWELVE Chinese students who recently returned from Japan have been appointed instructors in the Canton Military College.

A CASE of suspected cholera is reported in Tokyo. The patient is a woman residing in Minami-machi, Aoyama.

MR. K. SEKI, Superintendent of the Tokyo Metropolitan Police Office, was released from office on Jan. 17th at his own request.

MR. MAKINO, Minister at Vienna, left on Jan. 12th for home. Mr. Nishi, first Secretary of the Legation, will have charge for the time being.

THE Great Northern Telegraph Company, Shanghai, reports that telegraphic communication between Saghalien and Vladivostok has been reopened.

It is reported by a Hongkong telegram to the Kokumin that the money market there, which has been in a depressed state, is now recovering activity.

A MAN armed with a sword broke into the house of a farmer at Kawasaki on the night of January 14th. The intruder stole a small amount of money.

THE Tokyo Rope Manufacturing Co. intends to establish a branch at Kokura, Kyushu. For this purpose the Company will add yen 250,000 to the present capital.

THE Singapore Government has introduced a Bill providing for the more adequate treatment of "beachcombers," who have become a great nuisance there.

A SEVERE storm was experienced at Nagasaki on the morning of Jan. 11th. A German steamer in the harbour went ashore. She was brought off by the Oura Maru.

A SHIMONOSEKI telegram says that Baron Shibusawa and some other capitalists of Tokyo and Osaka intend to establish an iron foundry at Nagatoma near Kokura.

ON Jan. 14th snow fell in Kanazawa, over a foot in depth. Traffic on the railway was interrupted. Yokkaichi and places to the westward were also visited by snow the same day.

THE Hochi says that Count Katsura, ex-Premier, and Mr. Kiyoura, ex-Minister for Communications, will proceed to America and Europe after the close of the present session of the Diet.

THE Kokumin reports that Mr. Huntington Wilson, the first secretary of the American Legation, who now is acting as Chargé d'Affaires, has been appointed an under-Secretary of State.

THE American steamer Ohio IV has been purchased by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and renamed Hiroaki Maru. A new steamer for the same company was launched on Jan. 9th, at the Osaka Iron Foundry, and named Takamatsu Maru. These two vessels will be employed on the line between Japan and the Korean coasts.

DEPOSITS in the post saving offices throughout the Empire on Jan. 11th amounted to yen 52,104,581.30. The sum shows an increase of yen 13,700,823 over that on the same day last year.

Two convicts of Uruga Prison, Saitama prefecture, quarrelled on Jan. 13th. G. Otsuka, assaulted Y. Iwata with a piece of timber and inflicted severe injuries on the head. The victim died some hours later.

An official telegram says that a train with troops and ammunition from Hiroshima was derailed at 3.15 a.m. on Jan. 11th while passing the Ichino-miya station, the result being that one soldier was killed and four were injured.

PART of the telegraph wire between the village of Kimio, near Kanagawa, and Tsurumi was stolen on Jan. 12th. The private telephone line between the Odawara Electric Railway Co. and its branch office at Oiso, was similarly treated the same day.

A COMMITTEE representing the city of Yokohama have decided to present to Admiral Togo, Vice-Admiral Kamimura and Vice-Admiral Dewa, alcove-ornaments of silver, which are now being manufactured, as a token of the profound thanks of the citizens.

MRS. SEI NAKAJIMA, wife of Naval Lieutenant J. Nakajima, residing in Iida-machi, Tokyo, attempted to commit suicide on the evening of Jan. 14th by cutting her throat with a razor. It is reported that she had been suffering from brain complaint for some weeks.

THE net income of the Tokyo Gas Company for the last half-year of 1905 was yen 488,238 and an interim dividend at the rate of 15 per cent per annum will be paid. The net profit of the Nippon Railway Co for the last half year aggregated yen 7,958,580.

THE death is announced of Lieut.-Colonel Fukabori. This officer participated in the battles of Port Arthur and distinguished himself by reaching the top of the 203-metre hill when it was captured by the besiegers. Later he was the Chief of Staff of the Saghalien Army.

DURING 1905 there were no fewer than 1,643 people banished from Hongkong. Of that number 678 had been sent from the Straits Settlements and had of course to be passed on to other places, 324 were undesirables from Saigon who were similarly dealt with, and 695 were old offenders who had come out of gaol, where they had been imprisoned for petty offences.

THE local manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation has received a telegram from his Head Office in Hongkong to the effect that, subject to audit, the Bank Dividend for the half year ending 31st Dec., 1905 will probably be £1.15 Bonus in addition to Dividend £1, added to Silver Reserve $10 lacs, carried forward to next half year $17 lacs.

A GENERAL meeting of the Kanegafuchi Cotton Spinning Co. was held on Jan. 13th in the Bankers' Club, Tokyo. The accounts for the last half of 1905 were submitted. The net income was set down at yen 1,506,420. Of this amount, yen 464,272 was to be paid as dividend at the rate of 16 per cent. per annum (yen 4 per share); yen 464,272 was set apart as reserve for equalization of dividends; yen 500,000 as legal reserve, and yen 100,000 was paid as bonus to employees; and the remainder was carried forward to the next account.

GENERAL NOGI'S TRIUMPH.

Monday, January 15.

The Tokyo newspapers are full of articles eulogising General Nogi. He is called the incarnation of Bushido. The Fiji recalls what a character the siege of Port Arthur obtained at one time, how to go there was regarded by the army as certain death, and how officers and men alike while declaring themselves always ready to die for their country, could not but lament that at Port Arthur they had to fight not against living enemies but against stone and iron. The only man that remained serenely confident throughout all these troubles was General Nogi. He never faltered. Even the deaths of his own two sons did not shake his calm resolve and although we know that no one felt more profoundly for the fate of the many brave men whom he sent down to death, yet it was Nogi's true warrior ways that kept up the spirit of his army and thus did more to bring about the ultimate fall of the fortress than did any other factor in the attack. At Mukden, too, the splendid flanking movement made by his forces was a worthy pendant to the great feat at Port Arthur, and through all these momentous happenings and magnificent deeds he remained the same simple-hearted self-effacing soldier, always ready to decry his own deeds and to laud those of other. This is Bushido in its finest form; a true model.

This is the tone of all the newspapers. The Fiji uses the expression bushi no tenkei (model bushi), which appears also in the Kokumin, and the latter adds the term Bushido no gouke (incarnation of Bushido). The Kokumin recalls the verse composed by General Nogi after the death of his eldest son:—

Seiba inanagazu
Hito katarazu
Kinshu jōgai
Shayo ni tatsu

"No war horse neighs; no voice is heard. I stand under the rays of the setting sun before the castle of Kinchow." There is a sentiment of inexpressible loneliness in this, the bereaved father's, description of his feelings when finding himself at evening in the place where his son had fallen. In fact, in all these eulogies of General Nogi one detects how admiration of the man enhances the nation's applause of the general. His verse composed on the eve of returning to Japan contains a sentiment which appeals profoundly to every Japanese heart: he asks how he shall meet the aged parents whose sons he has left behind on the battle-field (Hazu ware nan no gan arite furo wo min gaisan konnichi iku hito ka kayeru), but he says nothing of the two sons of his own who lie at Nanshan and Port Arthur.

We need not reproduce the comments of the other journals. They are all in one tone. The Nichi Nichi declares that the feelings of the nation as it welcomes this returning hero are inexpressible. It recalls how he never fared better than the commonest soldier under his command and how, in the depth of winter, he never allowed himself the luxury of a fire unless his men were similarly provided. These are the details that appeal most forcibly to the Japanese, and make up their conception of an ideal commanding officer. No wonder he was beloved by every man in the armies he led.

In passing Hiranuma station opportunity was taken to render an ovation to the hero of Port Arthur. Governor Sufu, Mayor Ichihara and Madame Watanabe presented addresses and gifts, and upon General Nogi making a brief reply of thanks he was greeted with the most enthusiastic bansai ever heard in this district. At Kobe, we understand, the British Consul presented General Nogi with a basket of flowers and some Indian merchants gave him a silver cigar case.

Tuesday, January 16.

The reception given to General Nogi on his arrival in Tokyo on the 14th instant was quite extraordinary. The whole station and its approaches were crowded so densely that when the favourite General and his staff emerged from the train movement in any direction was almost impossible. Very soon it became out of the question to distinguish where the General was or to get into his vicinity, and had not one of his staff carried aloft a wreath of flowers there would have been nothing to focus this big, seething and cheering mob which seemed to be transported by ungovernable excitement. Even the British Ambassador could not get near enough to shake hands with the General. Among the staff was Major-General Ichinohe, the hero of one of the principal attacks on the fortress. As the party emerged from the station the firing of salutes, the discharge of fire-works and the wild shouting of tens of thousands of people made a scene of extraordinary interest. From Shimbashi to the Palace the streets were literally packed with people many of whom strewed the General's path with flowers, and all the while one continuous roar of cheers reverberated. Arrived at the Palace, the General and his Chief of Staff, Major-Gen. Ichinohe, were received by the Emperor, to whom the report of the Third Army's operations was read by the General, who seemed much affected as he recounted his own mistakes and the terrible loss of life that had attended the operations against Port Arthur. In this respect the report differed from any previously presented. The Emperor, of course, made no allusion to these self-reproaches and regrets. His Majesty merely applauded in unequivocal terms the excellent strategy and tactics that had marked General Nogi's conduct of the war and the bravery and devotion of the officers and men forming his army.

After the audience at the Palace General Nogi and his Staff proceeded to the Head Quarter Staff's offices where a banquet was given to them, the host being Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, who was supported by Princes Kanin, Nashimoto and Kuni, and by Generals Kuroki, Asada, Murata, Okura and other distinguished officers. On his way home General Nogi paid a visit to the Palace of the Prince Imperial, and then pursued his way to the Azabu district where his house is. In this district another tumultuous welcome awaited him from the citizens. Even after he had entered his house, where some 200 distinguished persons had assembled to receive him, mobs of people came together from time to time, and surrounded the place cheering wildly. On these occasions the General never failed to emerge to speak some words of thanks in his own simple unaffected way. But brilliant as this welcome was it could not obliterate the fact that the General was returning to a desolate home, and that, in an upper chamber, the relics of his two only sons lay awaiting him. It can not be doubted that sympathy with this great sorrow influenced the attitude of the people. The Asahi relates that the General led General Oba to this room and proposed that they should drink a cup to the memory of the two lads, but General Oba had not the heart to respond and General Nogi himself could not restrain his emotion.

Wednesday, January 17.

General Nogi's report, as read to the Emperor at the audience on the 14th inst., was the following:—"I had the honour to be appointed to the command of the Third Army in May, 1904, and was entrusted with the duty of taking Port Arthur. In June we forced Kenzan, and in July we repelled a counter-attack of the enemy, taking advantage of it to advance and capture his position. We thus reached the Fenghwan-shan and Kantashan line, forced the enemy back to within his main line of defences, and aided by strong cooperative movements on the part of the Navy, succeeded in thoroughly investing the fortress. In August we captured Taku-shan and Takasaki-yama, and following this up with a powerful and sudden attack, we obtained possession of the two forts of East and West Panlung-shan. Thereafter we continued the attack by regular siege operations, gradually forcing our way close to the fortress. At the close of November and the beginning of December we attacked 203-metre Hill with all our strength and finally captured it, thus gaining a position from which we were able to cannonade and sink the ships that lay concealed in the harbour. Meanwhile the work of advancing by saps continued, and enabled us to take three permanent forts on the front face, whence we advanced at once to the heights near Wang-tai and were on the point of escalading the interior of the fortress, when in January, 1905, the enemy's commanding officer asked leave to surrender and the work of investment came to an end. When this occurred the main bodies of the two armies were facing each other near the Shaho and the time for a battle was just ripe. Therefore the northward movement of the Third Army was impatiently awaited. Accordingly during January we commenced to move, took part in the battle near Mukden and carried out on the extreme left of our armies a turning operation which broke the enemy's right. We then pushed on rapidly to the north-west of Mukden and threatened his rear. This fight lasted for over ten days consecutively and we pursued the enemy as far as the Hsintaitz-Shih-fusu lines, whence a part of our force, advancing, occupied Changtu and the Kinkiatun-Kwangping line. Thereafter a large body of the enemy's cavalry attacked our left rear but were driven back. The preparations of the army were now completed and we were awaiting the moment for renewing the attack when in the middle of August we received orders for a truce.

"That the army under my command succeeded in carrying out its plan of operations, was due to Your Majesty's virtues, to the dispositions made by my superiors who directed the campaign and to the cooperation of our comrade-armies. During sixteen months of war our troops frequently came into violent collision with a strong foe. Fighting with valour and loyalty and regarding death as merely re-birth, they fell under the enemy's bullets, fell under his bayonets, and all shouting "bansai" closed their eyes cheerfully. I can not but wish that I had not to report these things. But that with such gallant and loyal officers and soldiers I required a long period of half a year to capture the fortress of Port Arthur after heavy sacrifices; that in the flanking engagement at Mukden"—here 30 ideographs are omitted from the published report. They evidently refer to some incident in connexion with which the General severely blames himself—"and that when a large force of the enemy's cavalry moved against our left wing, I did not seize the fortunate opportunity to crush them, is a source of life-long regret to me and of profound humiliation. Returning now in triumph to the foot of the Throne, and being granted the favour of reverentially reporting the events of the war, I humbly join with the officers and soldiers under my command as recipients of the Imperial graciousness. It pains us to look back and think that our comrades who died in battle or of disease can not share this honour with us.

"In obedience to Your Majesty's command I venture thus to offer a report of the general features of the fighting, and to accompany it with a list of the killed and wounded, as well as with accounts of the provisions supplied to the soldiers and the sanitary arrangements."

It is related that the General was deeply moved when reading certain portions of this report, and that his emotion nearly overcame him when he referred to the terrible losses incurred at Port Arthur. Doubtless the excited part of the document contained a statement of the brief delay in throwing his forces across the right rear of the Russians at Mukden, a delay which is said to have saved Kuropatkin from virtual annihilation, but which no soldier believes to have been avoidable. The turning movement made by Nogi's force at Mukden is probably the finest operation of war that was ever witnessed, and to have carried it to completion 24 hours sooner may fairly be said to have been beyond the power of human endurance.

Thursday, January 18.

The expressions of self-reproach contained in General Nogi's report to the Throne have elicited wide-spread admiration from his countrymen. It is known to have been a source of the profoundest pain to the General that such heavy losses had occurred among his troops at Port Arthur, and rumour says that he exposed his own person repeatedly to show his sympathy with the gallant dead and possibly to share their fate. This conduct appears to have reached the Emperor's ears for before the Battle of Mukden His Majesty addressed a special message to Nogi requiring him to take care of himself. The Third Army again suffered terribly at Mukden. It took the field without its vacancies being fully filled, and the turning movement which devolved on it led to such fierce fighting that one regiment was reduced to a single company. All this seems to have augmented the General's grief and inspired the expressions of bitter regret and self-accusation which appeared in his report to the Throne. Tokyo newspapers continue to laud him. He could not, indeed, have chosen any surer road to popular esteem, for if there be one trait of disposition that the Japanese love more than another, it is self-effacement.

GENERALS OKU AND NOZU RETURN.

General Oku's report, delivered to the Throne on the 13th instant, was comparatively brief. He mentions in the first place the achievement of the Navy which landed his men in the immediate vicinity of the Liaotung Peninsula and thus enabled him to cut the enemy's communications, and to march upon Nanshan, thus segregating Port Arthur. But he says nothing whatever about the battle of Nanshan itself. Then he alludes to Telisu in words which recall the style of the Anabasis:—"Hence we advanced north and met at Telisu the enemy moving south." Equally laconic are his allusions to the fight at Tashichiao, the capture of Yingchow and the participation of his troops in the battles of Liaoyang, the Shaho, Heikantai and Mukden. "Joining in these battles we succeeded in winning victories." Then he passes on to attribute it all to the able strategy of the Head Quarter Staff, to the cooperation of the other armies, to the competent discharge of their responsibilities by the various military departments and—thus at length he arrives at his own command—to the conduct of the officers and men under his orders who gave their lives to discharge their duties as soldiers. Finally he pays a tribute to the loyalty of the nation, and he concludes by declaring that over and above all these elements of success stood the inspiring influence of the Sovereign himself. His final words are for the brave dead who unhappily can not share this hour of triumph or see the blessing of peace restored to their country.

The Emperor's reply was simply an expression of profound praise for the gallantry and skill shown by the Second Army.

General Nozu entered Tokyo on the 17th instant, and received an enthusiastic greeting. The Fourth Army, which General Nozu commanded, formed the centre of the Japanese line and it thus happened that no special feat fell to its lot. But military men know with what ability this Army, under the leadership of one of Japan's oldest and most experienced generals, discharged its difficult and important duties. General Nozu is a genuine type of the Japanese soldier—quiet, unassuming, genial and thoroughly wedded to his duties. He has distinguished himself as a leader of troops again and again, and if no achievement stood to his credit except the forcing of Sankwaishan in the battle of the Shaho, he would amply deserve the reception given to him by Tokyo.

The General's welcome on arriving in Tokyo at 10.40 a.m. was scarcely less enthusiastic than that given to General Nogi. He was greeted on alighting from the train by Chamberlains representing the Emperor and the Prince Imperial, as well as of Prince Higashi-Fushimi. The next to grasp his hand was Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, who was followed by Generals Terauchi, Kuroki, Nogi, Nishi and Oshima, by Admiral Togo, by the Ministers of State and by a number of high officers of both services. From Shimbashi to the Sakurada gate the streets were lined on both sides with soldiers and crowds of civilians, and there was the usual display of fire-works from the Hibiya Park as well as more than the usual outburst of cheering.

THE FIRST BIG CRUISER BUILT IN JAPAN.

It appears that the chief naval architect of the new armoured cruiser Tsukuba was Mr. Yamada, who graduated from the Engineering College of the Imperial University in the year 1890 and thereafter studied for three years in England, returning in 1893 when he received an appointment at the Kure station. After the war with China he was again despatched to England, his duty being to supervise the construction of the Asahi, one of Japan's first battle-ships. This kept him for two years in England and on his return he was again appointed to Kure, where he thenceforth served continuously. Interviewed by a member of the Nichi Nichi

Shimbun's staff, he is reported to have said:—"As the Tsukuba was the first really big vessel built in Japan full provision was made for all contingencies, but nevertheless we had some difficulty. The work was commenced on the 14th of January in 1905, and up to June and July things did not move as we had anticipated. We feared that at this rate the launch could not take place at the time intended, but thereafter very rapid progress was made and in the end we were able to launch her before the fixed date. The material required had all been calculated and prepared beforehand so that there was no difficulty. Of course a certain portion of the materials had to be obtained from abroad, but as they all passed into the hands of our workmen it may be said that the ship was entirely constructed in Japan. In the matter of appliances and implements we experienced some incompleteness and imperfection owing to the great size of the vessel, but by degrees implements were fully furnished and the artificers acquired skill so that subsequently we got on excellently. During the first two or three months of the building the workmen's inexperience told against them. Japanese workmen are extraordinarily expert in regard to wooden constructions, but they have had little practice in joining metal plates and in driving rivets, and their strength of arm is not great as compared with English workmen so that some difficulty was encountered from time to time. At the outset this caused us some concern, but gradually as the men developed skill there ceased to be any sufficient cause for uneasiness. To launch a ship of over ten thousand tons in eleven months is a remarkable rate of speed, yet compared with English work it is still 20 or 30 per cent. too slow. Still as our artificers are now expert there will probably be no such difference hereafter. During the building the smallest number of men employed was 400 and the largest number 1,200, more or less. At the time of our second naval expansion scheme, that is to say, when the Hatsuse, Asahi, Tsuno and Iwate were built in England, our people, whether as superintendents or as students, had witnessed the processes of construction and though they had not actually taken part in the work, the experience gained through the eye proved of great value to them. What may be regarded as progress in construction resulting from the Russo-Japanese war are improvements and alterations in the various parts; not any difference in essentials but only alterations of certain points here and there. The most visible of these is the absence of a ram in the Tsukuba and the Ikoma. The ram has been proved unnecessary by the experience of the recent war. It is now quite clear that in sea-fights where gun-power and torpedo-attacks are vigorously employed the fate of a ship will be decided without going to the point of collision. Apart from this there are improvements in details but they can not be here explained. The sum of the matter is that a great access of experience has been gained in the building of the Tsukuba, so that hereafter there will be no difficulty in constructing two or three ships of over ten thousand tons each at Kure. The Ikoma, a sister-ship of the Tsukuba, was commenced last March and will be finished in about the same time as the Tsukuba took."

The net profit of the Fuji Cotton Spinning Co. for the last half of 1905 was yen 710,109.91, and that of the Fifteenth Bank, commonly known as the Nobles' Bank, for the same period was yen 884,142.

CHINA.

Saturday, January 13.

On the 10th instant an interesting ceremony took place at Tsinan, the capital of Shantung, namely, the official opening of the place to foreign trade and the establishment of a settlement there. This is the first mart that China has ever opened of her own accord, in modern times at any rate, and the occasion thus becomes one of considerable moment, more especially as Shantung is a province with thirty millions of inhabitants and its chief city is correspondingly important. The ceremony seems to have been conducted with much eclat and cordiality. Among the guests entertained by the Governor were the leading German officials of Kiaochow and the Consuls of the United States and Russia at Chefoo. In the evening there was a banquet at which 260 persons were present. It is stated that the space allotted for a foreign settlement is square miles in extent. Wehsien and Chantsun were declared open at the same time. Of course when we speak of this as a purely voluntary act on China's part a reservation is necessary, namely, that the indirect pressure of Germany's presence at Kiaochow is largely responsible. China, in short, is learning the wisdom of constituting all the Powers guardians of her territory by giving them all equal access to it.

The Asahi Shimbun has a telegram from Peking saying that the German Representative at the Court of China is busying himself in the matter of Weihaiwei. He is said to have pointed out to the Chinese Government that, Russia having ceased to hold the lease of Liaotung, the avowed raison d'être of England's presence at Weihaiwei disappears and that she ought to be approached with the object of securing her evacuation of the place. This we take to be one of the many fictitious stories of German diplomatic activity which have been so frequently circulated of late. It is scarcely conceivable that the German Representative can be taking such action, especially at a time when his country is showing an apparently genuine desire to restore its relations with England to their old friendly footing, a desire which England happily is reciprocating. Germany has no title to constitute herself guardian of international morality in East Asia, and she is not at all likely to have arrogated the role.

While certain Japanese publicists are denouncing the Peking Treaty as an unsatisfactory document since it does not secure all the privileges that Japan had, in their opinion, a right to expect, it is interesting to learn that several Chinese publicists are equally hostile to the document on the ground that, by giving too much, it gravely impairs China's sovereign rights. We are strongly disposed to think that any European Power situated as China is would have hesitated long before signing such a treaty, but then it may be added with even more truth that no really self-respecting European Power would have drifted into the unhappy position now occupied by China. However that may be, the movement now telegraphed as being directed against the Treaty may fairly be considered a feature of the agitation which is growing to be general in China and which threatens to prove very embarrassing, the agitation for recovering sovereign rights that are no longer recoverable without serious disturbance, or without long and patient preparation quite foreign apparently to China's present mood.

If, on the one hand, a number of Chinese students have taken their departure from Japan under the influence of what seems to have been a very silly and romantic misinterpretation of the intention of the Japanese authorities, other students seem likely to fill the vacancy thus created. We read in Japanese journals that 18 students have been specially selected by the Governor-General of Manchuria and ordered to proceed at once to Tokyo for the purpose of studying administrative and judicial functions with all possible speed. Here, too, it may be mentioned that the Mongolian Authorities, perturbed, it is alleged, by the doings of Russia beyond their borders, have decided to establish a normal school in Peking and to send thither 50 youths for special training. This sounds a rather remote manner of dealing with a present menace but it is at all events a step in the right direction. Meanwhile the telegraph says that the Chinese students who have returned to Shanghai from China are an object of general ridicule. The North-China Daily News compares them to soshi or Nihilists, and that view is said to be shared by thoughtful persons as a rule.

Monday, January 15.

Mr. Yuan, Vice-Minister of Education in Peking, has had the courage or the temerity to memorialize the Throne in the sense that the Chinese classics—the Four Books and the Five Bibles—of Confucius and Mencius are valueless compared with Western primers of science and that the nation would be much benefited by the substitution of the latter for the former. This recommendation has produced a storm at Court and the question of the moment is how to deal with it. Truly it is difficult to sympathise with radicals so tactless as Mr. Yuan. There would be no trouble in proving that a good text book of modern law is of much more value to an Occidental student than the Book of Leviticus, yet if Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman or Mr. John Burns was to propose the excision of Leviticus and even the whole of the Pentateuch from the Old Testament, it is easy to imagine the outcry there would be among pious people in England. We can not conceive any period of the world's history when the philosophy of Confucius and Mencius will not be of immense value to a large section of mankind.

It will be remembered that at the close of last November Mr. Yasunaga Tonojo, a first-class Japanese interpreter, who was proceeding to Mukden in company with the leader of the Manchurian Righteous Army (I-chun), met his death at the hands of Chinese troops. We read in the Fiji Shimpō that negotiations were subsequently opened by Mr. Uchida with the Peking Government, and that they have ended in the degradation of the officer concerned, the capital punishment of the soldier who fired the fatal shot, and the payment of a solatium of thirty thousand yen to the family of the interpreter.

Prince Tsai and his suite will number 64 persons, it is said. Among the five principal members will be Mr. Li Shingtok, formerly Chinese Representative in Tokyo. The mission are expected to spend a month in Tokyo. It is now stated that the party will divide at Kobe, the principal members and their immediate attendants, 14 in all, proceeding thence by train via Kyoto, and the remaining 50 going on to Yokohama by steamer.

With regard to general education in China, the telegraph says that a draft of law is now in preparation, according to which there will be a system of compulsory education. Every child from seven years of age and upwards will be required to attend school and in default of attendance its parents will be subjected to penalties. Part of the scheme is that schools shall be established in every district of the country, but the details of their organization are not yet announced.

It is stated that all Chinese students who have graduated at duly recognised Japanese military schools have been declared eligible for appointment without further examination. There is a provision, however, that before leaving China they must have undergone an examination, presumably to show their education in Chinese subjects. Failing such preliminary test, they will have to submit to the same examination on their return home from Japan.

There has been a disturbance at Kiakta involving some loss of life and property. The Chinese Government claims that it was caused by Russian revolutionaries and demands compensation for its nationals from Russia. M. Pokotiloff claims that the prime offenders were Chinese bandits and that compensation must come from China's side. It is alleged that both parties show a strong front.

Viceroy Chou is said to have memorialized the Throne with reference to a settlement of the Shanghai Mixed Court Question. He recommends that a prison for the accommodation of prisoners of both sexes be built without delay, and that from the date of its completion the detention of Chinese prisoners in the Municipal jail shall be given up altogether. The cost is estimated at half a million taels, which sum is to be paid out of the tax on rice at Shanghai. Another point raised in the memorial relates to flogging. The Viceroy suggests that this method of punishment be abandoned in toto and that fines be substituted.

Tuesday, January 16.

Chekiang seems to be in a very alarming state. Considerable numbers of insurgents are reported from the region of the great lake and the local authorities are preserving towards them a mood of perfunctoriness if not indifference. Remonstrances addressed to the Peking Government by the Foreign Representatives are alleged to have resulted merely in a gentle reminder to the Chekiang officials, and thus the emeute tends to increase in violence and volume. Naturally there is much anxiety in Shanghai lest the doings of these rioters should react upon the rowdy elements of the population at that place, and in view of such a contingency the foreign Consuls are actively addressing the local authorities and moving Peking also. Of course these symptoms are very disquieting, but it is scarcely likely that any wide-spread emeute should have its origin at this season of the year. We do not gather that there has as yet been any actual outbreak of violence, but things are evidently tending in that direction. Washington telegraphs that the Peking Government is perturbed about the temper of the people in the Yangtze Valley, and altogether the conditions are reported to closely resemble those immediately prior to the Boxer outbreak. Probably there is some exaggeration, but we can not forget that the terrible and sanguinary doings of 1900 were preceded by a display of marked incredulity on the part of the foreign population.

Wednesday, January 17.

It is stated that there is a project on foot to establish a pereresses school in Peking and that the Empress Dowager is very keen in supporting it. Really China seems to be in earnest about education, and if there were any discernible evidences of equal determination in the sphere of legislative and administrative reform the prospect of her recovering her autonomy might resume some measure of reality.

The principal men of Shansi are said to be contemplating the construction of a railway from Hunan-fu to Hankow via Hupeh.

Thursday, January 18.

The Chinese seem to be pursuing with great vigour their tactics for what they call the recovery of their rights. A Japanese concession appears to be now the object of attack. Rumour says that Mr. Sheng, the Director of Railways, has discovered in the lease of the Taiya mine some element of danger to the peace of the Far East, and that he has memorialized Viceroy Chang as to the advisability of cancelling the lease. This Taiya mine is located on the upper reaches of the Yangtze and is the place whence raw iron is largely exported for the uses of the Wakamatsu Foundry. To be deprived of access to these stores of mineral would be highly inconvenient to Japan, and she is very unlikely to submit to it tamely. Further, General Pu Shan, Governor of Kirin, has memorialized the Throne in the sense that the building of the Kirin-Changchun Railway by a combination between Chinese and Japanese would be a menace to the security of the future. He recommends the abandonment of such a scheme, and he declares that he will himself be responsible for devising some plan to secure the necessary capital. British enterprise also is a target for these attacks. The concession for a railway from Kiulung to Canton has been duly granted to a British-Chinese syndicate, but owing to the opposition of Tsên Chun-hsuan, acting Governor-General of Liang-kuang, it has been found impossible to continue the work. Sir Ernest Satow is said to be vigorously protesting against this obstruction, which is obviously illegal in the face of accomplished facts. Further, the people of Shansi are reported to be moving vigorously for the recovery of any concessions made to the Peking Syndicate. In connexion with agitations of this nature, a collision has occurred between the above-mentioned Governor-General Tsên and the leading men of his district. Tsên wants to build the Yeh-Han Railway with capital obtained by increasing the customs dues—doubtless inland customs are indicated—whereas the leading men of the region are in favour of a joint-stock arrangement. The dispute waxed so hot and developed such acrimony that the arrest of three prominent men had finally to be effected. This Yeh-Han-Railway concession was re-purchased by China, it will be remembered, from the American syndicate to which the concession had been granted in the first place.

We take these telegrams from the Asahi Shimbun. They indicate a troublesome mood on China's part. She can not be blamed, indeed, for declining to grant any more railway concessions to foreigners, but she must be held to her agreements in the matter of all concessions hitherto given, whether they be for railways, or for mines, or for anything else.

The Chinese Minister of War is said to be advocating the appointment of Prince Sü as Governor of Mongolia, for the special purpose of discharging the functions of warden of the frontiers.

The Chinese in Harbin have complained that they are suffering severely at the hands of the Russian troops, and the Waiwupu has made strong representations to M. Pokotiloff on the subject. But the latter is said to have replied that in view of the disturbed condition of Russia at present, it would be highly dangerous to recall the troops from Harbin, and he therefore suggested that China should approach the St. Petersburg Government direct through her Minister in that country. This appears to be a very troublesome complication if the story be credible, for the main cause of the troops' discontent is that they are left interminably in Harbin, and the Russian Government shrinks from removing this source of umbrage by withdrawing them, while all the while the Chinese inhabitants suffer. It is veritably a vicious circle.

Viceroy Yuan appears to be busying himself to devise means for controlling the revolutionary tendencies of the youth of China. He has ordered an investigation of the existing laws on the subject, and has enacted regulations modelled largely on the Japanese Law for the Control of Public Meetings and Political Parties (shūkai seishu-hō). A leading feature of this law is that it requires the officials to be notified beforehand in the case of any meeting attended by fifteen persons or upwards.

Prince Tsai and his party landed at Kobe on the 17th instant and were to proceed to Kyoto by rail the same day.

The N. C. News says:—We very much regret to have to announce the death on Monday night, 1st inst., of Mr. J. B. Kremer, formerly Captain in the French Colonial Infantry, and lately Chef de la Garde Municipale Française. The late Captain Kremer was an invaluable public servant, and during his twelve years' residence in Shanghai he and his amiable family have been extremely popular with all who knew them.

The insincerity of the Chinese officials in the matter of the recent riot is shown in sentences passed by the Mixed Court magistrates on rioters brought before them. By Chinese law, armed participation in a riot is a capital offence, and sentence is executed summarily. Most of the rioters, many of them notorious rowdies, were sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Either the magistrates do not know the law, in which case they should be promptly replaced, or they were anxious to show that rioting in the Anglo-American Settlement is a trivial offence as compared with rioting in a native city. No foreigners would ask for the capital sentence to be carried out on such offenders; but they should have a punishment which would be really a deterrent for the future, says the N. C. Daily News.

The China Merchants' steamer Mee-foo, (1,799 tons) when on her way to Hongkong from Shanghai, broke her tailshaft on December 31. The mishap occurred when the Mee-foo was off Patahekok. Temporary repairs were effected after some delay, and the steamer returned to Shanghai on Jan. 3, under her own steam. The E. and A. steamer Empire, in attempting to assist the Mee-foo, was slightly damaged.

M. Ratard, French Consul-General at Shanghai, has returned to his post. He and Mme. Ratard have been spending a holiday in Europe.

The North-China Daily News translates the following from the Sinwenpao:—

We understand that when on the 23rd ultimo H.E. Viceroy Yuan Shih-k'ai had his farewell audience of their Majesties, he was questioned about the Mixed Court incident and the best way of settling matters. His Excellency replied that both the Shanghai Taotai and the Mixed Court Magistrates had acted according to instructions as stated in the usual regulations, and not done anything contrary-wise. Since the 12th of December there had been a regular procession of telegrams from the Taotai and chief merchants of Shanghai to the Waiwupu, stating that there was such universal indignation in the place (anent the Mixed Court incident) that the senders of the telegrams were fearful of their ability to preserve order. The Britishers, however, delayed settling matters, and it was not until the 18th of that month that there followed a strike of shops and trade. This shows that the fault did not lie with the Chinese officials. As to the riots these were made by the rowdies and desperadoes living in the foreign settlements and were even less the work of merchants and law-abiding people. The only way just now is for us to stick firmly to the regulations and peaceably settle matters. The Empress Dowager quite agreed with his Excellency Viceroy Yuan's words. Viceroy Chou Fu, according to the same paper, refuses to recognise the right of the British Consul-General to demand an indemnity for the persons attacked and the things destroyed and lost during the recent riots, on the ground that as Chinese soldiers had not been allowed to enter the Settlements to preserve order, and the losses that occurred had been due to the withdrawal of all the Municipal police to protect their own stations, when it was their manifest duty to protect life and property, throughout the settlements, which enabled the rowdies and rioters to loot and attack at their own will, the onus of the blame rested with the police and not on the Chinese authorities. In the interior where places depended for protection on the Chinese troops, the authorities were of course liable to pay for losses and damages brought about by insufficient protection given, not otherwise.

The Nanfangpao says that according to the report of H.E. Chao Erh-hsün, the number of inhabitants of the Three Eastern Provinces killed during the war is estimated at 20,000, while the damage to Chinese property is put at Tls. 24,000,000 by the Mukden fighting, and Tls. 45,000,000 by other engagements.

THE RETURNING TROOPS.

From the time when the Japanese troops began to return from Manchuria, Korea and Saghalien at the end of October until the end of December, a period of about 2 months, the total numbers that passed the various medical-inspection stations were:—

Ninoshima .....	158,664
Dairi .....	75,282
Wada-no-misaki .....	58,999
	292,945

In this total some non-combatants are included. If we take the combatants only, the figures become:—

Ninoshima .....	141,130
Dairi .....	70,281
Wada-no-misaki .....	58,569
Total .....	270,980

The ships in which these were carried were 197 in the case of Ninoshima, 126 in that of Dairi, and 88 in that of Wada-no-misaki. This is very rapid work. If the same rate be maintained, the number of combatants repatriated by the end of March will be 675,000.

As to the sick and wounded, the number in hospital is 14,970, and the number undergoing treatment outside hospital is 1,572, making a total of 16,542. These are distributed as follows:—

Tokyo .....	4,072
Nagoya .....	1,429
Hiroshima .....	2,447
Asahigawa .....	502
Kanazawa .....	1,527
Zentsuji .....	1,144
Sendai .....	812
Osaka .....	1,117
Kumamoto .....	729
Hiroaki .....	765
Himeji .....	1,052
Kokura .....	946

Another sad record is that of the wounded to whom the Empress has furnished artificial limbs and artificial eyes. The number of the former is 1,713, including 130 Russians; and the number of the latter 977, including 23 Russians.

It is officially said that the Japanese representative in New York on Jan. 14th received $495,950 from the American syndicate as the second instalment of the new loan.

POLITICAL NOTES.

* There is reported to be considerable controversy in the ranks of the Seiyu-kai with reference to the choice of a new President of the Lower House in succession to Mr. Matsuda Masahisa. One powerful section of the Party is in favour of leaving the matter in the hands of Marquis Saionji, but another advocates a general election by all the members and the latter suggestion seems likely to be adopted. The candidates are Messrs Ebara Soroku, Sugita Teiichi and Haseba Jun. There was at one moment an idea of choosing one of the Progressist leaders to fill this much prized position, but it appears to have been finally decided that the post shall be given to a Seiyu-kai man, and that a Progressist member shall be appointed Chairman of Committee of the Whole.

The Budget is now beginning to attract attention. It is said that among the influential members of the Seiyu-kai there is a party who favour certain changes in the policy informing the Budget as now drafted. The principal of these changes is the substitution of domestic borrowings for foreign and the abolition of the Three Capital Funds created in 1896. These funds have been entirely expended in connexion with the war, and the question is one of replacing them. There is, however, no idea of meddling with the taxation system proposed by the Katsura Cabinet.

All this is somewhat vague and we should be disposed to imagine, for our own part, that Mr. Sakatani did not accept the portfolio of Finance without an engagement that the Budget, which he must have acted a principal part in drafting, was not to undergo any radical change. The general indications are that the Saionji Cabinet will not make a marked departure of any kind from the policy of the Katsura Cabinet in either finance or foreign affairs.

Mr. Haseba Junko has definitely declined to be a candidate for the post of President of the Lower House. He appears to be influenced in this decision by a most laudible desire not to be create dissensions in the ranks of the Seiyu-kai and thus shorten the life of the Cabinet. There thus remain only Mr. Ebara Soroku and Mr. Sugita Teiichi as probable candidates, and the Seiyu-kai leaders have decided that the choice between these two shall be made by the Party in full conclave. Mr. Ebara is thought to be the most likely candidate.

* Japanese newspapers allege that General Terauchi's consent to remain in the Cabinet was not unqualified. He agreed to hold his portfolio only until all the arrangements connected with the war were completed, and inasmuch as the last of the troops will have returned by May, and the railway guards in Manchuria will all have been organized before that time, the General will go out of office before mid-summer. The journals publishing this report add that the retiring Minister will probably be raised to the rank of full General, which honour will be conferred on Lieut.-General Oshima also.

+ It would seem that a very important Cabinet meeting was held on the 16th instant, and that the topics discussed and decided were the administration of the finances, the empire's foreign policy and the attitude of the Ministry towards the Diet. It is alleged that Marquis Ito and Marquis Yamagata attended, and that they addressed the Cabinet, Marquis Ito taking for his subject the future of Japan and of Korea, and Marquis Yamagata speaking on military questions. The remarks of the two elder statesmen were of course intended merely for purposes of reference, but they are said to have elicited the hearty approval of the Cabinet. The programme appears to have been that Marquis Saionji should immediately convey to the Diet a statement of the Cabinet's views. For that purpose he is said to have invited 29 members of the Upper House and 30 of the Lower to visit him at his official residence on the 17th instant, the former in the forenoon and the latter in the afternoon. No hint has yet been published as to the decision arrived at by the Cabinet. The Asahi says that Marquis Saionji will take pains to address to the Diet when it re-assembles on the 20th a clear and comprehensive statement of the Ministerial policy, but experience has shown that all such declarations are couched in general terms, and that the information they convey is never explicit.

The public had watched with much interest the meeting between the Premier and a selected number of the Upper House, which took place on the 17th instant at 11 a.m. in the Nagatacho official residence. It was understood that Marquis Saionji would make a declaration of financial policy and, in effect, he did so, for he let it be understood that the Ministry intended to adopt the budget of its predecessor. There was, in fact, no alternative, for it would obviously have been quite impossible for the new Cabinet to compile a budget of their own in the interval of less than three weeks that separated their access to power from the re-assembly of the Diet after the New Year's recess. Thus the main purpose of the meeting on the 17th instant was to furnish the opportunity which the Katsura Cabinet had lacked, namely, an opportunity of explaining the budget in detail. Its general features were already known to both Houses through the medium of documents submitted by the Katsura Ministry, but the details remained to be filled in. This task would have been performed by the various Ministers, each for his own Department, but as they were obliged to attend the ceremony of welcoming General Nozu on his return from the war, the duty of explanation had to be undertaken by junior officials. The members of the Upper House subsequently lunched with the Premier.

A deputation from the Lower House was received by the Marquis at 3 p.m. on the same day, and after the Premier had briefly expressed his hope that he might count on the harmonious assistance of the House in carrying out the arduous duties connected with post-bellum undertakings, Mr. Sakatani, Minister of Finance, addressed the deputation. He said, speaking broadly, there would be no serious change in the budget which had already been placed in the members' hands, but that a few details had been altered. The total expenditures contemplated were 1,530 million yen, out of which total 230 millions represented ordinary outlays and 800 millions represented outlays connected with the war. Out of the latter aggregate, again, 170 millions must be regarded as continuing expenditures, namely, 110 millions for the service of the public debt and 60 millions for pensions and annuities.

Mr. Kato Masanosuke, of the Progressist Party, noted that the sum to be raised by domestic loans was put down at 280 million yen. Of that total 250 millions would be supplied by means of the foreign loan of 500 millions, one half of which the Government proposed to apply to redeeming the domestic high-interest debt. Apparently, then, there would remain only 30 millions to be borrowed in the home market. Would that suffice? To this question Mr. Sakatani replied that Mr. Kato had slightly misapprehended the project. The sum of domestic debt to be redeemed with foreign money was 200 millions, not 250, and the difference, 80 millions, would be obtained from Russia on account of the maintenance of her prisoners. There would consequently be no new domestic loan.

Mr. Kato then enquired as to the sums set apart for the service of the State's debts. Thirty-six millions were allotted for the original debt which had existed prior to the war, and 110 millions for the debt contracted in connection with the war. According to Mr. Kato's calculation 85 millions would suffice for the service of the latter debt. What then did the Cabinet intend to do with the surplus of 25 millions, namely, the difference between 110 millions and 85? Did they intend to accumulate it, or did they intend to use it for paying off the debt? To this Mr. Sakatani replied that they intended to employ it for paying off the debt. If favourable occasion offered, the bonds might even be bought back in the open market. Concerning the cost of bringing back the armies, he said that 68 millions had already been expended and that the Government estimated further outlays aggregating 200 millions.

A question was then put on a subject which is at present attracting wide-spread attention, namely, the State purchase of private railways. It is generally reported on seemingly good authority, that the Cabinet has determined upon introducing a bill for that purpose and there is talk even of the amount which the Diet would be asked to allot for the first transactions, namely, 250 million yen. Mr. Sakatani, being asked for a statement on this matter, said that no decision had been arrived at. He was further asked what the Ministry purposed with regard to improving the country's resources (kokuhon baiyo), a very vague formula much affected by a certain class of economists. The Minister replied by saying that such a question might be deferred until the session opened.

Mr. Oishi Masami then made a brief speech. He declared himself satisfied with the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister and hoped that the country might expect three things: first, no issues of urgency ordinances trampling upon the Constitution; secondly, earnest and courteous treatment of questions submitted in the Diet; and thirdly, cessation of the abuse of supplementary budgets.

Subsequently the deputation dined with the Premier and the Ministers of State.

The Parliamentary members of the Seiyu-kai held a meeting on the 17th inst., Mr. Ooka Ikuzo in the chair. It was announced that, Messrs. Hara and Matsuda having resigned their positions as leaders of the Party in the Lower House, Messrs. Haseba Junko and Motoda Hajime had been appointed in their place. Mr. Haseba then stated that they had received an offer of support from the Daido Club. This statement elicited some merriment, the members being evidently disposed to regard such an offer as quite superfluous. Mr. Tada Sakubei said that their previous relations with the Progressists pointed to the advisability of re-opening communications with that Party, and Mr. Haseba having given an unqualified affirmative, it was decided that the matters should be left in the hands of the committee.

The meeting then proceeded to elect a President of the Lower House in succession to Mr. Matsuda Masahisa. The competition for this much coveted honour had been very strong between Mr. Ebara Soroku and Sugita Teichi, but when a ballot was taken 57 out of 107 present voted for Mr. Sugita and only 47 for Mr. Ebara, the others giving scattered votes. This result was somewhat unexpected, the general forecast having been in Mr. Ebara's favour, but the activity of Mr. Sugita's canvass seems to have turned the tables.

It is evident from the above that the Saionji Cabinet may count on a substantial majority in the Lower House. They will have the whole of the Seiyun-kai and the Daido Club at their backs; namely, a following of fully 220 in a house of 379.

The Tokyo Branch of the Progressist Party held a meeting on the 17th instant and passed a number of resolutions which had essentially the quality of uncut cloth, namely, that they might be made to fit any coterie of politicians. It is quite remarkable to observe how blandly some Japanese politicians go on, year after year, enunciating views as innocuous as they are insignificant; views to which no one can take exception and over which no one can "enthuse." One experiences the sensation of being placed in a large empty chamber which has not yet been supplied with doors and windows. However, the members of the Tokyo Shibu were approximately explicit on three points; first, the office of the Metropolitan Police in Tokyo should be abolished; secondly, that the constables who killed and wounded unoffending citizens last September must be punished; and, thirdly, that a system of "high-class government" should be introduced in the capital. This last project suggests interesting conjectures. Kōkyū shisei is the expression used, and we interpret it to signify some kind of compromise between the present system of "special government" (tokubetsu shisei) and the popular system for which many citizens contend.

PRINCE BÜLOW AND MARQUIS SAIONJI.

Prince Bülow has telegraphed to Marquis Saionji his hearty congratulations on the latter's assumption of the post of Minister President of State, adding an expression of special satisfaction that a nobleman well versed in the conditions existing in Germany should be at the head of administrative affairs in Japan. Marquis Saionji has, of course replied in the most courteous terms. Doubtless during his sojourn in Berlin as Japan's Representative he became a personal friend of Prince Bülow. It is known to readers of the Japanese press that one of Marquis Saionji's experiences in Germany was to listen on three several occasions to Prince Bismarck expounding with all the glee of a veteran laudator temporis acti how he had forced Thiers to accept Germany's terms as victor.

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun gives Marquis Saionji's reply to Prince Bülow, which we translate:—

"I am profoundly thankful for your Excellency's gracious message. I desire by every means to still further strengthen the friendship between the two countries, and I deem it specially fortunate that I am able in this matter to coöperate with a statesman whom I know to be imbued with that sentiment."

DEAFNESS.

✱We gather from home journals that French laryngologists have made a great stride in the treatment of deafness. Their investigations have taught them that only in cases of absence or total destruction of the essential organs can a case be pronounced hopeless, and such cases, they say, are extremely rare. ✱Their plan is rational treatment; that is to say, they seek, by means of suitable gymnastic exercises, to obtain a natural regeneration of the organs affected. This method demands two processes. One is to determine exactly the cause of the infirmity; the other is to adapt the treatment precisely to this cause. The chief instrument employed is the tonometre. This is nothing more than a collection of tuning forks and cylindrical resonators, said to be of marvellous precision. By their aid the physician discovers precisely which vibrations are audible to the patient and which are inaudible. He determines, in short, what gaps exist in the organ of hearing. "This analysis of deafness by means of the simple sounds of various tuning forks proves that a rupture of the drum of the ear does not cause, as is generally believed, total deafness, but it makes the sounds appear uniform and less distinct. The drum of the ear is in reality a kind of resonator, or instrument for facilitating the analysis of compound sounds, and it forms together with the chain of vesicles and the stapes acting on the liquid of the inner ear an apparatus like the visual apparatus which adapts itself so admirably to the difference in nature and intensity of the luminous vibrations." The acoustic examination having been made and an accurate diagnosis thus obtained, then commences a regular course of treatment having for its objects to stimulate the muscle and arouse the nerve which have been found defective. Here the tonometre acts the principal part. It is the invention of Koenig, a renowned savant of German extraction but French nationality, who is said to have devoted the best part of his life to elaborating the instrument. A written description of the various processes would be tedious, but we may note that the results obtained hitherto by Dr. Marcel Natier and the Abbe Rousselot at the Institute of Laryngology and Orthophony in Paris are said to be most encouraging and that the City of Paris and the Council of the Seine have granted an annual subsidy towards the expenses of the place. Among the theories long believed but now wholly denied by the heads of the Institute reference should be made to one which, unless we greatly mistake, finds many supporters in Japan at present—the theory that in certain cases the air imprisoned in the middle chamber of the ear is not at the same pressure as the atmospheric air and deafness is thus caused. To correct this imaginary defect the patient is instructed to blow air into his nose, and in some instances the drum of the ear is ruined by the supposed cure.

AMBASSADORS.

It has been officially announced that the Japanese Legation in Washington is raised to an Embassy. A further announcement is to the effect that the salary of the Japanese Ambassador in Paris will be 30,000 yen, apart from allowances.

BARON SUYEMATSU AND SUPERFICIES.

It is quite beyond the range of ordinary intelligence to comprehend the purpose of such writing as that of the Japan Herald on the subject of superficies, as expounded by Baron Suyematsu. The latter says:—"Foreigners may acquire possession of lands on a long lease for any number of years, which practically, therefore, is almost the same as real ownership." Commenting upon this the Japan Herald says:—

This, of course, is the usual argument adopted by the defenders of the Japanese law in this matter, but a thing that is almost the same as another may in reality be separated from it by thousands of miles. What do you want with the real diamonds? asks Baron Suyematsu. Here is a piece of glass which is just as good and is practically the same. The idea that the piece of glass will one day be put to the test and prove worthless never occurs to these exponents of the value of superficies. A foreigner remembering the Smithers Case, where a superficies,—recognised as such by the Court—has her land purchased over her head by a Japanese, will not be inclined to agree with Baron Suyematsu that superficies is "practically . . . almost the same as real ownership."

This line of reasoning is so very misleading that one finds it hard to believe in the sincerity of the writer. He must know perfectly well that in the Smithers' case there was no question whatever of superficies as such. The whole question was whether the holder of a certain superficies had acquired the title in conformity with prescribed legal procedure. What the court had to determine was, not whether superficies itself is a good title in general but whether the particular superficies under discussion had been acquired in such a manner as to be entitled to legal protection. Ownership of land can not be obtained without satisfying the forms prescribed by law, and the same is true of superficies, as it is of every other kind of title in a country where laws are operative. Scores of foreigners hold superficies in Japan, and having acquired them by due process of law, stand in just as safe a position, so far as concerns undisturbable tenure, as they would be had they acquired the fee-simple. The Japan Herald must be fully sensible of all this, yet it adduces the Smithers case by way of evidence that the statement of Baron Suyematsu is incorrect. Nothing could be more disingenuous and deceptive. What is the use of it? Are the interests of the foreign community furthered in any way by creating false impressions about the facilities accessible to foreigners in Japan? Plainly not. Plainly the effect of such deceitful writing is to create a general feeling of insecurity and thus check the development of enterprise. As a means of promoting the removal of the ownership distinction, too, the writing we have quoted can do mischief only, for every intelligent Japanese must appreciate that it is dictated by prejudice so profound as to be blinding.

OFFICIAL CHANGES.

The following appointments are gazetted:

Mr. Yoshiwara Samuro (Chief of the Local Affairs Bureau in the Department) to be Vice-Minister of Home Affairs.

Mr. Anraku Kanemichi to be Chief of the Metropolitan Police.

Mr. Yukatsugu Takejiro (Prefect of Akita) to be Chief of the Bureau of Local Affairs in the Home Office.

Mr. Koga Renzo (Judge of the Court of Cassation) to be Chief of the Criminal Law Bureau in the Home Department.

Mr. Kiyono Chotaro (Secretary of the Home Department) to be Prefect of Akita.

Mr. Koba Sadanaga resigns the post of Vice-Minister of Education and is nominated a member of the House of Peers.

Mr. Seki Kiyohide resigns the post of Chief of the Metropolitan Police.

KOREA

Sunday, January 14.

The agitation against the Il Chung-hoi is reported to have broken out with considerable violence in Kanghwa island. There has been an attack on the administrative offices and affairs are said to be very unsettled.

Prince Li Chai-won and his suite are to leave Seoul on the 17th instant for Japan. The Foreign Minister, Mr. Li Hwa-yong, formerly Korean Representative in Tokyo, is to be one of the party. This is the mission which comes to Japan in acknowledgement of Marquis Ito's recent visit to Korea.

The tremendous rain which visited Tokyo on the night of the 10th and 11th seems to have its counterpart on the preceding night at Fusan. The settlement was flooded and some injury is reported.

Steps are about to be taken to largely increase the landing facilities at Chemulpo. The backbone of the plan is to reclaim about 15 acres of land and build break-waters and jetties. On the completion of the work of reclamation the railway will be extended to the place and the customs buildings will be transferred thither.

Monday, January 15.

It is stated that the number of persons drawing salaries from the Household Department in Korea is some five thousand. To reduce this army of parasites is evidently a financial necessity, and steps are now being elaborated to that end. Mr. Megata has already done much to cut down the superfluous establishment, civil and military, in Korea, but apparently his hand has not yet reached the Court. It is not at all wonderful that, in view of such changes, there should be many complaints against Japan's reforms in Korea. Every one whose pocket is touched, or likely to be touched, becomes at once a hostile critic, and the foreign enemies of Japan, whose antipathy is not always due to the purest motives, fail to discriminate between these essentially selfish recalcitrants and the genuinely patriotic conservatives of whom there must be many in the peninsular empire.

It is reported that a mob of Koreans, private and official, have attacked the Il Chin-hoi in two places in Chiholludo and that there were some casualties. The Il Chin-hoi are in bad odour among some classes of the Koreans, who choose to regard them as "slaves of the Japanese."

The threatened disturbance on the island of Kanghwa seems to have "petered out" without involving any collision. The Japanese gendarmes and policemen sent to deal with the trouble have returned.

The Japanese Consulates in Korea are to become residencies from the 1st February, and the present Consuls will be nominated Residents.

It is expected that Marquis Ito will set out for Korea at the beginning of February. Some members of the Residency General—Messrs. Kanayama and Tsurubara—will precede the Marquis, leaving Tokyo on the 25th. His Excellency has been suffering from gastric trouble but his condition has improved of late.

Tuesday, January 16.

The Foreign Office in Seoul is to be handed over to the Japanese on the 18th instant, and arrangements will then be made for converting it into the Residency-General where work will begin from February 1st. Some time ago it was stated that in consequence of the closing of the Foreign Office, the services of Mr. D. W. Stevens in the capacity of Adviser would no longer be required, but the latest intelligence from Seoul alleges that he is to remain attached to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs, which will be organized in the Foreign Department.

Professor Kochibe, who is now investigating the mines of Korea, is said to have reported very favourably on the deposits of smokeless coal at Pyongyang. He is represented as assigning to the mineral remarkable freedom from ash and high calorific quality. The quantity in sight is estimated by him at about ten million tons, and making all necessary deductions eight million tons should be easily procurable. It is certainly tantalizing that with all this news of coal at Fushun, coal at Pyongyang, and coal at new places in Hokkaido, folks in Tokyo and Yokohama should be paying almost famine prices for their fuel. The two great causes are said to be growing activity of manufacturing industries and dislocation of transport facilities owing to the war. The former is likely to be a permanent factor but the latter can not remain operative much longer.

Tokyo journals say that a project is on foot in official quarters to establish a customs alliance between Japan and Korea. The idea is said to have been entertained for some time, but owing to the special circumstances connected with the Korean service—chief among which special circumstances Mr. McLeavy Brown doubtless figured—the plan did not mature. It has now been brought into the field of practical politics. A serious difficulty presents itself, however. The Korean import tariff being considerably lower than the Japanese, goods franked by passing through the Korean customs could be introduced into Japan at a great advantage compared with goods coming direct through Japanese ports. In other words, a merchant might import articles into Japan via Korea, securing entry to the former country by paying the dues charged in the latter. The only way to meet that point would be to make the rates uniform; that is, to raise the Korean customs dues to the same level as the Japanese. It is not thought that any serious objection would be made by foreign Powers—England, China, America and Russia—since they do only 25 per cent. of the business against Japan's 75 per cent.

One feature of the scheme would be that Korean products and manufactures should have entry into Japan free of import duties, and reciprocal advantage should be extended to Japanese manufactures and products entering Korea. It remains to be seen how foreign States would be disposed towards such an innovation. They would probably object to it as a violation of the principle of equal opportunities.

Wednesday, January 17.

Pirates have made their appearance in some force along the coast from Mokpho to Kunsan. They are said to be in possession of arms and ammunition. Two Japanese torpedo boats have been despatched to deal with them.

The Warehouse Company in Seoul has begun to advance money against warehoused goods, and the result is reported to be a distinct revival of trade in the Korean capital.

Thursday, January 18.

The inhabitants of the Heung-hai region on the northern frontier of Korea are reported to be profoundly grateful for the altered conditions resulting from the efficiency of the Japanese guards. These people used formerly to live in terror of the Hung-hutsh who raided them at will or subjected them to a system of onerous black-mail. But in the presence of Japanese guards such incidents never occur, and there is corresponding gratitude.

We mentioned yesterday that two Japanese torpedo-boats had been sent to repress Korean pirates along the coast from Mokpo to Kunsan. It appears from intelligence collected by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun that the craft referred to are not torpedo-boats but destroyers—the Shirakumo and the Asagiri. Our contemporary says that some time ago two Japanese gendarmes and a police-constable proceeded by boat to Mokpo and effected the arrest of two pirates, whom they carried off in a boat manned by three Japanese. Enroute the boat put ashore and the police constable landed to procure provisions. During his absence the pirates attacked the gendarmes, killed one of them and severely wounded the other, after which exploit they succeeded in carrying away the boat with the sailors. It is a strange recital. One can scarcely suppose that two Koreans managed to overcome an equal number of Japanese gendarmes assisted by three boat-men. Such, however, is the story, and it is given as the proximate cause of the despatch of two destroyers.

THE NAVY.

According to the Asahi's calculation the ships now under construction, or to be immediately laid down, as additions to the Japanese Navy, aggregate some 97,000 tons. They are as follow:—

First-class battle-ship	.....	Aki , to be laid down this month in the berth hitherto occupied by The Tsukuba at Kure, 19,000 tons.
"	"	..... Satsuma , already under construction at Yokosuka, 19,000 tons.
First-class armoured cruiser	.....	Tsukuba , launched recently at Kure, 13,000 tons.
"	"	..... Ikoma , to be launched during March at Kure, 13,000 tons.
"	"	..... Ibuki , to be launched in August at Yokosuka, 13,000 tons.
"	"	..... Kurama , under construction at Yokosuka, 13,000 tons.
Third-class cruiser	.....	Tone , under construction at the Kawasaki Yard, 2,500 tons.
"	"	..... Yodo , under construction at the Kawasaki Yard, 2,500 tons.
"	"	..... Miyami , under construction at the Mitsu Bishi Yard, Nagasaki, 2,500 tons.

Total, 2 battle ships, 4 first-class armoured cruisers and 4 third-class cruisers, aggregating 97,500 tons.

The United Fleet having now been broken up and its personnel dispersed or re-drafted, it is interesting to note the condition of the Japanese Navy as it emerged from the war, observing that it has been divided into the First Squadron, the Second Squadron, the South-China Squadron, the Training Squadron and the Reserve Squadron. We have prepared a table to give the necessary information, and we preface it by the statement that the ships are thus classified by the Admiralty, namely:—

- (1) Battle-ships.
- (2) Cruisers, of which there are three classes; namely, First Class (from 7,000 tons upwards); Second Class (from 3,500 tons to 7,000 tons); and Third Class (everything below 3,500 tons).
- (3) Coast-defence ships, of which there are three classes; namely First Class (7,000 tons and - upwards); Second Class (from 3,500 to 7,000 tons); and Third Class (everything under 3,500 tons).

- (4) Gunboats, of which there are two Classes; namely, First Class (1,000 tons and upwards) and Second Class (under 1,000 tons),
- (5) Despatch-boats.
- (6) Torpedo-depot-ships.
- (7) Destroyers.
- (8) Torpedo-boats, of which there are four classes; namely, First Class (120 tons and upwards), Second Class (70 tons to 120 tons), Third Class (20 tons to 80 tons), and Fourth Class (under 20 tons).
- (9) Submarines.
- In the following table the squadron to which a vessel belongs is shown by the prefixed number, the reserve ships being distinguished by a cipher (O) the training squadron by a (T), and the South-China Squadron by (S.C.):—

THE BEER TRUST.

The talk heard last year about amalgamating the three beer companies, the Osaka, the Nippon and the Sapporo, seems to have matured. It is stated (Nichi Nichi Shimbun) that a draft of agreement has been made by the promoters of the union and that it will be submitted to general meetings of the three companies on the 29th instant, when its adoption without dissent is confidently anticipated. The arrangement contemplated is that a share of the Osaka Company shall be taken as the unit and shall be equivalent to 1½ shares of the Sapporo and 2 shares of the Nippon. The capital of the united concern will be 5,600,000 yen; it will be called "Dai-Nippon Beer Jōzō Kaisha," and so far from offering any obstacle to the subsequent entry of any other company, it will welcome such an event. Our contemporary quotes Mr. Uye-mura, principal manager of the Sapporo Company, as saying that the first object of the union is to put an end to competition in the domestic market and to further exportation abroad, while the second is to develop the production of materials in Japan. It is only 20 years since the business of beer-brewing commenced in this country, and the development has been very remarkable, the production having risen to about 100,000 koku. The companies chiefly engaged in the enterprise are the Osaka, the Sapporo, the Kabuto, the Tokyo, and the Nippon, together with the Asada, the Meiji and the Iso-gai, 9 in all, to which have to be added 7 or 8 minor companies. It will be observed that the Kirin Company is not specified in this list for reasons which we do not understand. Since 1894 the production has increased at the rapid rate of 30 or 40 per cent. annually, but in 1901 a heavy tax of 7 yen per koku was imposed, and this gave a temporary check to the manufacture. It soon recovered, however, and in spite of the increased customs duties imposed on materials during the Russo-Japanese war, the rate of production rose so rapidly that the total for 1905 is expected to have reached 120,000 koku. The growth of production is shown in the following officially compiled return:—

1897 .....	65,717
1898 .....	81,331
1899 .....	87,256
1900 .....	120,371
1901 .....	121,430
1902 .....	91,046
1903 .....	93,252
1904 .....	95,243

On the other hand, the import of foreign beer has steadily declined and with the exception of some which comes in to meet a special demand at the hotels, this branch of business is virtually extinct. The following return of export and import is interesting:—

	Export.	Import.
	Yen.	Yen.
1897 .....	57,021	2,038
1898 .....	143,806	1,576
1899 .....	175,665	647
1900 .....	553,295	826
1901 .....	863,502	613
1902 .....	505,831	478
1903 .....	679,737	269
1904 .....	695,214	292
1905 (11 months) ..	1,303,716	—

The Nichi Nichi gives also a table showing the production of the Nippon and Sapporo Companies:—

	Nippon Company.	Sapporo Company.
	Koku.	Koku.
1897 .....	15,102	5,927
1898 .....	20,775	6,140
1899 .....	27,976	11,251
1900 .....	37,452	14,300
1901 .....	37,954	13,591
1902 .....	27,099	16,796
1903 .....	18,648	20,449
1904 .....	21,701	24,048

In 1905 the two companies developed a great access of activity. The Nippon is believed to have produced 41,000 koku, and the Sapporo's production for the first half of the year was 22,753 koku, so that, when the latter's figures for the whole year are known, they will probably exceed 40,000. Finally, the production within the Osaka and Yokohama districts respectively stood thus:—

	Osaka.	Yokohama.
	koku .	koku .
1902 .....	23,052	20,389
1903 .....	23,978	22,650
1904 .....	25,018	19,711

The Osaka beer is chiefly the Asahi, and the Yokohama is the Kirin. It is thus seen that when the Osaka (Asahi), the Yebisu (Nippon) and the Sapporo combine, they will stand for at least 100,000 koku, which means fully 70 or 80 per cent. of all the beer brewed in Japan. Such a combination would be obviously very powerful.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS IN JAPAN.

The question of postal savings banks in Japan is attracting some attention. It has been a favourite object of every Japanese Minister of Finance during recent years, nobably of Baron Sone, to contrive some means of encouraging the spirit of effective economy among their nationals. They resorted to the postal savings bank system among other devices, but its success was not at first very signal. The deposits crept up slowly prior to the war with China, and some expectation was entertained that, after the restoration of peace, a considerable portion of the large sums which had been scattered among the people during the campaign would find their way into these savings banks. Events did not justify the hope. The total deposits, then aggregating a paltry sum of about 28 millions of yen, actually fell to 22 millions in 1898. There may have been many recondite causes for this retardation of growth but the most apparent were three; namely, first, that the spirit of commercial and industrial enterprise had been roused to a high pitch by the Empire's victories and that men were unwilling to invest money in bank deposits at a low rate of interest; secondly, that the methods of Japanese officialdom entailed a great delay of delay and red tape which deterred all but very zealous hoarders; and, thirdly, that the rate of interest offered by the Post Office did not tempt depositors. The last two objections have been largely remedied of late. As to the question of official pragmatism, it has been mended to a great extent by multiplying the number of post-office agents and appointing private business firms to discharge functions previously undertaken at offices only. A result of this system is that people who have any mind to save money find at their very doors a trustworthy agent to take charge of it and find that all correlated business can be transacted with men entirely free from official "starch." Of late, too, there has been an innovation, namely, the organization of the furi-kaye system, which will immensely facilitate the transmission of money from place to place and the handling of parcels. This new plan, however, does not become operative until the beginning of March, so that it can not yet have produced any practical effect, and we refer to it here merely as evidence of the progressive spirit that animates officialdom. Concerning the financially tempting character of such investments, there has been an improvement in the rate of interest offered. It is now 5.4 per cent., a rate which ought to tempt depositors. How far these influences have been effective it is not possible to say positively, but certainly a very remarkable increase in deposits is recorded. At the end of 1904 the total sum held by the postal savings banks was 33,300,000 yen, showing an increase of 1,830,000 compared with the corresponding period of 1903; but at the close of 1905 the aggregate had grown to 52,220,000 yen, being an increase of 18,910,000 yen in one year, an altogether unprecedented event. Of course, looked at from a European stand-point the total is still quite petty, but it would soon become respectable if the recent rate of increment, or anything like it, were maintained. In order still further to win public favour the Government has announced that the deposits in the postal savings banks will be used to promote local enterprise; that is to say, they will be placed at the disposal of the Kōkyō Dantai (coöperate associations). Money deposited at 5.4 per cent. interest can not be loaned to these associations at very advantageous terms, but it can certainly be loaned much more cheaply than it could be obtained from the ordinary banks, which charge a minimum of 8 per cent. These banks, especially the smaller ones, will evidently be much affected by the postal system, for the latter, with its recent addition of furi-kaye organization, will furnish facilities belonging to the normal functions of banks and appreciably superior as well as cheaper. No banks can organize for purposes of money transmission machinery so thorough, so reasonable and so ubiquitous as the postal savings banks provide. This, however, seems to be a perfectly legitimate extension of official business whatever may be said of certain other projects attributed to the Government.

THE FAMINE IN THE NORTH.

Japanese newspapers publish returns furnished by the police authorities and showing the state of affairs in the three famine-stricken prefectures. The figures are these:—

Prefecture.	Number of Households.	Number of people.	Number of households.	Number of distressed people.
Miyagi .....	134,421	899,782	46,766	284,865
Fukushima .....	165,129	1,170,598	69,084	483,588
Iwate .....	113,420	749,927	34,038	190,422
Totals .....	412,970	2,820,307	149,888	958,875

These figures are very shocking. The fact that nearly a million of people are actually suffering from want of food in the depth of winter shows that the appeals hitherto made for charity have been only too well founded. It is difficult to understand why this terrible calamity should have awakened so little sympathy hitherto. No one can doubt any longer that the occasion is one calling for the fullest possible exercise of benevolence.

According to official statements the losses suffered by the four northern prefectures owing to crop failure have been:—

Miyagi, a crop of 12 per cent. of the average; loss 1,000,000 koku .
Fukushima, a crop of 25 per cent. of the average; loss 990,000 koku .
Iwate, a crop of 33 per cent. of the average; loss 370,000 koku .
Gumma, a crop of 37 per cent. of the average; loss 290,000 koku .

As we have already explained, the policy pursued by the Authorities is to avoid the distribution of unearned alms and to make the people self-supporting as far as possible. To that end public works of various kinds have been inaugurated and will have the effect not only of relieving present distress but also of averting future famines. The sums appropriated for this purpose are:—

	Yen.
Miyagi .....	780,000
Fukushima .....	670,000
Iwate .....	120,000
Gumma .....	79,000

But it is plain that this system of relief must leave thousands unprovided for, and that, consequently, the occasion invites private charity in the most urgent manner.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks receipt of the following sums on behalf of the Famine Sufferers in the North of Japan:—

The money received at the office of the Jiji Shimpō on behalf of famine sufferers in the north now amounts to yen 10,794.985. It includes £55 10.0 recently transferred from the Daily Telegraph of London.

On January 18th the Manager of the Japan Mail transferred to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in Yokohama the sum of yen 1,457.05, being the amount of contributions sent into this office towards the relief of the famine sufferers since January 4th, the date of his first cheque in favour of the Sendai famine fund.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I am pleased to inform you that the net proceeds of the recent performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Van Schaick Hall in aid of the Famine Fund amounted to $238.26, which has been handed into the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation Famine Fund account. The total receipts were $263.12, and the only expenses incurred were yen 10 for hire of the hall, yen 4.95 for printing programmes and tickets (at reduced rates) and yen 9.91 for hire and removal of properties, coolie hire, etc.

I take this opportunity of thanking the local press for kindly inserting advertisements without charge, Mr. Inouye for gratuitously installing the extra electric light, and all those who so willingly assisted to make the entertainment a success.

I am, Sir, Yours faithfully,

H. DOROTHY KILBY.

January 14th, 1906.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In view of the facts published in your issue of date showing the urgent necessity for relief in the famine districts, we have pleasure in enclosing herewith our cheque for yen 1,000.00.

Yours faithfully,

For SALE and FRAZAR, Limited,

CHARLES V. SALE,

Managing Director.

Yokohama, January 17th, 1906.

ABOLITION OF EXPORT DUTIES IN KOREA.

We read in Tokyo newspapers that it has been virtually decided to abolish export duties in Korea. They simply impede the development of trade and bring no appreciable revenue to the Government. The Korean Authorities, doubtless influenced by considerations of revenue alone, deemed it necessary to impose a duty of 5 per cent. ad valorem on all the manufactures and products of their country, but under this tariff the export trade of the peninsula has shown no vitality and has tended to shrink rather than to swell. This is felt especially by Japan to which nearly the whole of Korea's products and manufactures are sent. Hence the advisability of abolishing the export duties has received speedy recognition. It may be mentioned here that the revenue derived by Korea from her import duties is very trifling: it averages only some 320,000 yen, as the following table shows:—

	Yen.
1900 .....	384,525
1901 .....	387,181
1902 .....	354,969
1903 .....	413,215
1904 .....	292,010

JAPANESE SURGERY IN THE WAR.

Dr. C. W. Saleeby, writing in the "World's Work," makes interesting reference to facts already noted by Sir Frederick Treves, namely, that the per-centage of deaths from wounds in cases treated by Japanese surgeons during the recent war was only a small fraction of any previous record, 99½ per cent. having been the per-centage of recoveries. Dr. Saleeby observes that this remarkable result was not obtained solely in the operating theatre. "Does the reader know," he asks, "how these amazing people prepared themselves for their naval engagements—how the sailors took an antiseptic bath, and donned freshly boiled and washed underclothing, so that when they were wounded their wounds were, as a rule, antiseptic from the first, just 'for all the world as if they had been made by a clean, if clumsy, modern surgeon? When these cases came up for operation, they thus offered a problem entirely different from that which the Russian surgeons had to face. Does the reader know that boracic acid was served round to every gunner, that all gunners' eyes were periodically examined, and that no one was allowed to serve a gun whose eyes were not beyond criticism?" He also notes that whereas in the South African war typhoid cost us more than mauser bullets did, the Japanese operations, "conducted over enormous areas under great commissariat difficulties and with huge masses of men, were free from anything like serious epidemics. This was due, of course, to the extraordinary sanitary precautions adopted and to the discipline which ensured strict obedience to hygienic rules. We should like to hear from the Japanese themselves to which of their surgeons belongs the chief credit of having elaborated systems which contributed so materially to their success in the great war, but thus far they have been silent on the subject.

One paragraph from Dr. Saleeby's paper may be here quoted, though it contains nothing which has not already been recorded in our own columns:—

It is commonly said that the Japanese are imitators—a rather amusing assertion concerning a section of the race which invented, amongst other little matters, reading and writing; but let us note that they have done much more than imitate the Western applications of Western bacteriology. It was Kitasato, a Japanese bacteriologist, who discovered the bacillus of lockjaw, or tetanus—a discovery which has already gone far to give us control of this disease; it was he, also, who, with Von Behring, gave us the antitoxin treatment of diphtheria. Another Japanese, Doctor Shiga, discovered the bacillus which is responsible for probably the greater number of cases of dysentery, and has subsequently prepared an antitoxin which has already given excellent results in the treatment of this disease. Yet another Japanese—and I am merely quoting the most striking instances—the physician and chemist, Dr. Takamine, has isolated from a pair of glands of which few of us have ever heard, but which, nevertheless, are essential to life—as the stomach, for instance, is not—their active principle, which is known as adrenalin, and which is the most potent agent hitherto known in the arrest of bleeding. I daresay this may have saved not a few Russian and Japanese lives in the late war.

DEATH OF MRS. N. F. SMITH.

It is with regret that we announce this morning the death of Mrs. Nathaniel Ferdinand Smith, wife of the greatly respected President of the American Asiatic Association. A long illness patiently borne terminated at 12-18 o'clock on Monday morning, her husband, only son, and the medical attendant, Dr. W. E. G. Davis, being with her at the end. Mrs. Smith had passed over a quarter of a century in Yokohama and during all that time took an active part in the social, intellectual, and charitable life of the community. Her removal will leave a sensible blank and to her bereaved husband, son and daughter we extend our sincerest condolences.

The ceremonies attending the funeral of Mrs. N. F. Smith, which took place on Wednesday afternoon, were participated in by a very large company of mourners, including many ladies and a considerable representation of Japanese. The hearse left the residence at No. 1 Bluff about 1.45 p.m. and proceeded to Christ Church where the first part of the funeral service took place, Rev. W. P. G. Field, M.A., officiating, and Mrs. Field playing the organ music for a large choir. The hymn "Abide with me," was sung, and then the coffin was conveyed to the Cemetery where the last rites were performed and the last mark of respect rendered.

The chief mourners were Mr. N. F. Smith, and Mr. K. Van Smith, husband and son respectively of the deceased lady, and the pall-bearers were Messrs. N. W. McIvor, James Walter, C. S. Averill, R. M. Varnum, J. Archer, C. M. Gibbens, Dr. Munro and Dr. Davis.

Many beautiful floral tributes were sent by sorrowing and sympathetic friends.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Telegrams received in Tokyo say that the Chartered Bank of India, China and Australia has issued a million sterling of Tanko Railway five-per-cent. bonds at 96½.

It is stated that the gist of the bill which will be submitted to the Diet for the re-assessment of Urban Lands is that the present rent of the land (Chintai-kakaku) will be taken as basis, and being multiplied by 25, the product will be regarded as the assessed value, and on it a tax of 2½ per cent. will be levied. The custom in Japan, as a general rule, is to charge 12 per cent. by way of rent for building land. Thus land valued at 20 yen per tsubo lets for 20 sen per month, and land valued at 10 yen fetches a rent of 10 sen. No doubt this system of re-assessment would add largely to the tax collected on urban lands. It would, according to some authorities, be an intolerable burden in the case of Hokkaido.

As to the report that the Crown Prince of Siam contemplates a visit to Japan at an early date, Mr. Inagaki, interviewed by a correspondent of the Asahi Shimbun at Nagasaki, where the former arrived on the 12th, says that he has not heard of any such intention. He himself has been entrusted with the duty of conducting to Japan eleven Siamese students, two of whom are nephews of the King and one is a son of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. They are to study military science. Mr. Inagaki speaks strongly of the rapid development of Japan's trade with Siam, and expresses a hope that the Nippon Yusen Kaisha will soon establish a direct line of steamers to Bangkok from Yokohama and Kobe, calling at Hongkong, Shanghai and Singapore.

Professor Ichiki has been relieved of all his posts, notably that of Chief of the Legislative Bureau, and his place has been given to Professor Okano Keijiro. The reason of this change is obscure, and it will probably be associated by the public with Professor Ichiki's recent action in the Imperial University on the occasion of the promulgation of special legislation with regard to the press.

There is said to be 1½ feet of ice at Vladivostock, but a fair-way for ships is still preserved by the ice-breakers. Communications across the harbour are made over the frozen surface. Considerable scarcity of supplies exists. One of the Russian destroyers, the Grossouki, has come from Vladivostock to Nagasaki, and will be docked at the latter place for repairs, so Japan is now beginning to repair the damages she inflicted on her recent enemy.

It appears that the principal Japanese banks were very successful in the second half-year of 1905. The following figures illustrate this:—

NETT PROFITS.

	Second half. 1905. Yen.	First half. 1905. Yen.
Mitsui Bank .....	763,877	257,910
Mitsubishi Bank .....	470,659	246,152
Yasuda Bank .....	241,202	187,388
Sumitomo Bank .....	322,710	222,594
Konoike Bank .....	145,473	142,067

It will be perceived that the record of the Konoike Bank is the least favourable. This fact is attributed to an error said to have been committed by the Manager, Mr. Shimamura, which involved a heavy loss.

The condition of Lt.-General Matsunaga is said to be again precarious. Previous reports had represented him as improving and it was hoped that all immediate cause of anxiety had disappeared, but the latest bulletins seem to indicate a serious relapse. The General is lying in hospital at Mukden.

It is expected that the whole of the Russian prisoners will have been handed over by the end of the first ten days in February. The original expectation had been that January would suffice for the purpose, but various causes have operated to produce delay. The section of prisoners destined to embark at Yokohama will all have left the shores of Japan by the close of the current month. Presumably the question of expenses will then be immediately taken up.

It is stated, apparently on good authority that Mr. Kurino will be the new Japanese Ambassador at Paris, and that Mr. Motono will proceed to St. Petersburg. Mr. Makino's successor at Vienna appears to be still unsettled, but there is talk of Mr. Hayashi, hitherto Japan's Representative in Seoul, being sent to Rome. Viscount Aoki is expected to leave for Washington in the middle of March.

Mr. D. C. Greene, in response to a request, has telegraphed to the United States Legation the following message, which has kindly been placed at our disposal:—

The port is open. Ships steer true north for Askold Light Signal Station. Pilots are obtained in Naездnik Bay.

On the 16th the operation of pumping out the Mikasa was commenced, but it having been discovered that a hitherto unsuspected injury existed, the pumping had to be stopped.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

A bad accident occurred at 11.30 p.m. on Jan. 16th on the Tokaido Railway between Sano and Gotenbama. A Shidzuoka telegram reports that the locomotive of a passenger train from Shimabashi from Shidzuoka broke down while running past Kamiyama. The train commenced to run back as the place is on an ascent, but through the efforts of the conductors, the carriages were stopped and the passengers removed in safety. The engineer and a fireman were severely scalded. It is said that a slight defect arose in the inner part of the boiler causing a leakage of steam.

BRIDGE.

BRIDGE, like football, is beginning to provoke much hostile criticism. It is tolerably clearly proved that football, played as it is played in the United States, must be called a brutal and a brutalizing game, though happily these features are foreign to it as played in England. So too of bridge, it is beginning to be plain that the game threatens to become a passion, extending to nearly all classes of society. It is curious to reflect how radically different is the range of taste for bridge as compared with the taste that used to exist for whist. In point of play the games are very similar. Indeed bridge is almost identical with dummy whist. Yet whereas comparatively few men played whist, and almost no ladies for whom society had any other attractions, the general rule now is that among men the non-players are exceptional and among ladies the proportion of players is about as large as was formerly the proportion of male votaries of whist. The result of this great vogue acquired by bridge is an immense extension of gambling. Whether in this latter respect the state of affairs is more wholesome at the beginning of the 20th century than it was at the beginning of the 19th, it is not easy to determine. The pictures drawn by CHARLES LEVER of the drinking, eating and gambling that went on at the time of which he wrote, introduce us to a state of society which in modern estimation seems very degraded. Yet one must hesitate to affirm that any game of cards played in former times exercised the wide-spread fascination of bridge. It really seems that if a true analysis could be made to-day, the vice of gambling would be found more prevalent than it ever was in any previous era of civilized society. For, whatever may be alleged to the contrary, bridge is gambling. Few men will admit that they play for money, and their disavowal is true in a sense, for if bridge did not possess engrossing features of its own, if it were merely a struggle to win coin as is roulette or faro, then its devotees would surely be comparatively few. Yet bridge will not for a moment endure the test which alone conclusively proves the character of a game. Substitute valueless counters for valuable coins and bridge would disappear incontinently from salon and mess-room. Without a money stake, small or large, it would not be played. That is indisputable, and there is thus no escaping the conclusion that bridge is gambling. What excuse then is to found for the game, if there be any excuse? The matter is forced upon our attention by reading two sermons recently preached by the Bishop of LAHORE, very stirring and beautiful sermons which give evidence of profound thought and wide sympathy. We shall not attempt to epitomise or analyse them, but there is much interest in two views advanced by the Bishop, first, that bridge is anti-social "because my gain must be nakedly and purely your loss, and conversely your gain is my loss;" and, secondly, it is anti-social "in what may perhaps be called a smaller way, because in the absorption which it produces, manners are in some cases lost sight of; other engagements are in danger of being put aside and neglected; and guests who are not willing to take their place at the table for the recognised stakes, may not perhaps be as welcome as they would otherwise be." The former of these arguments is incomparably more forcible than the latter. Every player of bridge, at least every player ranking above a professional gambler, must be familiar with the feeling of extreme reluctance that one experiences in winning a friend's money. Often the feat is insufferably unpleasant, and the necessary inference is that bridge does not tend to strengthen bonds of friendship and is better adapted to the comparatively cold intercourse of mere acquaintance. But even here a plea may be advanced which does not appear to have suggested itself to the Bishop. It is not quite accurate to say that "my gain is nakedly and purely your loss." Of all games where skill enters nearly as largely as chance one may truly say that the next best thing to winning is losing. In other words, the pastime is so entertaining that a pleasurable impression survives even the chagrin of being beaten. And this brings us to an argument not recognised apparently by the Bishop of Lahore and his fellow-thinkers, or at any rate not accorded any place in their discussions though it is perhaps the only argument possessing any defensive force. Man must have some recreation. One need not elaborate that proposition: the world has recognised it immemorably. Is there any less objectionable recreation than bridge when played for low stakes—stakes so low as barely to contribute the element of interest which would otherwise be wanting? Has not bridge, when thus limited, the great advantage of being an essentially domestic pastime; and has it not the further advantage of bringing in the fair sex, whose inability to take a hand in the majority of other pastimes creates a division between the sexes or drives men to absent themselves from their homes? If these questions can be honestly answered in the affirmative, then what we have to condemn is the abuses of bridge not the game itself, and what we have to admit is that it has its potential uses and that it may be made a comparatively innocent pastime. The frank truth is, one is bound to admit, that the abuses too often predominate. Five-sen points, for example, the common stake among foreigners residing in Japan, is quite out of proportion to the pockets of many who nevertheless play these points, partly because they shrink from making themselves singular, and mainly because of an essentially false shame which induces them to prefer unwarrantable extravagance to open confession of impecuniosity, as though it were not incomparably more respectable to be poor and honest than to be poor and insincere. It is not the fault of bridge, however, that such abuses often disfigure it, nor can the game be radically condemned until the balance of injury is clearly proved against it.

WEIHAIWEI.

[It is reported (Asahi's telegrams) that whereas England desires to continue in occupation of Weihaiwei, the Chinese have conceived a strong wish to recover the place for naval purposes. This wish is said to have suggested itself in connexion with the facts that Japan has undertaken the training of a large number of Chinese naval students, and that the project of becoming a naval power has thus commended itself once more to the notice of the Chinese. In the days when this project took practical shape in the form of the Pehyang Squadron, which, during the brief but proud period of its existence, excited a great deal of admiring comment and occupied an important place in international esteem, no one thought it beyond China's immediate capacity to realize her dream. The writer of these words well remembers a conversation he had with a distinguished English naval officer on the very eve of the China-Japan War. Having just returned from inspecting the Pehyang Squadron at Taku, a ceremony conducted for his special behoof, the officer gave it as his unchallengeable opinion that whatever the Japanese might accomplish on shore, a domain of warfare of which he did not profess any knowledge, he could affirm with confidence that at sea the victory would undoubtedly be with China. That statement was made scarcely ten years after the experience of the "State of Reprisals" when Admiral FOURNIER had been suffered to ravage the coasts of China and Formosa at will while the Pehyang squadron lay hidden in this very Weihaiwei, its Admiral and his superiors labouring under the strange impression that the great object to be accomplished in handling a navy was to keep it safely out of harm's way. The Chinese pursued a similar policy in 1894. They kept out of the path of the Japanese, persuaded, apparently, that the menace of a fleet in esse was more useful than any blow it might strike in action, and, so far as we can judge, they would never have given battle had not Admiral ITO succeeded in waylaying them as they returned from convoy duty at the mouth of the Yalu. If China means to have a navy once more, she will have to begin by unlearning the traditions of those times, and that she can unlearn them is amply proved by the gallant manner in which her officers and men fought at the Yalu and subsequently at Wei-hai-wei. Nor can any one deny that if China is ever to enjoy a feeling of security against aggression from without, she must have a powerful fleet, capable of protecting her shores not only against naval attacks but also against the invasion of armies coming over-sea. It is equally undeniable that to have a fleet she must have naval bases, and since Port Arthur and Weihaiwei are the two best in her dominions, it is natural that she should be anxious to recover one or the other of them. Port Arthur is evidently out of the question, but there seems to be a prevalent idea that England holds Weihaiwei by a very slight tenure, and that a little pressure might loosen her grasp of it. Many people have spoken of Russia's expulsion from Port Arthur as a proper occasion for Great Britain's evacuation of Weihaiwei, and have represented the one as a reasonable corollary of the other. It is very difficult to endorse such a view. That the original occupation of Weihaiwei by Great Britain was a pendant, an acknowledged pendant, of the occupation of Port Arthur by Russia, everybody knows. But it is necessary to look back a little farther. It is necessary to consider what was the proximate cause of Russia seating herself in Liaotung. She wanted to get there all along. That we know well, and we also shrewdly suspect that she would have found a pretext for getting there sooner or later even though some waiting had been necessary. But dealing with events as they actually occurred, it is found that Russia stepped into Port Arthur because Germany had preceded her by stepping into Kiaochow. It was Germany that began the "game of grab." If, then, evacuation is to be seriously contemplated, it is for Germany to take the lead in setting the good example as she formerly took the lead in inaugurating the vicious policy.

THE GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

THE report of the Government Railways for 1904 is, as usual, a very bulky volume. Formerly the Railway Bureau used to have these reports translated into English and published in that form as well as in Japanese, but the work of translation has been given up for some years and the reports are consequently little accessible to foreigners. We proceed to extract the main facts from the report for 1904.

The number of miles open for passenger traffic at the close of the year was 1,172.9, being an increase of 70 miles as compared with 1903, and the number open for goods traffic was 1,174.9. The car mileage was as follows:—

	Miles.	Compared with 1903.	Difference, miles, per cent.
Mileage of passenger cars .....	2,447,212	—1,015,076	—29.3
Mileage of goods waggons .....	3,116,006	+258,291	+9
Mileage of mixed trains .....	3,543,471	+126,867	+3.7
Totals .....	9,106,749*	—629,918	—6.4

The following table shows the number of passengers and the quantity of goods carried:

	Compared with 1903.	Difference, per cent.
Number of passengers .....	28,217,193	—5,261,002 —15
Tons of Merchandise, etc. ....	3,326,048	+ 82,282 +2.5

* This total does not tally but we reproduce it as it stands.—Ed. J.M.

TRAFFIC RECEIPTS.
	Yen.	Compared with 1903.	Difference, per cent.
Receipts from passengers.....	12,447,356	— 677,348	—5.1
.. .. Goods. 7,115,381		+1,002,682	+16.4
Various Receipts. 358,532		+ 138,005	+62.5
Totals .....	19,921,269	+ 463,339	+ 2.3

As to these figures, the obvious general explanation is that the effects of the war made themselves felt throughout the year, especially in its first 10 months. The people naturally travelled comparatively little and large inroads had to be made on the regular service for purposes of military transport, a service which of course brought no remuneration to State railways. In October, the victories won by Japan's arms began to exercise an inspiring effect and the traffic returns showed a slight improvement. By that time, also, there was some relaxation of the demand for military transport. On the whole, the fact that no diminution of total receipts is recorded in spite of such a seriously disturbing cause, must be noted with satisfaction and certainly implies good management on the part of the officials of the Tetsudo Sakugyo-kyoku.

The following table shows the total receipts from all sources and the total outlays:—

	Yen.	Compared with 1903.	Yen.
Total Receipts .....	24,915,254	+1,205,274
Total Outlays .....	13,445,326	+ 13,959
Nett Results .....	11,468,928	+1,191,324
PROFIT AND LOSS ACCOUNT.
	Yen.	Compared with 1903.	Yen.
Traffic Receipts.....	20,367,767	+1,006,024
Working Expenses ...	8,439,187	— 596,240
Nett Results .....	11,928,580	+1,602,264

It is noticeable that the working expenses were only 41.4 per cent. of the traffic receipts, whereas in 1903 the figure had been 53 per cent. This good result was not due solely to economical management: something must be attributed to the increase in goods traffic and the diminution in the number of passengers.

PURCHASES OF ROLLING STOCK AND OTHER NECESSARIES.

	Yen.	Compared with 1903.	Yen.
Purchases in Japan ...	2,601,345	—5,270,671
Purchases abroad ...	2,262,503	+ 428,928
Total .....	4,863,848

The amount of capital sunk in building these railways from the beginning of the construction period until the close of 1903 was 150,926,870 yen. During 1904 there was an addition of 5,183,667 yen.

	Yen.
Fixed Capital .....	156,110,537
Floating Capital .....	220,000
Fund for Necessaries .....	2,050,000
Total .....	158,260,537

On this basis it is seen that the nett profit was 7.5 per cent. of all the capital invested.

The policy of the Government during this year was to desist from all new public works and to postpone as far as possible the completion of those already commenced. Some of the lines, however, could not be abandoned. Thus the estimates included a sum of 12,183,399 yen for construction purposes, but of that total only 4,504,331 yen was spent, the remaining 7,679,068 yen being carried over.

THE "STANDARD" & COUNT HIROSAWA.

THE London Standard has given prominence and importance to some utterances which it claims to have extracted from Count HIROSAWA during the latter's recent visit to England. Count HIROSAWA is represented by the well-known London daily as a "true friend" of England, and his statements are described as "the back of the Japanese mind." As to the former point, we can only recall the old query, "If you loved me so much, why did you kick me downstairs?" and as to the latter, we venture to allege that Count HIROSAWA himself never claimed to set forth "the back of the Japanese mind." A man that has no good thing to say of England will not be classed by the robust common sense of Englishmen as one of their "lovers," and sentiments which embody only condemnation and depreciation are not the sentiments that have induced the Japanese nation to clasp hands with Great Britain and to acclaim the union with unparalleled enthusiasm. Count HIROSAWA speaks after an absence of 11 years from England. Eleven years is a long time. The changes that such a lapse of years produces in the mental standpoint of any individual are very great, especially when, as in the case of Count HIROSAWA, the period separates youth from the threshold of middle age. It is to this change of standpoint that we attribute Count HIROSAWA's changed views about England. We all undergo that experience. So long as we are ourselves a part and parcel of the events among which we live, so long as glorious youth inspires us with longing interest in everything that surrounds us, we have no time to moralize: we have only time to live. What has happened to "the back of the Japanese mind," so far as Count HIROSAWA is concerned, is that it has become subjective and that it finds differences of fact where there are only differences of discernment. Many evidences of this misconception present themselves. For instance, Count HIROSAWA declares that "Japan is certainly alive to the changes for the worse in the administration and character of the English," and his first illustration is this:—"I am struck with the absence from your educational system, at all events of the lower middle and working classes, of any provision for teaching them their duties to the State." That, be it observed, is adduced as a "change for the worse," and Count HIROSAWA caps it by noting that "there is apparently not a word or a line in any of the text books, or in the spirit of the educational code, which teaches sacrifice for the country as a condition of national life," and that "in Japan and Germany it is different." But this supposed deficiency, now discovered for the first time, has always existed. To call it a "change for the worse" is confusion of terms. And why does it exist? Simply because the necessity of teaching patriotism to a young Englishman has never occurred to English educators. They would as soon think of teaching a hungry child how to eat. If it be thought essential elsewhere to inculcate this elementary virtue, Englishmen are not blameworthy because they can afford to dispense with such instruction in their own case. They read their country's history; they learn from its pages what things have been achieved by the patriotism and bravery of their ancestors, and if they do not burn to emulate these noble examples, they are a kind of Englishmen not found in England. Count HIROSAWA is careful to tell us that he "does not speak of music-hall patriotism, but of self-surrender, such as we know it in Japan and such as the Germans know it." Would it be too much to entreat a descent from airy generalities to the firm ground of fact? Would it be too much to inquire on what occasions the English have shown themselves wanting in the spirit of self-surrender and on what occasions the Germans have, shown themselves comparatively rich in it? Were the English volunteers who fought so stoutly in the Transvaal inferior in patriotism to the German conscripts who marched to Paris? These are the latest tests: the German test, applied 35 years ago; the English, 6 years. We know of nothing later, and on the evidence of these tests to affirm that Englishmen are deficient in patriotism and that Germans abound in it, is as inconsequential as it is impertinent. Of course the Standard's access to "the back of the Japanese mind" reveals that "the Boer war and the failure to organize an efficient military force have made a painful impression in Japan." Perhaps they have among some classes, but we credit the Japanese with more discernment than Count HIROSAWA assigns to them. We credit them with recognising that no country in the world except England could have fought and won the Boer war; that such a war was absolutely unique in military annals; that never before were arms of precision used as the Boers used them; that never before had the field been taken by an army consisting wholly of mounted infantry; and that never before had a country's forces been required to invade a land whose topography was almost unknown to them. Germany bulks largely at "the back of the Japanese mind," but we would ask in all frankness whether the Germans are conducting their paltry skirmish with the Hereros in such a manner as to suggest that they would have made short work of the South-African campaign. If there be any painful lesson taught by the Boer war it is that life has come to be over-valued in the Occident. Christianity has done that; Christianity whose influence Count HIROSAWA nevertheless finds to be "waning" in England. It is one of the strange inconsistencies of Christian practice, for in what can life be called valuable if, as the followers of the NAZARENE teach, it be but a "dome of many-coloured glass staining the bright radiance of eternity"? How much nobler and more consistent is General Nogi's description of his officers and soldiers, who passed away with smiling faces, believing that death for the sake of country meant merely to be re-born into a higher and a better existence! All are agreed that strategy and tactics should aim at winning battles with a minimum loss of life, but where victory can not be won except by sacrifices, these have to be unhesitatingly made. That, we venture to think, is the one lesson of the Transvaal war. It did not show in any respect that Englishmen fight less stoutly or endure privations and fatigue less gallantly than they have always fought and always endured in the long process of building up the grandest edifice of empire the world has ever seen.

However, since we experience a feeling of natural repugnance to writing on behalf of our country a defence easily mistakable for eulogy, we shall conclude by brief reference to a matter which we take to be the only important part of the Standard's interview. Count HIROSAWA is made to say:—

"Do not think that you can buy an alliance that will maintain you in safety. The rejoicings over the Anglo-French alliance strike me as unreal, and indicate rather a love of ease than the strength of national character. I will go even further, and say that the alliance with Japan is a mark of England's decadence, while the suggestion that has been made that Japanese troops might be required for the defence of your Indian frontier is a suggestion that could only come from a nation which knows that its period of decline has begun. The recent festivities over the French fleet were a flare up. It is too sudden to endure, and is a sign of decadence, just as the alliance with Japan is a sign of decadence. Both were clever acts on the part of our Foreign Secretary, but they indicate decay of the old John Bull spirit, which does not extend to the middle and the lower classes.

We can not too strongly protest against the silliness that to cement an alliance with a country having common interests is a sign of decadence. Since Count HIROSAWA admires Germany so profoundly, it should have occurred to him that Germany is the great pioneer of the policy of alliances, and that, in any estimate of guarantees of national safety, the Chancellor of the Empire invariably places the Triple Alliance in the forefront. We do not for an instant suggest that because Germany sets an example, England is disposed to follow it; but we do allege that this is an age of alliances, and that since their object and effect are to maintain peace they deserve the applause of every civilized publicist. Further we would remind the Standard's informant that if the possibility of Japanese troops helping to defend the Indian frontier has been spoken of in England, the contingency of the British navy assisting to defend Japan's shores has been freely and approvingly discussed in Japan. It is in the very essence of an alliance between equal Powers that neither should ask for anything it is not prepared to give in turn. Common sense makes these things so palpable that we begin to suspect the Standard's accuracy in reproducing Count HIROSAWA. If he has been misrepresented the sooner he corrects the error the better.

PLEASED WITH CONDUCT OF GENERAL HOSPITAL.

It may not be generally known to the public that recently quite a large number of former Russian prisoners have been cared for at the Yokohama General Hospital before embarking on the transports. Their satisfaction with their quarters and their treatment finds voice in the following letter from General Daniloff to Dr. Wheeler, the Physician of the Hospital.

The Commission for the Repatriation of Russian Prisoners of War.

Yokohama, December 31st, 1905.

To Dr. EDWIN WHEELER,

Yokohama General Hospital.

DEAR SIR,—Thanks to your kind assistance the Russian Red Cross Society has been enabled to care for, in the admirably arranged General Hospital, some of the unhappy sick from among the Russian prisoners of war, who for more than a year had been suffering in prison in a foreign land, where customs and the ways of life were entirely strange to them.

In the Yokohama General Hospital, lying in the soft beds in its warm, light ward, and noting the care with which they were treated, they found the long desired rest and relief from their sufferings.

Our Medical Staff was impressed by your most kind and attentive treatment, and your readiness at all times to assist them in every possible way. I beg to tender you my profound thanks for all your kindness.

I also desire to convey my thanks, through you, to Dr. Ishiura, Sister Gray, and Sister Peacock, all of whom did much in the way of advice and care of our invalids, especially at a period when our own Staff had not yet arrived.

Very much work for our sick was done by Mr. and Mrs. C. Ellis, who complied with their every wish. Thanks to their care an excellent standard of diet was always maintained. I beg to tender them my thanks for all their trouble.

I am, Dear Doctor Wheeler,
Your most obedient servant,

VLADIMIR DANILOFF.

THE PLAGUE.

The Governor of Osaka-fu reports that a case of bubonic plague appeared on Jan. 12th. The case proved fatal. The victim is the infant child of K. Matsui, a tailor, residing in Kujo machi.

A case was reported on Jan. 12th at the village of Chofu, in Yamaguchi prefecture. It is said that the patient recently arrived there from Shimonoseki.

It may be added that since May last, when the first outbreak was reported, up to the present, the cases in Osaka number 132, including nine which have been reported this year. Of the whole number, a hundred and two were fatal.

The cases in Kobe, since August up to the present, number sixty-eight.

A case of plague was reported on Jan. 14th at Kujo-machi in Osaka.

A Kobe telegram under date of Jan. 16th reports a case of bubonic plague.

On Jan. 15th, a case was reported in Osaka. The patient, a youth, died.

CUSTOMS PROTESTS.

Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama Customs, gave a decision on Jan. 18th on a protest instituted by Messrs. Carl Rhode, No. 70, Yamashita-cho. The firm imported "Flash Light Bayer" on which the appraisers imposed 15 per cent. ad valorem duty in accordance with No. 15 of the tariff and also 15 per cent. war tax. The importers contended that the material should be dealt with under No. 136 of the same tariff. The protest was sustained on the ground that the material is a kind of chemical though it is not a part of a photographic apparatus such as was held by the importers.

On the same day the Customs Director gave three other decisions on the protests instituted by the Taisu Gomei Kaisha, S. Yamaguchi, and J. Hoshino, who imported steel wire to be used as paragon ribs, "polishing compound," and a button-making machine respectively. The protests were all dismissed.

REVIEWS.

Shinto (the Way of the Gods) by W. G. ASTON, C.M.G., D. Lit. (Longmans, Green, & Co.), 1905.

READERS of Mr. Aston's History of Japanese Literature in the "Literatures of the World" series will not require much farther commendation for a new work from his pen. In this new treatise he has done for the indigenous religion of Japan what his previous work did for her literature; investing the subject, even for the general reader, with the charm that comes of thorough mastery of his materials united to literary skill.

This by the way only; for the work is not directly meant for the general reader. As the author explains in his preface, it has two objects, being intended "primarily and chiefly as a repertory of the more significant facts of Shinto for the use of scientific students of religion." The second object will be dealt with presently. The main body of the work is done with a fullness and accuracy of statement that give the book the rank of a classic. The explanation of what Shinto is and all about it that is worth knowing occupies ten out of the fourteen chapters, or more than four-fifths of the treatise.

The first chapter enumerates the materials for the study of Shinto. The sources are three, viz: the two first histories of Japan, Kojiki and Nihongi, written early in the eighth century, and the sacrificial prayers for solemn occasions which were first put on record as part of the Code of the tenth century, the Yengishiki. The literature of Shinto is, however, very voluminous; and we dare to express the belief that no foreign scholar except Mr. Aston himself has ever thoroughly explored it. The two chief scriptures of the religion however, have been made accessible to readers of English by Professor Chamberlain's translation of the Kojiki and Mr. Aston's of the Nihongi; and supplementary to these we have Sir Ernest Satow's and Dr. Florenz's translations of the Norito, or ritual invocations. The author's discussion of the materials in the first chapter is condensed, we had almost said dismissed, in the compass of four pages.

The second object of the book is to present "an outline theory of the origin and earlier stages of the development of religion, prepared with special reference to the Shinto evidence. The subject is treated from a positive, not from a negative or agnostic standpoint, Religion being regarded as a normal function, not a disease of humanity." Parts of this original contribution to religious philosophy have a high value, as will presently be pointed out. It occupies Chapters II.-V., or less than a fourth of the volume; but it is to this portion that attention will be mainly directed in this review. For scientific students of religion the importance and opportuneness of Mr. Aston's researches can be explained in a paragraph.

One of the most singular among the intellectual phenomena of our time is the slowness with which the new science of Sociology is winning its way to general recognition. Several causes contribute to this result; but in a large degree it is due to a conflict of opinion on a fundamental question between the two great thinkers who established this latest of the positive sciences. Comte's discovery of the law of mental evolution was to Sociology what Lavoisier's discovery of the true nature of combustion was to Chemistry; it laid the foundation, and made further progress possible. Chemistry, however, is an experimental science, whilst Sociology is not. Hence, when Herbert Spencer, who, next to Comte, contributed most towards the building up of the science, rejected Comte's fundamental discovery, and set up an opposition theory of his own, enquirers were disconcerted and the general public was left in the perplexity of doubt. As experiment was, from the nature of the case, impossible, there was urgent need for further trustworthy evidence, coming from some new source and carefully sifted. Such new light has now been found in the study of the indigenous religion of Japan. Neither Comte nor Spencer had any accurate knowledge of Japanese mental evolution. Mr. Aston has. He is the foremost authority on the subject amongst foreign investigators; and in this book he brings forward a mass of evidence, carefully weighed and impartially set forth, which virtually decides, for competent enquirers, the controversy between the two protagonists.

Comte's law of intellectual evolution affirms that the mind of the race passes through three states or stages, namely, the Theological or imaginative, the Metaphysical or abstract, and the Positive or real; and that the first stage itself passed through the three phases of Fetishism, Polytheism and Monotheism. Alone amongst thinkers of the first rank, Herbert Spencer undertook to show that this grand generalization was unsound. He rejected it altogether, and endeavoured to prove that Fetishism was neither the primitive state of the human mind nor the first form of religion. His counter theory is that, so far from confounding activity with life, the earliest men drew a clearly apprehended distinction between the animate and inanimate in nature, and that not natural objects and forces but ghosts or the spirits of dead ancestors were the primal objects of worship. The conception of gods, and ultimately of one God, was, he held, based solely on the conception of the spirit or double of deceased men.

Comte, on the other hand, claimed for religion, as for intellectual speculation in general, a much deeper and broader basis. By virtue of a primordial and universal tendency, our first human ancestors explained to themselves external events and nature's operations by supposing objects to be endowed with life and possessed of wills analogous to the human.

Now Spencer did not deny the prevalence, almost universal, of such infantine beliefs. It was impossible for him or any other careful observer to deny the fact that early man did ascribe animation and personality to multitudes of inanimate things. But he denied that this way of thinking was primitive or spontaneous, and he elaborately endeavoured to prove that, for instance, the conception of the sun or the sky as being animated and exercising volition arose at a relatively later stage of social development, in consequence of these great natural powers coming to be identified in thought with the souls of some great chieftain, king or ancestor long ago deceased.

To the question, then:—What was the earliest phase of religion? Comte answers, Fetishism: that is, the worship of inanimate natural objects and forces believed to be endowed with life and wills similar in kind to the human; while Spencer's answer is: Not so: worship of the spirits of the dead ancestors and chiefs came first, and in course of time their spirits became confounded and identified with sky, sun, sea, storm, etc., ghosts thus becoming gradually elevated into gods. Comte's exposition of Fetishism appeared in 1853; Spencer's Ghost-theory some twenty years later. For now nearly a generation this divergence of theory has been a stumbling-block in the path of sociological progress.

That Mr. Aston's study of Shinto has virtually removed this obstacle we shall now endeavour to show. He is not a partizan of either side; and if he has a bias at all, it is towards the English, not the French philosopher. But one of the most conspicuous of the many sterling qualities of his book is its impartiality. No material fact bearing on the enquiry is ignored or given an exaggerated importance. His impartiality is not that of the judicial bench, for the work holds aloof from controversy, but rather the sobriety of judgement of a scientific student testing an hypothesis of his own.

What, then, is the outcome of Mr. Aston's exploration of the Shinto evidence as regards its bearing upon the earliest stage of religious history? In effect, and stated briefly, it amounts to this: the Ghost-god hypothesis of Spencer is found to be inadequate; and the Fetishistic explanation of the phenomena is applicable and elucidative all along the line.

Mr. Aston, it is true, does not like the term Fetish or Fetishism and would be pleased if it were discarded altogether. He objects to it on two grounds; first, that it implies a stigma; secondly, that it is confusing or, as he says, "blurred by indiscriminate use." There is a complete answer to both these objections. As scientifically defined and used by Comte, it implies no stigma whatever; and, so far from being confusing, its new sociological signification renders it not only comprehensive but precise. As the aim of the Positive philosophy is the regeneration of human conceptions on the basis of reality, it follows that new and truer significations had to be given to old words, especially to such cardinal terms as philosophy, religion, theology, fetishism, psychology and so forth. None of these words have now the same connotation as they had before sociology was founded. So far from condemning the fetishist mode of thought, Comte showed its necessity and value, gives it a higher place than theologism in his historical retrospect, and insists upon the necessity of including it permanently along with the positive spirit in the religious synthesis of the future.

Mr. Aston prefers to use the term personification: but this, surely, indicates a different thing, and a much later stage of thought. It is personification when a poet calls the sun the King of day, or Mont Blanc the Monarch of mountains. It was fetishism when Cyrus delayed for months his conquering march on Babylon in order to punish a river for its impious insolence in drowning one of the sacred white horses that followed in his train, or when Xerxes flagellated the Aegean Sea for smashing up his fleet.

But whichever term be used, the Shinto evidence as here set forth, makes it clear beyond doubt that the worship of the nature gods arose earlier than the worship of ghosts or ancestors. "None of the Dei Majores of the more ancient Shinto," says Mr. Aston (p. 177), "are deified individual men, and although it is highly probable that some of the inferior mythical personages were originally human beings, I am unable to point to a case of this kind which rests on anything more than conjecture." And other passages, not less decisive of the issue, might be quoted.

This book, then, challenges and strongly discredits Spencer's theory that religion had its origin in ancestor-worship and deification of ghosts. Indeed, the author goes further than that; for he maintains that such element of ancestor-worship as is mixed up with Shinto is not only of relatively later date but of foreign origin—imported, like so much else that spelled progress, from China.

Such destructive criticism, however, is merely incidental to the work, its aim being essentially expository and constructive. Rejecting Spencer's hitherto widely accepted theory of religious evolution, the author sets forth a theory of his own. In the main, it is a confirmation, all the more significant from being unintended and unconscious, of Comte's delineation of the course of religious development. Indeed, in one respect it is probably an improvement of it. For whilst Comte distinguishes Fetishism into only two stages, the earlier or spontaneous, and the later or astrolatric, Mr. Aston divides the former into four logical steps: which must be studied in his own pages. It is a passage which workers in the field of primitive religions will find well worthy of examination. It cannot be dealt with here.

A short review such as this can do but scant justice to the manifold merits of the book. It is certain to attract a wide circle of readers, Japanese as well as foreign. It will take its place at once as the standard English authority on its subject, and is likely to hold the field for many a year to come.

J.C.H.

China and Religion, by EDWARD HARPER PARKER, M.A.; London, John Murray; Yokohama, Kelly and Walsh, Ltd.

THE English-speaking world owes a great and far too little appreciated debt of gratitude to the literary tastes and abilities of the members of the British diplomatic and consular services whose lives have been spent in the countries of the Far East. While not for one moment depreciating the labours of the many eminent French and German investigators in the same fields of research, we still contend that the record of English writers in throwing light into every imaginable corner of the Orient is one of which their fellow-countrymen should feel very proud. There is scarcely a subject connected with China, Japan, Korea, Indo-China and the contiguous countries which has not received attention at their hands at one time or another, and it is certainly not their fault if the English-speaking world remains still crassly ignorant concerning much that has to do with the lands and peoples of the Orient. These men have toiled and delved and then in the fulness of time have given of the fruit of their labours freely. But, as Mr. Parker, the erudite author of the book now under review sadly acknowledges in his introduction, "there is so small a demand for things Chinese of an abstract nature in Great Britain that I have long since found my stock-in-trade a drug upon the market." Still for all that the writer on Far Eastern subjects may draw consolation if he wills. There is a public—though possibly it may seem small in comparison with other literary circles—which gladly receives the output of the pens of Chinese sinologists; and its numbers are increasing, steadily but surely. To such the appearance of "China and Religion" will be very welcome. Mr. Parker brings to the task of compilation and original research many rare qualifications. The experiences garnered during several years passed in active service in China; an acute insight into Chinese ways of thought; an acquaintance with Chinese literature most catholic in its range; a faculty of appreciative observation; and above all a capacity for accumulating and searching for facts which no drudgery or weariness is able to daunt: these are his in rare abundance. As Professor of Chinese at the Victoria University of Manchester Mr. Parker must find his time fairly well occupied, but he still discovers opportunities for the exercise of his pen, as a glance at the list of his writings found at the end of this book will show. In the present volume he deals entirely with the subject of Religion as it has affected China since the beginning of recorded history. He begins with China's primitive religion when the dual principles of Yin and Yang first began to occupy the minds of Chinese thinkers, and gives a very clear explanation of Tao, or the correct road, which forms the solid foundation of all Chinese philosophy. The opening chapter also tells how first the Taoism of Lao-tze and then Confucianism arose and how both, founded on purely Chinese old texts, sought, one in a radical the other in a conservative manner, to arrest the politico-religious decay of the nation. Neither of these forms of philosophy was piously religious in the western sense; there was no terror of after life or conception of a jealous God. But for all that most modern Chinese virtues, says Mr. Parker, may be traced through Taoism. Humility is its key. Confucius, who did not admire Lao-tze or his methods, died a disappointed reformer, but the political use which China has made of his philosophy has been simply enormous. With the introduction of Buddhism the Chinese at length became acquainted with what we denominate religion. They were first told of the teaching of Gautama, or, as they prefer to call him, Sakyamuni, about the year 2 B.C., by a King of the Indo-Scythians, so we may assume that the Indian religion found access to the Flowery Kingdom by the land route which was followed 1200 years later by Marco Polo and his uncles. An Emperor's brother was converted to the Indian Faith, but the indiscretions of the exalted convert were such as to lead to the discrediting of Buddhism for upwards of a century. Yet quietly it spread over the land and soon Taoism began to borrow from the new-comer in order to compete with it; for its ideas regarding women suited the Chinese temperament, while the new conceptions about the transmigration of souls, continence and abstinence were further attractions. Though sometimes discouraged by the reigning dynasty Buddhism has never been seriously persecuted in China. Its followers have not known "the fire and stake." Its worst set-back was when one of the Ming emperors (1521-1566) "caused to be burnt all the Buddhist sanctuaries in the palace precincts, together with hundreds, and even thousands of gold printed books and images of Buddha. All relics of Buddha in the shape of bones and teeth were thrown away, almost without an exception." In concluding the chapter on Buddhism in China, Mr. Parker says:—

None of the Manchu emperors has ever shown the slightest affection for or belief in Buddhism; the two first might have been Christians if the Jesuits and the Popes had been more cautious; the third was somewhat of a Taoist mystic, but his son Kien-lung got rid of all the alchemists and charlatans who had practised on his father's credulity with their degenerate Taoism the instant he came to the Throne. Since then Buddhism and Taoism (i.e. the corrupt later Taoism) have been contemptuously and goodnaturedly tolerated as popular requirements. Pure Taoism is still revered.

Space will allow but the barest mention of the headings of the next few chapters. These are:—"Fire worship and Manicheism"; "Nestorianism"; "Islam"—the religion which has taken the firmest root but has been the least described of any in China; "The Jews"—those of K'ai-feng Fu being dealt with very minutely; "The Roman Church"; "Protestants"; "The Orthodox Church," and "Shintoism." Mr. Parker treats each religion with the detachment which we should expect from a scholar of his type of mind, thereby reflecting the attitude of the Chinese themselves, who, as he points out, have never "refused hospitality and consideration to any religion recommended to them as such." Mr. Parker, reading from Chinese history, declares that whenever any religion has suffered from hostility at Chinese hands, "it has always sprung up from political and economical causes." These he sets out at length in the different chapters devoted to each branch of religion treated, and after discussing the unsightly quarrels of Dominicans, Franciscans and Jesuits in centuries gone by, says:—

And as regards the Protestants of our day, if they can only go about their charitable business without sneering at the Catholics; refrain from harshly criticising subjects dear to Chinese prejudice; and not allow themselves to be made tools of by mercenary natives, there is no apparent reason why they should not for ever enjoy the toleration which the Chinese have always been disposed to extend to religion qua religion. The same remarks of course apply to the Roman Catholics of the nineteenth century up to the present time, and to their behaviour towards Protestants.

Mr. Parker devotes a whole chapter to Shinto and sees in it but a revival of the old Chinese Shên-tou of 3,000 years ago. We need not discuss his views of the subject for since the appearance of his book Mr. Aston has issued to the world a work upon Shinto which must take rank as the finest exposition of the belief yet written. Suffice it to say Mr. Parker has a very lofty conception of Shinto, holding that it is significant that it "should have produced moral qualities nobler than any Christian Power can show at this moment."

We have noticed few errors in Mr. Parker's work, and these only minor in degree. He will be glad to know that Dr. Hepburn, who came out to China for the American Presbyterian Mission in 1843, but whose work in Japan greatly outdistanced his China record, so far from being dead as he supposes, is still a hale and hearty resident of a New England town. The Greek Orthodox cathedral at Surugadai, Tokyo, too, has long been finished, and it is one of the jewels in Japan's crown that during the recent difference between her and Russia it was entirely unmolested and its congregation were able to carry on their devotions under Bishop Nicolai entirely undisturbed.

In taking leave of this excellent book we quote the closing words of the Introduction:—

Why, then, should the odium theologicum be so persistent, except on the hypothesis that no one possesses the least knowledge about either life or soul, and therefore each apostle feels angry at being driven into a corner when pressed for demonstration? Such, at least, is the tolerant view the best rulers of China have always taken of religion. It has always been, and still is held, that the Emperor and his functionaries are alone capable of fully realising the inner meaning of the classics—Taoist or Confucian—and that the sole duty of each of their lieges is to co-operate in the universal harmony, at least until by study he himself forms one of the eclectic; and the door is wide open to all. For this reason emperors of each important dynasty have from time to time, whilst carefully refraining from enslaving the mind with compulsory dogmas, issued paternal homilies to their "children," inculcating the virtues of filial piety, respect for elders and superiors, neighbourliness in villages, severity (with kindness) to children, contentment with one's lot, and abstention from causing pain or evil. If our Western missionaries would conform to these simple principles, which, after all, are Christian in spirit, we should hear little of persecution; and it is back to these simple principles that the Japanese seem to be going with their Shinto; perhaps carrying the Chinese with them.

We are in receipt of the Directory of Protestant Missionaries in China, Japan and Korea for 1906 which seems to be a very full and complete list of all those engaged in Protestant Missionary work in the countries mentioned. It is issued by the Hongkong Daily Press Office.

Mrs. Richardson's book, "In Japanese Hospitals During War Time," will be published by Messrs. Blackwood immediately. Mrs. Richardson was the only foreign lady whose services the Japanese accepted in their military hospitals during the war, and she has written this account of her experiences at the request of the Japanese Red Cross Society.

We acknowledge receipt through the Kanagawa Kencho of the twenty-ninth annual report of the "Banking Business in Japan," published by the Department of Finance. The report refers to banking transactions from April 1st, 1904, to March 31st, 1905. The book includes reports on the conditions of business done by native and foreign banks; money market; the currency; national loan bonds; and the national treasury.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

It is perhaps quite true to say that even the educated section of the Japanese nation takes little interest in philosophic speculation of any kind, and hence no interest in the deeper questions of religion, which are all philosophic. Hence essays like that of Mr. Kuroiwa Shūroku, which appeared in the Rikugō Zasshi some months ago, most probably only attract the attention of a few controversialists, who read them for the sake of confuting the errors with which they seem to them to abound. To those who regard Mr. Kuroiwa as a man who is groping after such truth as is to be had on questions on which nobody knows much, his essay on "The Final Stage of Religion" will prove to be of considerable interest. Thinkers on religion either think on the old orthodox lines or they think on modern scientific and philosophic lines. Mr. Kuroiwa is distinctly one of the latter class. That he is earnest and sincere nobody seems to doubt. He realizes to the full the enormous difficulty attending the inquiry into the nature of the abstraction or Being men call God. His essay is too long and too abstract for reproduction here even in an epitomized form. We shall content ourselves with stating the principal conclusions which he has reached. Mr. Kuroiwa begins by informing us that he is one of those who believe that the progress of thought is such that on some questions men before very long will reach a ne plus ultra stage. Religion he takes to be one of these. The educated world will some day settle down to the conviction that on this subject there is nothing new to be said and nothing new to be discovered.* To Mr. Kuroiwa it seems that the greatest of all religious questions concerns the nature and attributes of God, and he tries to show what religion's final decision will be on this subject. The two great explanations of the nature of God, the Christian Monotheistic and the Pantheistic, he discusses at great length. His objection to Christianity is founded on the use it makes of what he conceives to be a thoroughly misleading anthropomorphic symbolism when speaking of the Supreme Being. His views on this subject were briefly stated in our last Summary. But his arguments were only very partially met by the Koye in the article from which we quoted. To the contention that the symbolism employed leads to entirely erroneous conceptions of the Divine Being and therefore must be rejected by the honest seeker after truth the Koye furnished no satisfactory answer. Mr. Kuroiwa says that symbolism which conveys false impressions as to the nature of God should be unequivocally rejected.†

* Dr. Anezaki, for one, thinks this stage has been reached already.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY).

† This subject is so lucidly dealt with by Schopenhauer in an essay entitled "Religion, a Dialogue," that, in order to make it quite plain what Mr. Kuroiwa's point of view is, we quote from Saunder's English translation of the essay. Demophiles says:—"Religion is truth allegorically and mythically expressed, and so rendered attainable and digestible by mankind in general. Mankind couldn't possibly take it pure and unmixed, just as we can't breathe pure oxygen; we require an addition of four times its bulk in nitrogen. In plain language the profound meaning, the high aim of life, can only be unfolded and presented to the masses symbolically, because they are incapable of grasping it in its true significance. Philosophy, on the other hand, should be like the Eleusinian mysteries, for the few, the elite."

Philalethes.—I understand. It comes, in short, to truth wearing the garment of falsehood. But in doing so it enters on a fatal alliance. What a dangerous weapon is put into the hands of those who are authorized to employ falsehood as the vehicle of truth! If it is as you say, I fear the damage caused by the falsehood will be greater than any advantage the truth could ever produce. Of course, if the allegory were admitted to be such, I should raise no

Mr. Kuroiwa discusses adversely the Christian notions in reference to the power of prayer. He says that it is quite impossible for any thoughtful man to suppose that the will of the Supreme Being can be affected by the prayers of supplicants. The notion that the Almighty can be made use of for the supply of personal wants of various kinds, that even the rich man's coffers can be reached by means of prayer and the said rich man be induced to subscribe money for charitable purposes, an idea which is strongly held by so many Christians, Mr. Kuroiwa rejects unequivocally as the product of unworthy conceptions of Deity, as part of the misleading symbolism so much used by Christians. Nothing is more certain, says Mr. Kuroiwa, than that as intelligence advances all explanations of God which represent Him as possessing numerous derogatory human attributes will be rejected. Religion in its final stage will have got rid of the last trace of anthropomorphism.

Dismissing the assumption that everything that is inexplicable or mysterious furnishes a proof of the existence of God, Mr. Kuroiwa passes on to discuss Pantheism. He states with tolerable clearness the insuperable difficulties connected with this theory. It explains nothing. It furnishes no basis for religion, because it throws no light on the character of the Supreme Being whose existence it assumes. To call the world "God" is neither to explain the world nor to explain God. The difficulty is the same whether one says "the world is God, or God is the world." Pantheism presupposes Theism; for only in as far as we start from a god, that is, in as far as we possess him as something with which we are familiar can we end by identifying him with the world. The Pantheist does not start from the world as something which requires explanation, but from God as something given. Not knowing what else to do with Him the Pantheist makes the world take over his rôle. Taking an unprejudiced view of the world as it is, no one would dream of regarding it as a god. No satisfactory deductions as to the character of God can be made from the mixed phenomena of the world; for along with the signs of benevolence in the mind of the designer of the universe, supposing it to be designed, there are clear signs of malevolence that would be condemned if displayed by human beings to-day. Mr. Kuroiwa pronounces Pantheism to be superior to Monotheism, in that it abstains from endowing God with human attributes and thus trying to set limits to His infinity, but adds that as a basis of objection; but with the admission it would rob itself of all respect, and consequently of all utility. The allegory must, therefore, put in a claim to be true in the proper sense of the word, and maintain the claim; while, at the most, it is true only in an allegorical sense. Here lies the irreparable mischief, the permanent evil; and this is why religion has always been and will always be in conflict with the noble endeavour after pure truth." Schopenhauer comes to the conclusion that no such thing as a true religion can exist. Philalethes is made to say:—"A true philosophy, then, can always exist, but not a true religion; true, I mean, in the proper understanding of that word, not merely in that flowery or allegorical sense which you have described; a sense in which all religions would be true, only in various degrees. It is quite in keeping with the inextricable mixture of weal and woe, honesty and deceit, good and evil, nobility and baseness, which is the average characteristic of the world everywhere, that the most important, the most lofty, the most sacred truths can make their appearance only in combination with a lie, can even borrow strength from a lie as from something that works more powerfully on mankind; and, as revelation, must be ushered in by a lie. This might, indeed, be regarded as the cachet of the moral world. However, we won't give up the hope that mankind will eventually reach a point of maturity and education at which it can on the one side produce, and on the other receive, the true philosophy. Simplex sigillum veri: the naked truth must be so simple and intelligible that it can be imparted to all in its true form, without any admixture of myth and fable, without disguising it in the form of religion." To which Demophiles replies "You've no notion how stupid most people are." Philalethes rejoins: "I am only expressing a hope which I can't give up.....Religion has two faces, one of truth, one of fraud. According as you look at one or the other, you will bear her favour or ill-will."—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

religion, as furnishing a suitable object of worship it is wholly unsatisfactory. Religion, then, in its final stage will reject the theory that God is in everything and that everything shows part of His nature, as involving a low conception of God's character.*

At the close of his essay Mr. Kuroiwa seems to us to swallow his own words and to re-erect what he had taken so much pains to pull down. After telling us that the most philosophic conception of God is one which is devoid of the personality that implies finiteness, which separates Him from the Universe and thinks of Him as the Absolute, the Real Being, the Great Ego, he informs us that such a conception of God is of little use as a basis for religion, as people can't be induced to love or worship an abstract essence that is quite devoid of human attributes. So for religious purposes Christian Monotheism and Buddhist Pantheism have alike attributed to God feelings akin to those we human beings possess, that is, they have made Him a person, who loves, hates, grows angry, pities, takes vengeance on enemies and rewards faithful service. So we find that Mr. Kuroiwa follows Schopenhauer in thinking that the highest philosophy and religion must always part company, because the conclusions reached by the most profound thinkers on the riddle of the universe take away from that abstract essence for convenience sake called God all those limitations and human characteristics on which religious teachers so delight to dwell and on which the whole influence of religion in the world depends. The majority of men, says Mr. Kuroiwa, must by means of imagination form their own conceptions of what God is. Probably no two conceptions are just alike. But men must have an object of worship that they can admire and love. An unintelligible object, a mere abstraction has no attractions for ordinary men and women. Hence religion even in its final stage will keep to its anthropomorphism. Such being Mr. Kuroiwa's conclusion, his essay will perhaps be considered disappointing. His boasted advance of religious thought proves to be no advance at all. The advance of philosophic thought, religion is bound largely to ignore, because this thought cannot be made intelligible to the masses and, what is more important, cannot be used as the basis of such a system of practical morality as every creed is bound to have and every minister to teach.

In an article on "Education and Crime" a writer in the Rikugō Zasshi comes to the conclusion that education can only be utilized as a preventive of crime when schools are conducted with a view of attaining this end; that is a special kind of teaching acts as a preventive of crime, but the effect of general education is indecisive one way or the other. General education increases intelligence and this increased intelligence may be used for good ends or bad ones according to the moral nature of each boy and girl. The moral causes of crime, the writer we are quoting takes to be four in number:—(1) Lack of sympathy with other members of the community to which the criminal belongs; (2) hazy notions on morality, on what is right and what is wrong; (3) unsound views on the moral quality of actions; and (4) weakness of will. He thinks that in Japan to-day home teaching and school teaching are both defective and that the importance of the early years of childhood are seldom realized by those who have the charge of children.

The Nichiyōsōshi (Protestant Episcopalian) has an editorial on prayers for the dead. This subject is now brought before the public by the services that are being held all over the country in memory of deceased warriors. It is often said, observes the Nichiyōshōshi, by persons who have only a slight acquaintance with Christianity that Christianity is kind to the living, but unkind to the dead. This may be true to a certain extent, but it needs qualifying. The attitude of Protestants differs considerably from that of the Roman Catholics and Greek Church Christians in reference to prayers for the dead. The teaching of Protestants generally is that such prayers cannot alter anything connected with the state of departed spirits. The Nichiyōshōshi thinks that though Protestants may not pray to the dead nor for the dead they may pray with the dead, may join them in worship just as they join absent friends who are still living. The dead are not lost or destroyed, says the Nichiyōshōshi. They have only passed into a new state of existence. Their identity is known in the other world as well as it was known here when they died (Shi wa hensen nari. Shisha nanigashi to wa sono henzwa shitaru jōtai no sekai ni arite ikuru nanigashi nari). We may still keep up our connection with them by prayer. The Nichiyōshōshi hesitates to affirm that prayers for the dead which have for their object the amelioration of their condition are entirely unefficacious. It prefers to leave this an open question (Shikaraba sunawachi shisha no tame no kōto ga shisha no tame ni ita naru onkei mata wa kōryōku wo kekewa suru ka wo towasu, kore wo kakuchi shigataki mono to shite, &c.). It goes on to say that even prayers for the dead may be justified on account of the link they constitute between people who are separated from each other. Such prayers even if they do not benefit the dead, benefit those who offer them up and are the natural outflow of the affection felt for the departed.

* There are those who think that rather than say as Pantheism does that the creative God is the world of infinite torment, and in this little world alone dies every second, and that entirely of his own will, it would be more correct to identify the world with the Devil, as the author of the Deutsche Theologie has done, who says, "Wherefore the evil spirit and nature are one, and where nature is not overcome, neither is the evil adversary overcome."—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

The Nichiyōshōshi states that there is a movement on foot for effecting a union between certain Anglican Churches and the Greek Church. It is said to have begun at Portsmouth as a result of the peaceful ending of the Conference. Preparations for this measure, it is asserted, have been in progress for over five years.

Writing in the Shinkōron, Mr. G. Sakurai affirms that Japanese capitalists are in every way inferior to Western capitalists. He says that the latter give more money to charity, and that though they have their pleasures, these pleasures are of a more refined type than those in which the majority of Japanese capitalists indulge. Mr. Sakurai asks how many universities, schools or charitable institutions have been founded by Japanese capitalists. The people who do most for charity in this country are usually men and women of small means.* It is frequently a case of the people who have the will to help the needy not possessing the money wherewith to do it (kokorozashi atte, kane naku). So our charities are comparatively ill-supported, says Mr. Sakurai.

The following extracts are taken from the Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church), which publishes an interesting summary of religious news every month under the title of Kyōkai Jiron (Current Thought in the Religious World). "What is religious sentiment and what is religious faith?" asks Mr. Motoda Sakunoshin in the Kirisutokyo Shūhō. He replies to his own question thus:—Strong feeling, pure feeling, æsthetic feeling are not necessarily religious. If we say that these are religious, then patriotism is religion, filial affection is religion, and the love of beauty in nature and art is religion. In belief it is the same. A belief in supernaturalism is not necessarily religious nor is a belief in the soul's immortality so. It is only when belief and feeling are so closely linked to each other that one cannot exist without the other that both can be called religious. To believe in God and Christ and to have the feelings deeply moved by that belief—this is religious belief and religious feeling.

* Undoubtedly the same is the case in Europe and America. One hears more about the large sums given by a few capitalists, but taking charity as a whole, it depends on a large number of small donations rather than on a few very big gifts.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

According to information received by the Fukin Dōmeikai (Evangelical Alliance) the number of Christian buildings injured during the September Tōkyō riots was large, but in most cases the results have not been very serious. In some instances insurance money has been received and been used for putting up new buildings, in others repairs have been effected without outside help. Some churches were moved to other lots when re-erected and in several cases the buildings put up have been great improvements on the former structures. The rendering of mutual help in the way proposed by the Alliance some months ago has been found to be unnecessary. The residents in the various districts have proved very sympathetic. The District officers naturally feel that their failure to protect Christian property renders it obligatory on their part to do the best they can to help the churches to repair their buildings, and so the trouble has in some ways done good to the cause of religion, and if another such disturbance should ever take place, Christian buildings would be safer than they have ever been. The Japanese Buddhists endeavoured to make use of the Peking Conference just concluded for obtaining certain privileges. They applied through the Japanese Minister in Peking to be allowed to enjoy in China the same privileges as have been granted to European and American Missionaries. Their request was not complied with for two reasons. The Chinese Government affirmed that the subject of religion could not properly be discussed at the Conference, which was called for a separate specific purpose; but if it were to be discussed, Buddhism not being a state religion in Japan, could not stand on the same footing as European State Churches.*

As a device for increasing the circulation of magazines some ingenious editors endeavour to collect material of a new type. A few months ago the Shimbukkyō obtained an augmented sale on account of the opinions on the future life that it took the trouble to collect and publish. It has now started a page of short character sketches. Men's characters are summed up in a few words as follows:—

Dr. Nanjō—a jewel of a man. Dr. Katō Hiroyuki—a ripe scholar; Mr. G. Sakurai—a man who speaks evil of nobody; Dr. J. Takakusu—a faultless man (nukeme-naki hito); Mr. S. Kanda—a delightful man; Mr. Sawayanagi Masatarō—a man whose character is easily read (hakiri shita hito); Dr. Anezaki—a Roman Catholic type of man; Dr. Inoue Enryō—a man who worships the country (country life as distinguished from town life); Mr. Y. Awoyagi—an over-serious man. But some of the descriptions do not refer to character at all. One man is described as possessing a feminine voice, another as a facile writer (nandens kakuhito), and another as a born orator. The idea seems to be to mention that which is most striking in the personality of the noted man sketched. Mr. S. Fujioka is put down as an enthusiast about Romanization (Romaji ni messhin naru hito), and so on.

Writing on "How best to make evangelistic Work a Success," the Koye (Roman Catholic) adopts the following tone:—There is no denying that in some respects the war has hindered mission work. People's feelings have been over excited, and they have not been able in many cases to approach religion in the proper spirit. But the return of peace will by no means remove all the difficulties that confront the preacher of the Gospel in this country. The war of the church militant never ceases. Not only the old enemies but new ones have to be encountered. Not a few of us sigh for the days gone by when converts were made so rapidly and apparently with so much ease, and we ask ourselves whether we shall ever see the like again. We may witness a great revival of interest in religion, but it will not be like what was seen 20 years ago when so many of us became converts to Christianity. Although there was much that is worthy of commendation in the way that converts were made in those days, yet there were drawbacks and disadvantages that must not be overlooked. It must never be forgotten that at the time when Christian converts were made most rapidly there was a strong pro-European wave of sentiment passing over the country, and not a few who entered the Church were borne along on the crest of this wave to her very portals; that is to say, they accepted Christianity partly on account of its being the religion of those nations whose civilisation their fellow-countrymen were adopting en masse. This we deem to have been a distinct disadvantage. Christianity must stand on its own merits and must not in our eyes gain prestige from the fact that it has been accepted by Western nations. The terms "foreign religion," "the foreigner's creed," and the like, are all objectionable as tending to obscure that universality, that supra-nationalistic character which Christianity bears. The association of Christianity with Western civilisation in men's minds did the religion much harm in this country. For when the reaction against the excessive Europeanization of the nation advocated by some had set in and what was known as the Kokuseiron (Nationalism) had taken hold of the public mind, Christianity no longer found so much favour in the country. Men began to say, why not keep to our national religion in a patriotic way, instead of running madly after a foreign creed? To accept Christianity was then represented in many quarters as denationalization; for to be occidentalized so thoroughly as to accept the creed of Europeans could mean, said the nationalists, nothing else. It comes to this then that if Christianity is to succeed in this country, it must be received on its own merits and it must cease to be thought of as a European religion. We must assimilate Christianity as we have assimilated a hundred and one other things that have come from the West. It must form part of our very nationality. This is the sentiment that is being expressed throughout the country by various sects and parties to-day. The Christian Church is suffering from the results of the defective methods of evangelization adopted years ago. . . . But there is no cause for despair. This misunderstanding will not trouble us much longer.

It seems to us, continues the Koye, that the times demand more aggression on our part. We must not wait for people to come to us; we must go to them. And in order to reach a large number of people, we must have a larger body of workers than we now possess. The present staff of missionaries and evangelists is inadequate and our preaching places are too few.

The Dec. 10th number of the Koye publishes a notice to its readers announcing its enlargement from next month and a slight rise in the price. According to the new scale of prices it will cost one yen a year including postage, a marvel of cheapness, since it appears twice every month. Hitherto some 800 copies only have been struck off. Considering that there are 60,000 Roman Catholic converts, this seems a very small number. The magazine has hitherto been sold at 3 sen a copy. The cost of producing each number is stated to be 30 yen for printing expenses and another 40 or 50 yen for salaries and other expenses. To make the magazine pay, it should be sold at 9 or 10 sen a copy. But the price has been fixed at 5 sen. It is needless to say that hitherto it has been dependent on subscriptions from the foreign Missionaries, who have been helping it to the extent of about one hundred yen a month. Few such magazines can be made to pay. The financial history of magazines in Japan would, we believe, be one long tale of woe. Even the Taiyō a few years ago was not paying; though we believe it pays now.

It will be remembered by our readers that among the comments of the Japanese press on Archbishop O'Connell's visit to Japan and reception by the Emperor those of the Nippon Shimbun were somewhat severe. A short epitome of the Nippon's article appeared in the Japan Weekly Mail of Nov. 18th. The Koye (No. 348) takes up the various charges brought by the Nippon against the Roman Catholic faith and the methods of Roman Catholic missionaries and replies to them seriatim. To the accusation that the missionaries judge of Japanese civilisation by the clothes worn by the general public or by the houses in which Japanese live, and that they then proceed to make use of ridiculous arguments for proving the existence of God: such as the argument showing design based on the structure of a watch, taking advantage of the ignorance of the lower classes, the Koye replies that evidently the writer of the Nippon's article has never listened to the preaching of Roman Catholic missionaries. It then proceeds to defend the use of simple, commonplace illustrations in preaching on the ground that they convey deep truths. The meaning derived from illustrations made use of by a preacher depends largely on the minds of the hearers, says the Koye. The figure of the watch might mean little to a poorly educated man, but to a man like Fenelon, for instance, who himself used it, it had deep philosophic significance. Illustrations and figures of speech which satisfied a Descartes, a Newton, and a Pascal evidently do not satisfy the Nippon's leader writer. Modesty and humility are characteristics of great minds. It is not by intellect alone that great spiritual truths are to be learned.

In reference to the charge that Roman Catholicism is superstitious, the Koye asks the writer of the article to specify in what respect this is the case. The accusation is too vague to call for a reply. "Does the writer think that our religion consists chiefly of those incantations known as Kaji-ki? He evidently knows little of our creed and hence is not qualified to figure as a critic."

"The sympathies of the Japanese are with Anglo-Saxon Protestantism rather than with Roman Catholicism," says the Nippon. That the education received by Japanese in this country inclines them to Anglo-Saxondom is an unquestionable fact, observes the Koye, but the notion that Protestantism is the creed of Anglo-Saxons is antiquated and no longer held by people who know the real facts of the case. In the United States to-day there are over 10 million Roman Catholics. Archbishop O'Connell is an American. In England Roman Catholicism is growing more and more prosperous and a certain section of the English Church is drawing nearer and nearer to Rome. The Nippon's seems to be quite ignorant of these facts.

The Nippon persistently speaks of our creed as the Kyūkyō, old religion. The title by which we are known to the world and which we observe is now used by a good many Japanese writers, is "Catholics." The use of the title Kyūkyō by the Nippon was no doubt designed to imply that our religion is out of date and fusty. But in reality we take it as no offence to be known as the representatives of old Christianity, for the old Christianity is the only real Christianity. That which is new is false. To call Protestantism Shinkyō is to condemn it; for did not Christ and his apostles live and teach nearly 1900 years ago? Truth never changes. True Christianity is the same everywhere and at all times.

There are two characteristics of the Catholic religion and its converts which the Nippon has held up to admiration. It refers to the fact that for over 300 years the light of Christianity has guided the steps of a number of Christian converts near Nagasaki. Though confronted with enormous difficulties, several centuries ago, these converts overcame them all and remained constant to the end and thus showed how great is the power of our religion. Another thing that struck the writer in the Nippon is the fact that we manage an extensive empire without the aid of physical force. We use no soldiers, and yet our Papal authority is upheld everywhere. We keep aloof from the world's politics and hence there is no fear of our religion's being used as an instrument of aggression as is done with other denominations. The Nippon says, "Though the Roman Catholics are said to have more converts in Japan than any other Christian sect, what they are all doing nobody knows. It is surprising that we should be so ignorant of the places at which their missionaries preach, &c." To this the reply of the Koye is beautifully significant. We work without noise. We blow no trumpets and beat no drums when moving from place to place. Of certain Protestant ostentatious, worldly methods we disapprove. (Aru ha no gotoku, aru mono no gotoku, itaru tokoro ni rappa wo fuki, taiko wo utaku wo konomazaru ga yuyē ni yo ni shiraruru koto sukunaki wa nijitsu nari.) So our not being known to the world is to a certain extent natural enough. Yet it would seem that not even our most public work is known to many. To quote a case in point. On Nov. 9th the Mainichi Shimbun published a paragraph entitled Kokka no dai ichi mondai, in which the writer undertook to enumerate the Leper Hospitals existing in Japan. He first named Miss Riddle's Kumamoto Kwaishun-in, then Miss Youngman's Gotemba Raibyō-in, and the branch Tōkyō institution situated at Meguro called Ihai-in. These all being Protestant institutions, the writer was aware of their existence. But he did not seem to know that no less than 18 years ago the Roman Catholics founded Japan's first Leper Hospital near Gotemba. It bears the name Kōyama Fūkusei Byōin. Then we also have a hospital near Kumamoto at a place called Biwazaki, named Tairō-in. Though these two institutions are not only older than any of the Protestant hospitals but treat more patients and are conducted in a very much superior manner, their very existence was evidently not known to a writer who undertook to enlighten the public on leper hospitals in Japan. There is, then, evidently much truth in what the Nippon said about the ignorance that exists among the general public of what we are doing in Japan, and it is a question worthy of our consideration whether we should not take measures for making our work better known. Of course we shall not descend to hiromeya (廣目屋) drum and trumpet methods. But by convening large public meetings such as that held by the young men attached to our mission a short time ago, by the use of our pens and by exemplary conduct before men, we can do much to make our existence known to the world. There may be a certain amount of hiding the light under a bushel among us which to a limited extent justified some of the remarks of the Nippon Shimbun.

The Dōshisha has recently celebrated the 30th anniversary of its establishment with considerable acclat. The steps which have been taken to set the institution on a permanent satisfactory footing are deemed adequate by those who are in a position to know. Hence congratulations have been pouring in from all quarters. The Kirisutokyō Sekai publishes a report of the proceedings at the various meetings which have been held in connection with the newly organized institution, but as a full notice of these meetings has already appeared in these columns we do not propose to translate that report. The Kirisutokyō Sekai has issued a special Christmas number of the paper, with extra reading matter of various sorts.

"A Weak Point in Christianity" is the title of a very discerning article which appears in a recent number of the Gokyō. A very young and inexperienced missionary, we are told, some little time ago in an address to a mixed audience tried to commend Christianity to the attention of his hearers by praising Christian countries and European and American Christians. This, says the Gokyō, was a very dangerous line of argument to take, as was shown some years ago when Dr. Imbrie spoke in the same manner. Thinking to favourably impress a number of high class gentlemen assembled by invitation at the Imperial Hotel as to the great superiority of Christianity, Dr. Imbrie observed that the destinies of countries were decided by their attitude to Christianity (Kokka no Kōbō (興亡) wa Kirisutokyō wo ukuru to ina to ni yotte sadamaru) countries that reject Christianity go to ruin (Kirisutokyō wo ukazaru hōkoku wa horobubeshi). Whereupon Mr. Miyake Yujirō sprang to his feet and exclaimed:—If what Dr. Imbrie says is true, why did Poland and Finland lose their independence, and why was Christian Hawaii annexed by the United States? By this remark the pleasure of the evening was spoiled for the Christians who had got up the affair (ichiza tame ni shirake-watatte, &c.). The ground which they thought to occupy had been occupied by Mr. Miyake. To try to prove the superiority of Christianity by reference to Christian countries is bound to end in failure. There is no greater source of weakness to Christianity than the States which profess that religion. They are a millstone hanging about its neck and dragging it to the bottom of the ocean. If instead of preaching Christ men begin to preach Christians, crushing retorts such as that of Mr. Miyake are bound to be forthcoming. It is not only a case of Russian morality and intelligence being far below that of non-Christian Japan. For when we examine the state of America, England, Germany and France, we find that the general standard of morals there is no higher than that maintained here. With all their professions of goodness, immorality and crime of all sorts flourish in Christian lands. And when we come to consider the diplomacy of Christian Governments, it consists of a species of trickery, of plausible speeches that aim at covering up sinister designs. It is not only the people who never attend church or chapel that disgrace the religion they profess, but Christians like the German Emperor, who make loud, open professions of Christianity and then when the occasion serves make speeches that might have proceeded from the mouth of Satan himself.* It is quite plain that neither Christian countries nor the mass of professing Christians which they contain are capable of being cited as a proof of the superiority of Christianity to other creeds, and preachers of all others should be the first to recognize this.

FUNERAL OF MR. JAMES PEACE.

The mortal remains of the late Mr. James Peace were laid away to rest in a quiet, sunny corner of Yokohama cemetery on Tuesday morning. The last sad rites of the Church of England were read in Christ Church and at the graveside by the Incumbent, the Rev. W. P. G. Field, M.A., the coffin being followed by the widow, Mrs. Peace, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Grimble, Miss Peace and Mr. Geo. H. Whymark, as mourners; Dr. Bomford-Emerson, Mr. M. Russell, the Rev. W. T. and Mrs. Austen, representatives of various Masopie bodies, of which deceased had been a member, and several old Kobe friends; while the pall-bearers were Mr. J. T. Griffin, Mr. S. E. Unite, Mr. C. Thwaites, Mr. E. J. Cowan, Mr. George W. Brockhurst and Mr. A. Bellamy Brown. A profusion of crosses and wreaths of flowers were sent as expressions of sympathy by sorrowing friends.

FIRES.

On the evening of Jan. 13th, fire broke out in the Gifu Prefectural Hospital destroying, the building. All the patients were saved.

Sparks from the locomotive of a train on the Dzusō Railway, while running through the village of Nirayama, in Idzu province, at 2.25 p.m., on Jan. 11th, caused a fire by which twenty-five houses, two godowns and seventeen sheds were destroyed. About the same time, another outbreak occurred at a place near-by, with the result that four houses were burned down.

Early on the morning of Jan. 15th three fires occurred in Tokyo. One broke out at Kawase-kokuchō, destroying three houses. The cause is put down to incendiaryism. Another fire occurred in the Ichimura theatre, Shitaya, destroying the rear part of the building. The last outbreak took place at Imado-machi, Asakusa, burning ten buildings.

*The reference is to the speech made to the troops sent to suppress the Boxer insurrection. Here are Dr. Takagi's words:—Waga hai wa kore wo Kirisuto Shinto no kuchi yori idetari to katei suru yori mo, mushiro okuma no kuchi yori idetari to katei suru wo motte harukani yōi nari to shinjazaru wo yezu.

RELIEVING THE FAMINE-STRICKEN.

The first subscriptions to the Famine Relief Fund were made in Sendai. Although none of the Sendai foreigners have large incomes, when the paper was passed around early in December more than seven hundred yen was subscribed and as additions are constantly being made to this it is likely that before the work of the committee is finished approximately a thousand yen will have been contributed by the Sendai foreigners alone.

Many people living in different parts of Japan have sent their gifts directly to members of the Committee and already much more than a thousand yen has been received in this way. Newspapers and individuals kindly opened subscription lists and contributions amounting to more than five thousand yen have been made.

A beginning has been made, and with some seven or eight thousand yen in sight the Committee resolved to get this as quickly as possible into the hands and mouths of the most needy. As some private funds were available and as an additional sum had been sent "for immediate distribution" the work of relief was really begun, although on a small scale, at the end of December. A partial report of this was made two weeks ago.

We are now in consultation with the officials of Miyagi Province as to the best method of relief, and to-day L'Abbe C. Jacquet of Sendai and Rev. William Axling of Morioka are conferring with the Iwate Province officials. As Fukushima Province has the largest population and the official reports state that nearly half a million people are in need of help, Mr. Davison, the Secretary and Treasurer of our Committee, and I went to Fukushima a few days ago and made arrangements there for the distribution of part of the money already received by the Committee.

We met the Governor, Vice-Governor, Counsellor, and President of the Provincial Assembly. These gentlemen, whom we had met on previous occasion and from whom we had gotten information as to the condition of the Province, received us most cordially and spoke in terms of high appreciation of what foreigners are doing to show sympathy with their suffering people. These busy officials altogether gave us more than three hours of their valuable time, and to tell the truth we were almost ashamed to mention our few thousands when they are straining every nerve to raise millions to feed those who are in need.

A few thousand yen means nothing when divided among some hundreds of thousands of famine-stricken people. Few, if any, foreigners wish what they give to be used in the special public works which the authorities have undertaken as measures of relief, but all desire to aid those in deepest distress by giving them food and clothing. Of course these officials know this and as far as possible are quite willing to put us into touch with those in greatest need.

Fukushima Province has one city and seventeen counties but of these only ten of the counties were selected, these being the ones most in need of help. Even among these there are some in greater straits than others and after consultation together the officials agreed upon the following proportion for these ten countries:—Hinobe 110, Date 160, Adachi 120, Asaka 90, Iwase 50, Nishi Shirakawa, 120, Ishikawa 50, Mamura 130, Soha 60, Soma 120. This is on the basis of one thousand yen. If two thousand is distributed these amounts are doubled; if ten thousand, they are multiplied by ten. Our Committee has met and after deliberation resolved to immediately use yen 2500 in Fukushima Province.

Although we are personally acquainted with some of them, official letters of introduction have been given us to the heads of these ten counties, and four members of the Committee, each responsible for two of three counties, will immediately start out with these letters and the proper proportion of this twenty-five hundred yen.

WILLIAM E. LAMPE,

Chairman of the Foreign Committee of Relief.

GOVERNMENT FAMINE-RELIEF.

What are the provincial authorities doing for the relief of the impoverished people? It is a great and comparatively new problem, to which they are giving serious thought and which they hope to solve not only for the present but largely for the future. Scientific plans cannot be formulated and put into practice in a day. The Indian Government method is doubtless the best, to open such public works for the able bodied as shall tend to fend off a repetition of the calamity; to give seed and manure for the next crops; to distribute free food only in extreme cases and for the shortest possible period.

Besides these methods, the people are encouraged to push for themselves, and aid is granted in selling the products of their labour. This is especially seen in the vast quantities of wood and charcoal that flow towards the railroad where half rates to any place on the line are granted. Cheap food is provided at cost or even under cost, so that villages may buy in bulk and dispose of it among themselves. Taxes are postponed, and in some cases are remitted.

The Government has especially to do with two things, one of which is taxation. It is no simple affair. First comes the large national tax on land alone which for these three provinces is 3,200,472 yen. Of this amount 1,800,000 yen has been postponed, to be gradually paid up in ten years. There is a movement on foot to have this tax wholly remitted, but it will take the passage of a new law by the Diet, the present law of remittance being limited to earthquakes and storm calamities.

Then comes the provincial tax on the same land, this for the three provinces is 214,593 yen. Of this amount 126,750 yen is wholly remitted.

Last of all come the city, county, town, and village taxes which total 1,213,000 yen, nearly half of which goes for education. It is a grave question how to keep the schools open when many children have no lunch and teachers are unable to collect back pay. Probably the Minister of Education will help to solve this grave difficulty.

The next thing the prefectural offices have to do is to open public works. Here I give only the plans for Miyagi-ken, which involve nearly a million of yen:

Engineering Works (Bridges, River banks, &c.)	Yen. 608,911
New mulberry fields	120,000
Making over old rice fields	60,000
Employment of skilled labour	50,000
Total	838,911

Besides these, the city, and seventeen counties have similar works of their own for which loans have already been provided:

Making over old rice fields	Yen. 780,000
Fertilizers for the next crop	400,000
New mulberry fields	419,600
River banks, roads and bridges	150,000
Total	1,749,600

Perhaps the largest single piece of work is the draining of Shinai Lagoon, that extensive marsh seen from the railroad north of Matsushima station, which will make about 5,000 acres of paddy fields. This will take three years and will cost 500,000 yen.

This does not exhaust the list of measures taken. In all the provinces there was, owing to official foresight, an emergency fund, which in Miyagi Ken amounted to over a half a million yen. From this, seed rice for the coming season (226,000 yen) was bought and is now stored in various godowns, to be given without price to the impoverished farmers. Seed potatoes and early wheat (3,736 yen) were bought, and the wheat is now sprouting in the fields: 2,446,300 lbs. of army hard tack was yesterday going into the government godowns; 337,000 lbs. of dried sweet potatoes and 32,000 bushels of rice are already in hand, these three foods costing 151,944 yen. They are for the famine towns and villages, to be paid for at cost where possible, to be given without cost to such as are unable to work, especially to school children.

Thus in this one province, the methods adopted to relieve the present distress and to lessen the probability of future similar famines, involve the expenditure of 3,470,891 yen. The authorities of this province have to meet the loss of 14,000,000 yen with one quarter of that sum, have to guard against starvation among children and the aged, and have so to use this money as to prevent such a heavy loss in the years to come.

"Then why do they not publicly appeal for aid?" He who knows the soul of the Japanese does not have to go far for a reply. Bushi wa kurawando takai yoji. Even when the samurai has no food he keeps a toothpick in plain sight. The whole nation is pervaded with this spirit. To ask for aid is a very different thing from receiving aid proffered by sympathetic friends. It was solely in this spirit that foreigners ventured, with hesitation, to place an appeal before the foreign communities. It is our privilege to help soften the sorrows of a few thousand homes, and if done as friends, the act will win the gratitude of all classes.

L'ALLIANCE FRANCAISE.

At the regular meeting of L'Alliance Francaise on Tuesday afternoon in Van Schaick Hall, a paper was read by Mr. J. de Cuers de Cogolin on "A. de Lamartine: Méditations Poétiques," and a musical programme which caused the audience much enjoyment was presented. Mr. de Cuers de Cogolin was in the chair and there was a large attendance.

Mr. de Cuers de Cogolin said at the outset that his first intention was to give a sketch of the whole of the works of Lamartine, prose as well as poetry, but on consideration he found that the most interesting part was the "Méditations" inasmuch as they more specially showed the characteristic genius of the poet. Lamartine, he went on to say, was not a self-made poet, he was a born singer. His poems resembled more than anything else the outpourings of the nightingale which sang to celebrate the dawn, the scented breeze, the silver moon, the joys and happiness of the loves born on the sprays and their sorrows when they withered away. To study Lamartine in the "Méditations" it was not necessary to go through the whole book; one might open it at hazard and on any page discern what passion had inspired his verses for they were the children of the moment. In one instance the poet and two friends took a fisherman's boat on Lac de Bourget and after a severe storm were driven on the rocks of a small island on the other side of the lake. An old gentleman who lived in an ancient castle on the island gave them shelter and when their boat being repaired, they departed after a few days Lamartine sent by a fisherman to his host a poem—Le Lac. Another "Méditation" that seemed to have gone out with tears from the heart of the man, and not from the imagination of the artist, was that evoked by the death of Julie. His friend M. de V., who was present at the death bed of Julie, brought to the poet a crucifix which had lain on the lips of the dying one in her last agony. Lamartine, after a year of silence, sorrow and mourning wrote Le Crucifix. It was said that the poet would never read the verses again; it was enough to have written them. On the hills and the forests of high Burgundy Lamartine met an abbé before the Revolution, who at the Revolution became a plain civilian. He had a large estate and when the poet was out of pocket or wished to have rest from his sorrow after the death of Julie he was wont to turn his steps thither. There he wrote Le Soir. After reading the verses A une Fleur, and A une Enfant, Mr. de Cuers proceeded to recall how, as told by Lamartine, the poet and his sisters used as children to play what they called the music of the angels. They bent an osier in the form of a bow or semi-circle and, having fastened the ends together, Lamartine took hairs from his sisters' long tresses and stringing these upon the osier hung the harp so fashioned in the summer breeze which as it slept or waked, was soft or strong, made music in the strings—drawing out chords soft and sweet like the sounds of the wind in the branches of the pines. Listening to these the children used to say that it was as if the angels sang. For this harp they used the fresh, young silky hair from the tresses of a little girl. But one day they wondered whether the same melody would be played by the angels on hair from another head. An old aunt, watching their occupation, consented to apply the scissors to her own hair, and so another osier bow was strung, this time with long white strands; another harp was fashioned and both were hung out together in the breeze. Whether one harp was strung more tightly than the other or the wind blew more softly in one than in the other did not appear, but the children found that the spirits of the air sang more sadly and plaintively in the white strings than in the blonde hairs of the child. They were equally melodious but the spirit of their music was as different as the ages of those from whose heads their strings were taken. There was an exact representation of the two poesies appropriated to the expression of the two ages of man—dreams and joy in youth, gloom and sadness in the closing years—a salutation and a farewell to life, but an adieu which was also a salutation solemn and sacred to that vision whose rays are most visible on the horizon in the evening of human life.

At the annual general meeting of the Alliance the President hinted that the musical portion of the Society's programmes would be developed under the capable direction of Mr. Rudolph Schmid who had consented to shoulder the onerous task, and if the sample presented the other day can be taken as a criterion of what Mr. Schmid's labours can produce then music-lovers will look forward to these meetings with ever increasing interest. To those who hitherto have only heard M. Saenger as an accompanist either to the violin, cello, or for a vocalist, his playing of Dvorak's Slav Dances, in conjunction with Madame Saenger, came as a great surprise; and in the second one especially he carried his audience off their feet. To a masterly technique he brings the breadth of a deep, passionate insight into the soul of the composer whom he is interpreting, and the result falls little short of a revelation. In the concluding trio, in which he had the assistance of Messrs. Poole and Schmid, he was again heard to advantage and the applause that greeted the performers at the close has seldom been equalled in Yokohama. We hope that M. Saenger and his talented wife will figure on many programmes in Yokohama before the cold weather season draws to an end.

Others who contributed materially to the success of the meeting were Mrs. E. C. Irwine, who sang two songs in her own charming manner; Mr. H. A. Poole, who played a clever violin solo; Mr. Ruinat, who sang "Le Lac" and "Le Soir"; and Mr. Jamin who recited "le Crucifix," in illustration of the President's address.

These are the days of the young men, and in selecting a successor to the late Mr. Copeland as Astronomer Royal for Scotland, choice has fallen on Mr. F. W. Dyson, who is still well on the right side of forty. Mr. Dyson, who is the son of a Baptist minister, has been Chief Assistant at the Greenwich Observatory for the past 11 years, and his work there has been such as to ensure for him higher position. He is a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and was second wrangler and Smith's prizeman in 1889, and also Isaac Newton scholar. His new appointment carries with it the Professorship of Practical Astronomy in Edinburgh University.

THE LAW COURTS.

RAZA V. CHARTERED BANK.

The case instituted by Mr. M. A. Raza against the Chartered Bank claiming delivery of forty bales of sheep skins, came up again on Jan. 12th, in the Yokohama District Court. The Court delivered judgment dismissing the plaintiff's claim and ordering him to bear the costs.

M.P. PROSECUTED.

It is alleged by Tokyo papers that Mr. J. Ishida (Progressist) a representative for Tochigi Prefecture, has been prosecuted in the Utsunomiya District Court. The allegation is that he forged a private letter bearing the name of K. Akiyama, a member of the Tochigi Prefectural Assembly.

CLAIM ON SHORT DELIVERY OF CARGO.

The case in which Messrs Mendelson Bros, claim twelve thousand yen from the Ocean Steamship Co., and the China Mutual Steam Navigation Co., for whom Messrs Butterfield and Swire are the Yokohama agents, came up again on Jan. 18th in the Yokohama District Court.

At the outset of the hearing, the defendants' Counsel produced the power-of-attorney from his clients which had been delayed.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that the defendants insisted that Messrs. Mendelson Bros. refused to take delivery of the tin plates when the shipping agents asked them to do so. This request, however, was regarded as unreasonable. The tin plates of 21" by 28" were brought by the Kaisow, which fact was explicitly shown by the invoice and by the statement given by K. Yamaguchi at the previous hearing. Goods of the foregoing size are not frequently imported into Japan so that these were easily distinguished. Plates of 21" by 28" were not found among the lots which the defendants requested plaintiffs to take delivery of. As to the difference in size, the plaintiffs' Counsel gave a lengthy explanation, after which he referred to the British Shipping laws. He said that the bill of lading notifies "tin plates" simply but does not give any specification as to size. The invoice gave details. Therefore the defendants should be liable for delivery of the goods nominated by the shipping documents. Plaintiffs' Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine an expert as to British shipping laws and also for an examination by the Court of the tin plates left in the bonded warehouse at the Customs.

Defendants' Counsel held that a clause in the bill-of-lading specifies quantity, value, contents, etc., as unknown. In fact, the shipping companies are ignorant of the nature of the material packed in cases. Defendants were merely responsible for the delivery of "tin-plates." This would be regarded as "correct delivery." Consequently there was no necessity to examine the goods left loose in the warehouse at the Customs or to summon experts as to the British shipping laws.

After a consultation, the Court decided to examine the material on February 2nd in the bonded warehouse of the Customs in company with Yamaguchi and Oshima who were examined as witnesses at the previous hearing, they having personally attended to the landing of the goods in dispute.

The Court then rose.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Judge M. Naito, of the Yokohama District Court, has been removed to the Matsuyama District Court.

A shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama at 7.54 a.m. on Monday, Jan. 15th, the duration being fifty-four seconds.

Rear-Admiral Nakao, Commander of the Second Squadron, has removed his flag from the Okinoshima to the Izumi.

The Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society send out a neat wall calendar bearing as usual a fine view of Norwich Cathedral. The local agents are Messrs. Bavier and Co.

The North-China Daily News in its new and handy shape should please all its old constituents and win many new ones.

Lieut.-General Iida, Commander of the First Division, will leave Tiehling on Jan. 18th for Dairen on his way home.

General Kawamura, Commander of the Yalu Army, arrived at Shimonoseki on Jan. 15th by the Tamba Maru from Dairen.

Baron Komura left Tokyo on Jan. 17th for Hayama in company with his family. They will stay there during the cold season.

The steamer Beckenham left Yokohama on Sunday for Yokkaichi, whence she will carry Russian prisoners to Vladivostok.

Mr. M. Inagaki, Minister to Bangkok, arrived in Yokohama on Jan. 17th by the German Mail steamer Roon. He left at once for Tokyo.

Vice-Admiral Sir A. W. Moore, the new British Commander-in-Chief on this station, is coming out in the cruiser King Alfred, 14,100 tons.

The destroyer Satsuki arrived at Yokosuka on Jan. 17th. She was formerly the Biedov, on which Admiral Rojestvensky took refuge after the battle of the Japan Sea.

Some Tokyo papers say that the Okura-gumi, Tokyo, has been authorized by the Commercial Union Fire Insurance Association of England to act as its sole agents in Japan.

Since Jan. 9th, ice-floes have been observed on the horizon off Ohashiri, Hokkaido. There is no hindrance to shipping service. This report is eight days earlier than in ordinary years.

The Tokyo Stock Exchange intends to add yen 1,250,000 to the present capital making a total of yen 2,500,000. The directors propose to hold a general meeting in the near future to submit the plan.

Early on the morning of Jan. 16th, three men armed with swords broke into the residence of a merchant in the village of Asahi, Kanagawa. The intruders stole yen 90 and several articles. They were dressed like coolies.

Major-General Hatano on Jan. 15th was promoted to the rank of Lieut.-General. At the same time, he was removed to the retired-list. Captains Takikawa and Yatushiro of the Navy have been appointed attachés to the embassy in Berlin.

It is reported by some vernacular papers that Japan will dispatch a squadron to Great Britain in April or May to return thanks for the visit of Prince Arthur of Connaught. There is no definite information as to the organization of the squadron.

General Terauchi, Minister for War, will give a dinner at noon on Jan. 28th in the Koraku-in, Koishikawa, Tokyo, to the commanders of the various armies and their staff officers, the Ministers of various Departments and several hundred other notables.

The Jiji says that Mr. Yoshiwara, Director of the Bureau of Provincial Affairs, will be promoted Vice-Minister for Home Affairs. Mr. Koba, Vice-Minister for Education, has tendered his resignation. He will probably be appointed a member of the Upper House.

With regard to a recent London telegram to the effect that the Toyo Kisen Kaisha proposed purchasing four steamers from the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., the Jiji says that when Mr. Harriman was visiting Japan the Japanese shipping firm asked him to sell the Siberia, Korea, Mongolia and Manchuria, and at the same time to transfer to them the service on the Pacific line. However, there are not yet any definite negotiations set on foot between the parties. Mr. Shiraishi, Manager of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, now in London, is trying to raise a loan there for a certain enterprise.

Lieut.-General Tsuchiya, formerly commander of the Eleventh Division, was released from service on Jan. 12th. This officer sustained wounds at the second general assault upon Port Arthur. Since then he has been treated at Hiroshima and his post has been filled by Lieut.-General Samejima.

We acknowledge receipt of the usual quarterly returns of trade (July—September) issued by the Imperial Chinese Maritime Customs; and also from the same source a catalogue (consisting of over 300 pages) of the collection of Chinese exhibits at the Liege Universal and International Exhibition of 1905.

The Russian transport Tamboff arrived on Jan. 15th at Nagasaki from Vladivostok on her way to Yokkaichi to take delivery of prisoners. Fifteen officers and 609 men from Fukuoka, two officers and three men from Kumamoto, and eight hundred men from Kokura have embarked on the Voronej at Nagasaki for Vladivostok.

The following Russians will arrive in Yokohama from Narashino:—

Jan. 18th .....	534
" 19th .....	1,068
" 20th .....	1,068

They will leave for Vladivostok by a transport which will arrive here about Jan. 18th.

K. Arai, an employee of the Yokohama Tobacco Monopoly Office, attempted to commit suicide on the morning of January 15th by drinking a quantity of morphine in one of the upstairs rooms of the Yamaguchi-ro, Yeirakuchō, Yokohama. He was at once removed to the office of Dr. Y. Nakamura, Ashibikicho. He is in a serious condition.

A Nagasaki telegram says that six sailors of a British steamer while under the influence of liquor on the evening of Jan. 14th made trouble with the proprietor (American) of a grog-shop. The American discharged a revolver and inflicted severe injury in the throat of one of the sailors. The culprit was at once removed to the Nagasaki District.

About thirty representatives of the leading match manufacturers in Japan held a meeting on Jan. 16th in the Atago Hall, Tokyo. They decided to amalgamate and to establish a large factory to promote the industry and to encourage the export of their product. Some officials of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce were present to offer advice.

Following is the result of the drawing for the subscription China Ponies, which arrived by the Japan and were drawn for at Messrs. Durand & Co.'s stables on Saturday afternoon:—

A representative gathering of the foreign community attended a farewell dinner given at the Oriental Hotel, Kobe, on Jan. 12th to Mr. Sakurai Tetsutaro, Superintendent of the Kobe Customs, who is leaving for Tokyo to take up the important position of Director of the Taxation Bureau of the Financial Department. The toast of Mr. Sakurai's health was proposed by Mr. A. Woolley and fittingly responded to by the guest of the evening, who also proposed the prosperity of Kobe.

A semi official telegram from London says that the prospectus of the loan, a million sterling, for the Hokkaido Colliery and Railway Co. which has been accepted by a British firm of Yokohama, at a price of £92.15.0 was issued on Jan. 9th in London. On the following day, the subscription price proposed to the tenderers was £98.10.0. The floatation of the loan was welcomed by the public. On the day of issue the subscription reached double the needed amount.

It is reported by a Hiroshima telegram that on the morning of Jan. 14th, a police officer was murdered and another injured by a highwayman in the enclosure of the Shinto temple, Hakujin-sha. It appears that Constable K. Tachikawa, having suspicions as to a strange man, approached him to make investigations, on which he was shot through the heart with a revolver by the stranger. Death was immediate. Another officer, who was drawn to the scene by the sound of fire-arms, was also shot in the breast by the man who then took to his heels. He was arrested, however, at noon the same day.

On the morning of Jan. 13th, an iron safe of the Fortifications Department, Fujimi-cho, Tokyo, was found broken and twenty-eight hundred yen contained in it were missing. At 1 p.m. the same day, seventeen hundred yen, which is supposed to be a portion of the missing money, was found in the compound of the Meiji-Gijiku Academy adjoining the Department. It was removed to the Kojimachi Police Office. It is said by Tokyo papers that the previous night, four soldiers from the Takebashi regiment of the Imperial Body Guards were watching the Department and that there is no trace of any intruder from the outside. Consequently, these soldiers were examined at the police station as direct witnesses.

A telegram received on Jan. 17th at the Foreign Office from Mr. Uchida, Consul-General in New York says that there was no remarkable change in raw silk business. There is a tendency towards future activity, however. During the week ending Jan. 16th, the cotton planters of New Orleans held a meeting when they decided not to sell their product until the price reaches fifteen cents and to advise small planters to make a reduction in the area planted, this year 26 per cent. below that of two years ago. Consequently the price temporarily advanced, though later it returned to the original point. The closing quotation on Jan. 16th was:—cents 11.77 for March delivery; and cents 11.86 for May delivery. The stock of cotton throughout the country was 162,000 bales.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

"There are 14,000 deserted wives in Chicago, and the American husband is the chief deserter," declared Mr. W. Leater Bodine, superintendent of compulsory education, on Dec. 7. He says his figures are not exaggerated, but can be substantiated in every detail. "Wife desertion exists not only in Chicago, but in other cities," he said. "I believe the estimate of 14,000 deserted women in Chicago is conservative. It is based on the opinions of persons in sociological fields, such as truant officers, probation officers and charity workers. I have been particularly impressed with the fact in the investigation of the causes of children's non-attendance at school."

A bronze tablet was unveiled on the sub treasury building in New York City, November 29, commemorating the passage of the Northwest Ordinance of 1787. The inscription on the tablet contains a prodigious amount of history in a small space. It reads: "On this site the United States in Congress assembled, on the 13th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1787 and their sovereignty and independence the twelfth, enacted an ordinance for the Government of the Territory North-west of the River Ohio, by which it was dedicated forever to Freedom. Under another ordinance, passed here by the same body on the 27th day of the same month, Manasseh Cutler, acting for 'The Ohio Company of Associates,' an organization of soldiers of the Revolutionary Army, purchased a portion of the waste and vacant lands of the Territory. On April 7th, 1788, Rufus Putnam, heading a party of forty-eight, began the first settlement at Marietta, and on July 15th, Arthur St. Clair as first Governor established civil government in the Territory.

From these beginnings sprang the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin." A second tablet will be unveiled at Marietta, the first settlement, next April.

The Chicago Tribune on Nov. 26 sent the following message to President Roosevelt:—

"The 1905 football season practically closed to-day with two dead on the field of battle. To-day's fatalities bring the total of slain to nineteen and the injured (record only being made of accidents out of the ordinary) to 137. This year's record of deaths is more than double that of the yearly average for the last five years, the total for that period being forty-five. A significant fact is that teams playing an open game have escaped with less than their usual quota of accidents." The Tribune, commenting on the subject, says:—Of those slaughtered eleven were high school players and ten of the killed were immature boys of 17 and under. Three hardened, seasoned and presumably physically fit college men were slain. The others were amateurs. Body blows, producing internal injuries, were responsible for four deaths, concussion of the brain claimed six victims, injuries to the spine resulted fatally in three cases, blood poisoning carried off two gridiron warriors, and other injuries caused four deaths. Among the injuries that have not resulted fatally are: Broken collar bones and shoulders, nineteen; broken legs, thirty-one; broken arms, nine; fractures to some portion of the head, nineteen; broken ribs, three; spinal injuries, three; concussion of the brain, three.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

MONSIEUR F. N.—Au regard de votre lettre, à l'éditeur du journal j'ai l'honneur de vous répondre que ce qu'a voulu prouver M. le Baron Suyematsu dans les colonnes du Times n'est pas un peu; mais suffisant. Si vous êtes un chrétien vous n'avez pas un droit de lui contredire au sujet.

Vous savez; nous n'avons rien de votre religion; savez vous comment les missionnaires en Japon ont propagé le religion de Jests Christ?

Comme je suis un chrétien, je sais bien, que les missionnaires dans Japon sont tres mauvais.

En attendant votre réponse.

Y. OYAMA.

(We publish this letter for obvious reasons, but we need scarcely repeat the well understood formula that publication does not in any sense mean endorsement.—ED. J.M.)

HEATHEN FOREIGNERS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Among your church notices I find the spiritual wants of our Japanese and Chinese friends are provided for by afternoon services. What, then, is meant by "7.30 p.m. Preaching to the Heathen?" It will be admitted that in popular usage the word has always a touch of pitying contempt about it, and it is gratifying to note that the writer of the notice is not guilty of such bad taste as to apply the term—epithet almost—to the two great nations of the Far East; he should, however, be more explicit. As the notice is in English and in an English newspaper the "heathen" must refer to English-speaking nations, so that the invitation is extended principally to British subjects and Americans. As the missionary in charge is an American it is soothing to reflect that he was once a "heathen" even as we are.

It is to be hoped the Japanese and Chinese are well off the premises before the heathen foreigner puts in an appearance. Yours truly,

TACT.

DEFAULTING STATES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Under the title "Defaulting States" in a recent issue of your paper, you reproduced from the annual report of the Council of Foreign Bondholders "a summary of the principal loans in default." In the appended summary, West Virginia appears as one of the largest defaulters. It may be worth while to state that this item may mislead some of your readers. Both officially and privately, West Virginians would deny that the state has ever defaulted and would say that West Virginia is one of the few states that has no bonded indebtedness, the last of its bonds having been paid off some five years ago. The facts are briefly these.

The lands of West Virginia were once a part of the territory of Virginia. When, during the Civil War, Virginia was in rebellion against the Federal Government, this part of her territory remained loyal to the Union and was organized as the state of West Virginia. Later Virginia tried to transfer to West Virginia a part of the debt which had existed at the time of the latter's separation from the mother state. West Virginia always refused to take over any portion of the debt or to acknowledge any obligation in the matter. Virginia set aside a part of the debt and declared it to be the debt of West Virginia. Virginia has persistently sought and still seeks to have a joint commission representing the two states adjudicate the matter. Her efforts are continually supported by holders of the disputed bonds, many of which holders have bought the bonds as a speculation. Hence a "lobby" exists at every session of the West Virginia Legislature to urge the appointment of a commission to meet the Virginia commissioners. The West Virginia Legislature always declines to act, on the ground that there is nothing to adjudicate. The debt in question is presumably that ascribed to West Virginia in the list of "Defaulting States." But, since West Virginia never issued or authorized or recognised this debt, it is surely misleading on that basis to classify West Virginia as a "defaulting" state.

As to the equity in the matter, opinions may differ. Virginia claims that West Virginia ought to pay a part of the debt based on the ratio of West Virginia's population or area or wealth to those of Virginia at the time of separation. West Virginia replies that most of Virginia's debt had been created to prepare for the Rebellion and to make public improvements in that part of the territory which Virginia retained. As West Virginia opposed the Rebellion (separating because of it) and received little benefit from the public improvements thus paid for, she claims that it is neither just nor expedient to assume any part of the debt, and hence denies obligation.

The main facts here stated may interest some of your readers. The details would make a long and tedious history. Faithfully yours,

E. H. VICKERS.

Tokyo, January 13, 1905.

BRIDGE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Bridge must not be made responsible for human nature's weaknesses:—

I play tennis for a silver prize.
I compete at story writing for money.
I swim for a wager.

I play bridge for 5 sen because it amuses me and I can afford it.

I don't play tennis,
I don't write stories,
I don't play bridge,
I don't swim unless

I get something at the end, because it bores me. Many people are in my position.

I refuse to play poker because I disapprove of gambling and I will only back my skill with money not my cards and only as far as I can afford to lose. I won't play bridge for 10 sen points, or 20 sen on the rubber, because I don't play well enough and cannot afford to lose such stakes. It seems to me all difficulties could be avoided over the bridge tables and human nature circumvented by forming two classes. One may call Class I the 5 sen players, and Class II the one sen players. Then each person only has to say, I belong to Class I. or II. as is done in all other games. It would result in all good and bad players who can afford to lose being in Class I. and vice versa. Only all must say it openly; the bad player who puts himself in Class I. for the sake of the stake will suffer as much as the good player who classes himself low.

There are so many people that Class I. and II. will settle themselves; only people must say so. The moment one has two classes, inviting is easy. People can then learn to play themselves into Class I. I cannot think that the better players really prefer 1 sen points; if they do, then they have no right to play even for 1/2 sen as it reduces the game to one's pocket's capacities, whereas the game should be made to be played for. If a man likes bridge for any money then let him get into Class I. If he does not like Class II., being a first class player, it is because they play badly, and he wants to get out. That two classes should come out of Tokyo shows that there can be two stakes—and I think on application it will be found that as a general rule the less good players are the one sen players—therefore I think it hard to allow the minority to rule Tokyo. As an hostess I know I can any night get three 5 sen tables for a dinner, whereas I can with difficulty get two 1 sen tables! I can always ask both to meet it I know which is which—only they must say Class I., or Class II. Yours etc.,

A MUCH WORRIED 1 AND 5 SEN HOSTESS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR:—The letter in your issue of to-day, signed "A Much Worried 1 and 5 Sen Hostess", brings up a most important question to which few people can give a straightforward definite answer, viz.: Why is gambling wrong?

Of all the sins in the category, perhaps the one most universally condoned by "society" to-day, in fact the one least often recognized as in reality sinful at all, is gambling. Your correspondent, for instance, apparently considers bridge a much maligned game, wrongly condemned because of "human nature's weaknesses" which weaknesses are by inference admitted, but not considered blameworthy, since the attempt is made with specious argument to justify their indulgence.

What is gambling? The Century Dictionary gives the following definition: "To play at a game of hazard for a stake; risk money or anything of value on the issue of a game of chance, by either playing or betting on the play of others; hence, to engage in financial transactions or speculations dependent for success chiefly upon chance or unknown contingencies." It will be seen that the essence of gambling consists in the combination of two elements: a stake, or something the loss of which is willingly left to chance; and an element of uncertainty, the chance upon which the loss of the stake, or the gain of a similar stake of greater or less value, is made to depend. It is not so plainly evident, however, that the immorality in gambling consists not in the risk of loss, which one may be willing and able to sustain, nor yet in the wasteful use of one's goods as the consequence of this risk willingly incurred, but in the getting of gain, be it ever so insignificant, which is the fruit of mere chance, and which results in a corresponding and uncompensated loss to another person.

Gambling is condemned by law because it is an injustice and an iniquity. It is immoral, and would be so even were it not illegal, because it involves this acquiring of goods for which no recompense is given, and no amount of willingness on the loser to be mulcted, can justify the winner in the possession of his chance-gotten gains, since final reckoning must leave the one with no equivalent for the property which the other has possessed himself of, without right or title. Had the winner used force or fraud to obtain possession of the loser's goods, his moral right to them would be similar to that right which, in gambling, is the result of chance.

Your correspondent essays the distinction between games of skill and games of chance, but fails lamentably in her attempt. "I refuse to play poker because I disapprove of gambling and will only back my skill with money, not my cards, and only as far as I can afford to lose." No hostess could have made that statement! Is poker then wholly a game of chance? Some of her "gambling" friends might enlighten the lady. And does the success of the game of Bridge depend wholly on skill, or does the distribution of the cards contribute something to the victory? If so our acquisitive hostess, who can not enjoy the game for the game's sake but must "get something at the end", is as much of a gambler at a game for a sen a point as she would be for "20 sen on the rubber", with the saving grace that she gambles within her means!

The real point at issue must not be obscured by false analogies with games of skill at which prizes are offered, or even with a game of chance to the winner of which a prize is given gratis, or from a subscription to which all competitors have subscribed alike. (The latter may be disapproved of by some, but it does not constitute gambling in the strict sense of the word.)

Barring the question of "swimming for a wager," the instances cited as similar to playing bridge for money are all fundamentally different, and in no sense to be classed with a game of cards, since in no one of them does the element of chance appreciably influence the result unequally. Neither do those who compete suffer any loss as a result of the gain by the winner. The case of a wager, particularly when one "backs his own skill" falls into another classification, dating back to almost prehistoric times, and can not here be discussed. Suffice it to quote an eminent authority which says: "A bet or wager was, however, at common law as valid as any other kind of contract, and the distinction between bets depending on gaming and bets depending on other contingencies was long retained, and has, in fact, not yet entirely disappeared."

One may enter a contest or trial of skill for which a prize is offered without incurring blame, but one may not play cards for money and escape the charge of guilt for an immoral act.

Let no self-respecting member of the community "openly" declare himself or herself a candidate for the "Class I." or any other class which our "hos-tes" may advocate, but in the name of social morality let the community honestly face the danger which this insidious "Bridge habit" is creating, and exert itself to avert such a catastrophe as a Society after the model of the "House of Mirth."

I am, Sir, Yours, &c.

A TOKYO HOST.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

MONSIEUR,—Monsieur Y. Oyama, dans votre No. du 15 Janvier, accuse les missionnaires d'être bes-mauvais, et les provoque à une joute.....pacifique. Je ne puis m'expliquer cette animosité d'un Chretien contre nous. A moins qu'il ne doive à quelque missionnaire ce style inimitable qui fait le charme de sa lettre. Sa provocation me remet en memoire une anecdote, dont le héros fut Paul de Cassagnac qui vient de mourir. C'était à la fin du second Empire: le celebre journaliste avait reçu d'un fougueux demagogue une provocation en duel remplie d'incorrections grammaticales. Il répondit: vous me provoquez en duel; comme offensé, j'ai le choix des armes, je prends l'Orthographe. Vous êtes mort.

Moi aussi j'accepte le défi de Monsieur Oyama: comme offensé ayant le choix des armes, je prends la grammaire française. M. Oyama n'est pas mort, car je desire seulement sa conversion et non sa mort, mais il est bien malade.

UN MISSIONNAIRE.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRIES OF JAPAN.

Before a meeting of the Society of Arts on Dec. 13th, over which Viscount Hayashi, the Japanese Ambassador, presided, a paper on "The Commerce and Industries of Japan" was read by Mr. W. F. Mitchell. The paper was accompanied by a number of slides giving views in Japan, opening with a coloured representation of Fuji-san. Mr. Mitchell, who spoke from a 16 years' residence in Japan, during which time he has seen many changes, said in the course of his remarks:—

A book which has recently been published in this country, but which came out some years ago in the United States, entitled "Bushido, or the Soul of Japan," by Dr. Nitobe, gave me an insight into Japanese character which I had hitherto only partially understood, and I should strongly recommend any of my hearers that have not read it to do so. Bushido has been strongly exemplified in the recent war, and has brought to notice qualities in this people that have staggered Europe, and led Japan to a glorious victory over a foe which other nations considered by no means despicable. I may add that Japan's friends have been astonished, not so much with their victories, but rather with the wonderful organisation, self-sacrifices, and unity of the people that have brought it about. I mention this incidentally, because the same weapons have been, and are, being used in a peaceful way for the expansion of Japan's trade, which has advanced with phenomenal strides. Now that the combat with Russia is over, the country will devote itself with precisely the same energy to the development of trade in their own country, as well as Manchuria and Korea. If the British Empire is to hold its own in the commercial centres of the East, it behoves us as a nation to take a lesson from Japan's preparedness for war, and see that we equip ourselves with the latest and newest weapons of commerce, in order that we may not have to drop out when it becomes a question of the survival of the fittest. Personally I do not believe in the "Yellow Peril" bogie, but that we may encounter our allies on the commercial field of battle is more than probable.

Mr. Mitchell then gave a brief sketch of Britain's connection with Japan and of the opening of the Treaty ports, and the re-inauguration of foreign trade. He went on to state that to trade you require merchants or dealers who are prepared to buy or sell, barter, or exchange. From the year 1624 everything foreign was prohibited, with the exception of an apology for trade with the Dutch at Nagasaki. Consequently, Japanese merchants who had, up to that time, been a power in the land very soon ceased to exist as their raison d'être had gone. This state of affairs lasted for over two centuries owing to the strong military spirit, tempered with the aristocratic bearing of the Daimios and their retainers and their contempt of a trader. The restrictions placed upon trade prevented any expansion, and the condition of the merchant became merely that of a shopkeeper. There were, of course, exceptions, and the existence of some few powerful firms, who were more or less directly associated with the governing powers, might be traced back for a long period, but it was not with such establishments that the foreigner came into contact when the country was again opened to foreign intercourse, but rather a set of irresponsible adventurers, who sometimes gained for their country an unenviable notoriety, due to the lack of an intelligent merchant class of the standing which any trader may now acquire. A better class of merchants and, in many cases, wealthy firms are taking the place of the old type. I hope the day is not far distant when the integrity of all merchants will be equal to that of the Government. I do not say that Japan has the monopoly of dishonest traders, as they, unfortunately exist in every country, but I refer to it because one frequently hears that there is a lamentable lack of commercial morality in Japan. I do claim that the class of the average dealer (but not really a merchant) which came into contact with foreigners left much to be desired, and that as a consequence their foreign conféres were looked upon by the better class Japanese as belonging to the same category. All that is changing, and in many respects has changed. The Government and official classes no longer despise trade, but recognise that it is the backbone of the prosperity of the country. Traders have been ennobled, and hold high positions, while the Government has taken a fatherly interest in commercial enterprise, even to the extent of heavy subsidies and loans from the public exchequer. My own experience is, that by carefully selecting your traders, as you would do elsewhere, the better class merchant is reliable, but foreigners are so often misled by Bantos, or go-betweens, who, for their own ends, introduce dealers of doubtful character, who have nothing to lose and everything to gain, and these are the people who repudiate their contracts if it suits them. The remedy is to study the language and get into closer contact with the right people.

Some remarks on the banking facilities that now existed, on statistics of trade, and on the products of Japan were then given. Passing on to shipping, Mr. Mitchell referred to the creation of the Mitsu Bishi, the forerunner of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and so to the shipbuilding industry, so well represented by the Iwasaki yard at Nagasaki, and others, and the docking facilities that now existed. Railways and manufacturing followed, including a sketch of the capacities of the Wakamatsu foundry. After a few words on monopolies and industries Mr. Mitchell concluded as follows:—It is sometimes said that the Japanese are splendid at imitation, but not initiative. There I beg to differ. They certainly have the faculty of grasping how a thing is done and copying it to perfection, even improving upon it, but they are at the same time inventive, and have produced quite a number of valuable ideas. The nation has been carefully assimilating for years the knowledge of Western ideas, and making use of the best of them. I remember some years ago being invited by the authorities to visit a prison newly built in Tokyo. It was in every respect, both from a sanitary and humanitarian point of view, a model prison, and very much in advance of any goal then in the country. What struck me most about it was that it was built after visiting prisons in almost every country, the Japanese having selected what they considered the most advanced system from each and made it a harmonious whole. And so it is with everything that Japan takes in hand, there is a thoroughness as regards research that merits the highest approbation. Mistakes must inevitably be made, as no mortals are infallible, while much still remains to be done. Japan has been learning from the West, and will continue to do so, as long as there is anything worth knowing. We must not on our part lose sight of the fact that she can teach us some lessons that might be of value, both in the fields of peaceful commerce and war. Let us, therefore take full advantage of the alliance, which should bring the people (and I may say has already done so) of both countries into closer relationship, and in closing I shall express a hope that the treaty, which has secured an open door to all countries in the markets of the East, may prove to be a strong and lasting bond between this country and Japan.

Sir Marcus Samuel gave several instances of the thoroughness of the Japanese Government. He said Japan had done a great benefit to the world by rescuing a large portion of the fertile land of Manchuria. He believed that Manchuria would become the granary of the East. There were enormous possibilities of wheat-growing there. Sir Marcus also mentioned that in sending orders to England for the manufacture of war clothing, the North Country manufacturers were astonished at the completeness of the specifications sent, and the chemical and other tests the goods had to pass. It was a great revelation and he wished the Government of this country would take an example from it, and learn that the best was the cheapest in the end. The speaker also mentioned that there was undoubtedly a great field in Europe for finding money for the development of Japanese enterprises. He had not the slightest fear that the Japanese would misuse money lent for use in these directions, because the Government with its paternal solicitude, saw for what purpose it was borrowed and how it was to be utilised (Applause).

Another speaker instanced, how, thirty years ago, he invested his small savings in a Japanese loan bearing 9 per cent. The other day so much money was offered at 4 per cent. that even the most nimble stag had difficulty in securing an allotment. He trusted China would progress, though with that country manufacturing from its own raw products, instead of sending them to Japan to be converted and then returned to her, Japan would be a heavy loser. He thought, however, that Japan would know how to trade with a rich and well-developed neighbour, just as profitably as with a backward one that now gave her great profits.

Mr. J. H. Longford commented on the changes generally in Japan, and especially in the commercial world, since the days of the first treaty. A very great change in methods and ways was now apparent. He would venture on dangerous ground and prophesy that the gratitude now felt for Japan in having rescued China, and maintained the open door, would not be so great a few years hence. Japan was perfectly well able to take care of herself, and with the advantages she possessed would be able to secure that, though the door might be wide open, no one but herself would be able to go through it.—*L. and C. COMMITTEE:—President—Mrs. Eldridge. Vice-President—Mrs. Caesar Hawkins. Hon. Treasurer—Mrs. C. V. Sale. Hon. Secretary—Mrs. Carey Hall. Managers—Mrs. Abegg, Mrs. Merriman, Mrs. James, Mrs. Orth, Hon. Secretary for Tokyo—Baroness d'Anethan.

Your Committee has much pleasure in laying before you the 23rd Annual Report of the Association. The amount of money received during the year 1905 with balance brought forward from 1904 is Yen 2,882.92. The amount expended in relieving cases of necessity is Yen 1580.19 which leaves a balance of Yen 1,302.73 to be carried forward.

In a cosmopolitan community such as this is, where all in want, irrespective of creed or nationality are helped, large and sudden calls are frequently made on the funds of the Association. It is therefore earnestly hoped that subscribers will continue to give their valuable support. Any pecuniary donations will be gratefully accepted. Contributions of clothing will be received by Mrs. Field. All cases requiring assistance are thoroughly investigated by members of the Committee, and assistance is given to the extent judged sufficient.

The sincere thanks of the Ladies Benevolent Association is tendered to all friends who have sent donations, to Madame Illies, a former subscriber visiting Japan, to Madame Gielen and to the King's Daughters' Circle for kind contributions towards defraying expense of the education of three little boys, also to the executors of the late Mr. Witkowski for a hand-some donation, and to all those who have assisted in carrying out the work of the Association. An account showing the receipts and expenditure for the work done by the Ladies Benevolent Association during the past year will be seen by the Honorary Treasurer's Report on the next page.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

VISCOUNT HAYASHI.

London, January 12.

Viscount Hayashi, Japanese Ambassador in London, sails for Japan at the end of March on leave of absence.

CONSUL DAVIDSON IN HOTEL FIRE

Eleven persons were killed and many injured in a hotel fire at Minneapolis. Mr. J. W. Davidson, late American Consul-General at Shanghai, was rescued, but his condition is critical.

THE BRITISH TEA DUTY.

The agitation against the present tea-duty in Great Britain will be continued until the Budget is presented.

BRITISH POLITICS.

The electoral campaign throughout the British Isles continues to be conducted in the most acute and heated form.

ITALY AND GERMANY.

A section of the Italian Press is markedly anti-German on the subject of Morocco. The Secolo declares that Germany, despite paper alliances, is isolated and can no longer dictate its despotic will to other chancelleries.

"C.-B.'s" SEAT SAFE.

Later.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the British Premier, will be returned to the new Parliament for the Stirling District of Scotland unopposed, his opponent withdrawing on account of illness.

(NOTE.—At the last election Sir Henry defeated Lt.-Col. Duke by 630 votes.—Ed. J.M.)

M. FALLIERES RE-ELECTED.

M. Fallières has been re-elected President of the French Senate.

JOHN BURNS DENOUNCED.

The Social-Democratic Federation has issued a manifesto to the electors of Battersea (which seat Mr. John Burns held in the last British parliament) denouncing him as traitor to his class.

(NOTE.—This step has doubtless been taken because Mr. John Burns has accepted office in the new Liberal Ministry. In his unofficial days this Labour leader used to declare that no man could possibly earn more than £500 a year honestly: as a Cabinet Minister his salary is £2,000 a year, and his retiring pension will be half that amount.—Ed. J.M.)

PRINCE ARTHUR.

Prince Arthur of Connaught has started for Japan. He takes with him three Orders of Merit for Field-Marshal Oyama, Admiral Togo and Field-Marshal Yamagata.

FRANCE LENDS MONEY TO RUSSIA.

London, January 12.
Le Temps announces that the French banks have decided to advance to Russia 266 millions of francs at 5½ per cent. per annum. This does not involve any export of gold, for the capital will remain in the banks against Russian drafts.

RESTORING PEACE.

Later.
The pacification of the Baltic provinces of Russia is proceeding steadily.

FRENCH PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The presidential election in France is fixed for January 17th.

JOHN BURNS.

The London Trades Council has decided to support the candidature of Mr. John Burns in Battersea.

FRANCO-VENEZUELAN RUPTURE.

London, January 13.
Diplomatic relations between France and Venezuela have been broken off. The cable between New York and Venezuela is interrupted.

THE BANK OF FRANCE.

January 14.
A circular issued by the Bank of France says that, its notes having reached the maximum, the Government has introduced a bill raising the circulation by 800 million francs in order to avert depreciation of the metal reserve.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

The elections hitherto show 45 Liberals and 12 Unionists elected. The Liberal gain is 22. A special telegram dated the 13th says that Mr. Balfour has been defeated.

MR. BALFOUR'S DEFEAT.

London, January 14.
Mr. A. J. Balfour has been defeated for Manchester (E). The Liberals polled 6,403 votes against the Unionist 4,423. The defeat was received with the wildest enthusiasm in London. It is believed that a safe seat has been found for Mr. Balfour at Eccles. The Unionists recognise that the flowing tide is with the Liberals and are preparing for the worst. Even their strong candidates are beginning to quake. The Liberal Headquarters are jubilant, being confident of a big independent majority.

SOCIALISTIC AND LABOUR SUCCESSES.

London, January 16.
An analysis of the voting shows a remarkable increase in the Socialistic and Labour vote, namely 63,692, compared with 20,631 in the same constituencies in 1900. The nett Liberal turn-over is 64,970.

FRANCE AND VENEZUELA.

America has assumed charge of French interests in Venezuela.

Later.

A French squadron has left Guadaloupe for Venezuela.

LIBERAL SUCCESSES SIGNIFICANT.

The election at West Newington has resulted: Captain C. W. Norton, (Liberal) 4,446; Belilios, Hongkong (Unionist) 2,425. The Times and Standard consider the Liberal successes most significant.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

London, January 17.

The elections so far show 99 Liberals, 29 Unionists and 14 Labour representatives returned. The Ministerial gains are 50, and the Labour gains 11. At South Bristol W. Howell Davies, Liberal, (who contested the seat at the last election) received 8,964, and the Rt. Hon. W. Hume Long, Unionist, (returned at last election), 5,272 votes.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

The Morocco Conference opens to-day. The press regards the prospects optimistically.

A NEW IRISH PARTY.

The Times says a new Irish organization will spring up uncompromisingly opposed to Mr. J. Redmond's parliamentary policy, proclaiming a boycott on British imports, prohibiting enlistment in the British Army and Navy and discouraging the use of the English language.

BARON SUYEMATSU AND HIS TREATMENT ON SHIPBOARD.

Later.

Baron Suyematsu, writing to the newspapers from Port Said, complains most bitterly of the treatment to which he and other Japanese were subjected on board the German mail steamer Zieten. They were condemned throughout the voyage to occupy the lowest and worst places at table.

JAPAN AND CHILE.

The Japanese Minister at Santiago is devoting attention to the exchange of Japanese manufactures for Chilean saltpetre.

UNIONIST APPREHENSIONS.

The Unionists apprehend the loss of two seats in Birmingham and a substantial substantial reduction of Chamberlain's majority.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

London, January 17.

The latest returns show 134 Liberal, 23 Labour and 52 Unionists elected. The Liberal gains are 65 and Labour 21.

THE FRENCH PRESIDENCY.

A meeting of the Deputies and Senators of the Left have selected M. de Fallieres as the Republican candidate for the Presidency, 416 voting for de Fallieres and 191 for Doumer.

BRITAIN AND RUSSIA AT THE CONFERENCE.

The London Standard says that Britain and Russia have agreed to act in concert at the Morocco Conference.

M. DE FALLIERES ELECTED.

London, January 18.

M. de Fallieres has been elected President of the French Republic by 449 votes against 371 cast for M. Doumer.

THE SUYEMATSU AFFAIR.

The newspapers discuss Baron Suyematsu's letter in most sympathetic terms. The Managers of the Norddeutscher Lloyd have cabled to Colombo asking for an explanation. They had given strict instructions that the utmost courtesy should be shown to Baron Suyematsu, as well as to the outgoing Chinese Minister from Great Britain.

CHINESE LABOUR AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Chief Engineer of the Panama Canal reports that Chinese labour alone can be used effectually there.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

THE NEW PRESIDENT.

M. de Fallieres was elected President of the French Republic and the ceremonies of installation will take place on Feb. 18th.

ATTACK ON A KOREAN IN ST. PETERSBURG.

The Novoye Vremya says that an attempt was made to assassinate Li Yong Ik, (formerly Korean Minister of War) at the Hotel de France. He received 11 wounds. His assailant was his interpreter and has been arrested.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

THE RUSSIAN OUTLOOK.

London, January 12.

Some of the St. Petersburg papers say that the Russian Government has abandoned its liberal policy.

Count Witte believes that the Manchurian army will be able to crush the revolutionaries.

London, January 14.

A telegram from St. Petersburg says that the Budget shows a deficit of 48 million roubles. There is a bread famine at Tiflis.

St. Petersburg, January 15.

The majority of the newspapers predict the continuance of the revolution. The bureaucrats are still masters of the situation.

GERMANY AND THE CONFERENCE.

Paris, January 15.

The German delegates to the Morocco Conference declare that Germany desires an agreement with France and her attitude is conciliatory.

MR. BALFOUR.

London, January 15.

Mr. A. J. Balfour, has delivered another speech at Manchester. Obstinate opposition was shown and the meeting was interrupted. In connexion with the circulation of a statement that one of his ancestors acted dishonourably while a contractor in India, which was issued by his opponent, Mr. Balfour characterized it as a despicable political act.

DE FALLIERES PROBABLE PRESIDENT.

London, January 16.

Telegrams from Paris says that there is every indication that M. de Fallieres will be elected President of the French Republic.

GREAT BRITAIN AND GERMANY.

London, January 16.

The British Ambassador in Berlin delivered an important speech at a meeting called to consider the best means for cultivating friendly relations between Great Britain and Germany. While desiderating the closest friendship between the two nations he said those relations must not be of such a nature as to cause differences between Great Britain and another Power.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

The Times says that the Morocco Conference is an opportunity for ascertaining the views of Germany vis-a-vis Great Britain and France.

Count von Tattenbach, German Minister to the Morocco Conference, said that the proposed Conference will last for about two months. Probably it will be concluded amicably.

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

There has been a moderate business during the week and it looks as though Japanese shippers were getting tired of supporting the market. Foreign houses are buying very little, and on some grades of Filature there is a reduction in quotations. Consuming markets still talk of lower prices and it may be that we shall see further concessions made here during the next week.

FOR BABY'S SKIN SCALP AND HAIR

Something for Mothers to Think About

EVERY CHILD born into the world with an inherited or early developed tendency to distressing, disfiguring humours of the skin, scalp, and blood, becomes an object of the most tender solicitude, not only because of its suffering but because of the dreadful fear that the disfiguration is to be lifelong and mar its future happiness and prosperity. Hence it becomes the duty of mothers of such afflicted children to acquaint themselves with the best, the purest, and most effective treatment available, viz., THE CUTICURA TREATMENT.

Warm baths with CUTICURA SOAP, to cleanse the skin of crusts and scales and soften the thickened cuticle, gentle anointings with CUTICURA OINTMENT, to instantly allay itching, irritation, and inflammation, and soothe and heal, to be followed in the severer cases by mild doses of CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (see below), to cool and cleanse the blood, are all that can be desired for the alleviation of the suffering of skin-tortured infants and children and the comfort of worn-out, worried mothers. A single set is often sufficient to cure when the best physicians fail.

Millions of Women Use Cuticura Soap

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT, for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes, itchings, and chafings, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerative weaknesses, and for many sanative, anti-septic purposes which readily suggest themselves to women, especially mothers, and for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (Chocolate Coated) are prepared to meet the wants of delicate women, and sensitive children, and are pure, sweet, and tasteless. They are beyond question the most successful blood purifiers and humoral cures yet compounded.

CUTICURA REMEDIES are sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: R. TOWNS & Co., Sydney. British Depot: 27-33, Charterhouse Sq., London. French Depot: 2 Rue de la Paix, Paris. Forras Davo and Chas. Coor, Sole Props., Boston, U. S. A. "All about the Skin," free.

zled about ten thousand yen belonging to the bank.

MR. FUJINAMI, Superintendent of the Imperial Stables, has received a decoration from the Kaiser.

A RUSSIAN mine was washed ashore on Jan. 23rd at Otabe; in the district of Kawakita near Kanazawa.

OWING to the recent heavy snow, traffic on the Hokkaido Railway and the Hokuyetsu Railway is interrupted.

TWO destroyers arrived at Mokpo on January 19th to deal with the pirates who are now active in Korean waters.

THE ice-crusher Tairei Maru, now under repairs at Yokosuka, will leave on January 28th for Saghalien via Aomori.

ACCORDING to the Jiji, Count Katsura, the late Premier, and Baron Kawamura will shortly leave for America and Europe.

JUDGE Esaki, of the Yokohama District and Local Courts, has been removed to the Kofu District Court, Yamanashi prefecture.

ADMIRAL SAITO, Minister for the Navy, and Mr. Y. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, have been promoted to Senior Class of the Fourth Rank.

MR. SUNAGA, proprietor of the Fukui Nichi Nichi Shimbun, has been arrested and the office of the paper has been searched by the authorities.

WHEN the O. & O. steamer Doric was entering Hongkong, during a dense fog, on January 10th, a coolie boat got across her bows and one man was drowned.

THE French Minister in Seoul will leave Korea by the French man-of-war Kersaint which is expected to arrive in Korea from Shanghai at the end of this month.

THE 100th Bank held a general meeting on Jan. 21st in Tokyo. An interim dividend for the last half of 1905 was declared at the rate of 30 per cent. per annum.

ON the night of Jan. 21st, two passenger trains collided on the Kyushu Railway between Karatsu and Mihara, the result being that one person was killed and four were injured.

DURING the late war, the Nippon Red Cross Society received as donations from the public yen 1,258,001.34 from Japanese and yen 359,814.13 from foreigners.

THE net profit of Fujiya Hotel, Miyanoshta, for the last half year of 1905 was yen 9,986.45. It may be remembered that the capital of the hotel is a hundred thousand yen.

Two coal coolies and a number of sendoes had a fight on Tuesday evening near Ishikawa-Nakamura, Yokohama, the coolies being severely hurt. They were treated by a doctor.

THE Yokohama City Office will enforce sanitary measures from the beginning of February in connection with the plague, which is still prevalent in Osaka and other western places.

S. OKU, the adopted son of the late Mr. Oku Saburobei, a well-known merchant of Tokyo, committed suicide on board a steamer while on his way from Matsushima to Sendai.

THE Jiji has a telegram from Osaka to the effect that Mr. R. Iwamura, one of the auditors of the Kwansei Railway Co., and Mr. K. Yabuta, President of the 68th Bank, Nara, were arrested on Jan. 22nd in Osaka, and removed to the Osaka District Court. It is alleged, adds the Japanese paper, that they are implicated with T. Kawamoto, a contractor, who is undergoing examination in the same Court on a charge of fraud.

ACCORDING to a Berlin telegram, the Hamburg-Amerika Line's steamer Servia has gone ashore off the Holland coast while on her way home from Yokohama. The crew were all saved.

C. SEKIDA, student of the Imperial University, committed suicide on the morning of Jan. 21st by throwing himself into the canal near Misaki-cho, Tokyo. He had been suffering from brain complaint for some months past.

A TELEGRAM from Morioka, Iwate prefecture, says that on the morning of Jan. 22nd, a wealthy merchant residing in Kawara-machi was found murdered on the Tsunaki road outside the city. Money known to be in his possession was stolen. The culprit is still at large.

A SERIOUS accident took place on the evening of Jan. 21st on the Keihin (Tokyo-Yokohama) Electric Tramway near Kanagawa. No. 1 and No. 4 carriages collided with the result that both sustained severe damage. Five passengers were severely and six slightly injured.

MR. WONG KAI KOH, who was temporarily residing at the foot of Camp Hill, Yokohama, accidentally fell across a charcoal brazier in the lavatory and received such injuries that notwithstanding his removal to the General Hospital he died on Thursday from the shock.

It is reported by Japanese papers that Admiral Viscount Ito, Councillor of the Supreme Military Council, formerly Chief of the Naval Staff Office, will be promoted to the rank of Admiral of the Fleet, and General Count Nodzu, Commander of the Central Army, to the rank of Field-Marshal.

AN Osaka telegram says that the sailing vessel Futoku Maru (158 tons) on her way from Hirato to Osaka, collided with a foreign steamer about 9 a.m. on January 17th off the district of Onsen, Ehime prefecture, sustained severe damage aft, and sank in a few minutes. The steamer made no effort to rescue the crew, consisting of eight men, and passed out of sight. After drifting for about an hour three of the crew were saved by the Osaka Shosen Kaisha's steamer Anlo Maru. One of the three, however, died after being rescued. The Anlo Maru arrived on January 19th at Kobe and handed the survivors over to the Harbour Office.

THE Ruori Coal Co., which was lately established at Ishikari, Hokkaido, by prominent capitalists of Tokyo and Yokohama with a proposed capital of yen 7,500,000, intends to raise a loan of the same amount in London, with a view to which the promoters are now said to be conducting negotiations with a London syndicate through a leading British firm in Yokohama. The contract agreed upon between the parties is reported to provide that debentures are to be issued at yen 102 with interest at 5 per cent. per annum; no guarantee is required for the debt; and the loan is to be redeemed by installments extending over seventeen years but redemption to begin only after three years have elapsed.

CHINA.

Saturday, January 20.

The Hochi Shimbun's Peking correspondent telegraphs that quite a wave of anti-Japan sentiment is springing up in China. It had its origin, he says, in a manifesto prepared by some Cantonese literati who insist that the real menace to China's integrity comes from Japan, and it has been swelled by the voices of the recalcitrant students who recently returned from Tokyo to Shanghai, as well as by politicians who profess to detect in this country's action towards Korea the germs of a policy of extensive aggression. The Hochi correspondent writes in a very emphatic strain, but it would be unwise, we think, to attach much importance to his news. The Japanese stand between two camps: the camp of the Manchu Dynasty and the camp of its enemies. What rankled most in the minds of the Chinese students who recently created such a commotion in Tokyo, was that they imagined some collusion between Peking and Tokyo to subject them to restraints. Therefore their ill-judged conduct was addressed to their own authorities as much as to the Japanese.

The Chinese Minister in Tokyo has telegraphed to the returned students that all their comrades having rejoined the schools and colleges in Tokyo, a fixed time is now allowed for the returned youths to take the same step. If they remain obstinate, all allowances made to them by the State or by local governments will be stopped.

It appears that there is no truth in the rumour recently wired to Tokyo that the Vice-Minister of Education had memorialized the Throne urging abandonment of the study of the Confucian and Mencian Classics as mere waste of time. What the memorial really contained was a suggestion that, these books being beyond the comprehension of very young students, it would be better to confine the study of them to higher educational institutions and to dispense with their use in junior schools. Viceroy Yuan is alleged to be in favour of this recommendation.

Monday, January 22.

A telegram to the Hochi Shimbun from Peking quotes a trustworthy diplomatic authority as saying that a conference will soon be opened between China and Russia, when the latter Power will submit the following proposals:—

1. That Russia shall respect China's autonomy, and that friendship shall be cemented between the two Powers.
2. That China, when opening Manchuria, shall confer with the Representatives of all the Powers on an equal footing and shall avoid all display of partiality.
3. That mining privileges shall be granted to Russia in Mongolia.
4. That Russia shall have special trade privileges in Chinese Turkestan.
5. That if China contemplates opening Changkiakow or Kulung to foreign trade, she shall confer first with Russia on the subject.
6. That the Treaty of 1881 shall be revised.
7. That Russia shall be granted the same privileges of communications as Japan in Shantung (?).
8. That all railways communicating with the Amur River shall be constructed by China and Russia in combination.

The correspondent adds to this that Russia claims as her own a tract of land 70 miles wide along the southern bank of the Amur, and that she is requiring all Chinese residents to remove from that district. He further states that Russian local officials are congregating in Peking with a view to the impending conference, and that the business of the Russia-Chinese Bank is in a very unprosperous condition.

A telegram to the Kokumin Shimbun from Peking says that the Chinese Authorities have nearly completed their investigations preparatory to establishing an opium monopoly and that they have made application to the British Representative in the sense that the Government desires to buy up all the opium coming from India.

Tuesday, January 23.

M. Pokotiloff is credited (Hochi's correspondence) with some views not unlikely to cause trouble. He claims, in the first place, that the opening of Harbin, as provided by the Peking convention, will be injurious to Russian interests, though the reason of such an estimate is not stated. He further alleges that whereas China has consented to the exploitation of the Yalu forests by a syndicate of Chinese and Japanese subjects, she is finding in the expiration of the charter's term a pretext for putting an end to the life of the Russo-Chinese Syndicate which is operating the Amur forests. And he finally insists that if Japan is to have a railway from Antung to Mukden, Russia must be granted concessions for branch lines in the Amur region.

The correspondents of the Kokumin and the Hochi report that M. Pokotiloff, having complained to the Waiwupu about outrages committed by Chinese bandits against Russian merchants in Shinkiang, received for answer a retort that the fault seems to be on the side of the Russian merchants, who form themselves into bodies and commit lawless acts which naturally draw down on them the resentment of the inhabitants. Steps have been taken, the Waiwupu adds, to ascertain the facts, and after due investigation a decision will be taken.

The Chinese Minister in Washington is said to have telegraphed to his Government that a bill of 12 articles has been prepared in connexion with the question of Chinese immigrants into the United States. It places merchants, students and tourists on the same footing with similar classes of Occidentals and it materially mitigates the restrictions upon labourers.

Wednesday, January 24.

The Chinese Governor of the Amur region is reported to have addressed to his Government a despatch complaining that the Russians are inciting the local bandits to raid the country and that if he sends troops to quell this disturbance they are likely to come into collision with the Russians. He therefore asks the Peking Authorities to make representations in the proper quarter. As to the motive of the Russians in thus acting, the Governor assigns to them a design of postponing the time for the withdrawal of their forces. In consequence of the receipt of this intelligence Mr. Na Tung addressed a despatch to M. Pokotiloff, saying that after the withdrawal of the Russians China intends to employ in important positions such of her subjects in Manchuria as were in the Russian service, and warning M. Pokotiloff that his countrymen are said to be acting in a manner detrimental to the preservation of good order, a course not at all conducive to Russian interests. M. Pokotiloff, if the telegrams from which we obtain this intelligence be trustworthy, made a somewhat defiant reply. He said that it did not all concern Russia what steps the Chinese might take towards their own nationals in Manchuria after the evacuation, but he declared that the reports sent in by Chinese officials were inspired by a desire to clear themselves of responsibility for outrages committed against Russian life and property, and that the Central Government in Peking would not be suffered to act the part of an idle spectator in such a matter. M. Pokotiloff's attitude is doubtless inspired by reports reaching him from his own officials, but nevertheless the tone of his reply suggests that he has little inclination to conciliate the Waiwupu.

The officials bearing the ratified copy of the China-Japan Convention reached Peking on the afternoon of the 22nd instant, and it is said that in order to avoid delays likely to be caused by the Chinese New Year, the officials of the Waiwupu made arrangements for the exchange of ratifications on the 23rd. Such celerity is very unusual, especially in China.

Thursday, January 25.

Mr. Leung, Chinese Representative in Washington, having served his time, says the Peking correspondent of the Asahi Shimbun, would be replaced in the ordinary course of events, but he is considered to have shown so much ability in handling the questions of the railways and of the immigration of labourers that the Government has decided to keep him at his post.

There are now 1600 Japanese residents in Tientsin but the Japanese Consulate remains in its old place at a remote corner of the British settlement and considerable inconvenience is thus entailed. The Japanese have consequently held a meeting and passed a resolution that the Government be asked to arrange for the transfer of the Consulate to a more convenient position.

There appears to be some serious discontent in Canton. The Viceroy Tsen Chun-huan having conceived a plan for building the Yeh-Han Railway with funds obtained by increased taxation, much murmuring has made itself heard, and the gentry and literati have memorialized the Peking Government urging the withdrawal of the Viceroy. In consequence of this memorial Peking has ordered Viceroy Chou to investigate the administrative methods of his colleague Tsen. Meanwhile there has been sent to the United States Consul in Canton a warning that a plot is on foot to assassinate him, and thereafter to take advantage of the confusion which would ensue for assassinating the Viceroy himself. The conspirators reckon that were the United States Consul killed, foreign men-of-war would certainly be sent to Canton and great commotion would result. This, however, sounds like a mere canard. If, as rumour alleges, Viceroy Tsen's doings are objectionable chiefly on the score of wanting to tax the people for railway purposes, the Cantonese must be well aware that the assassination of an American Consul and the sending of men-of-war up the river would result in a tax from which there would be no escape.

The exchange of ratifications in the case of the new China-Japan Convention took place in Peking on the 23rd instant.

Rumour says that Viceroy Chang has memorialized the Throne in favour of opening Wuchang to foreign trade. His Excellency's reasons are that the business of the place is growing rapidly and that after the opening of the Yeh-Han Railway it will become a great commercial emporium.

Of the six divisions which are to form the Peh-yang Army of Viceroy Yuan, three have been duly organized, equipped and trained, namely, the Second Division with its head-quarters at Yungping; the Third with its head-quarters at Paoting; and the Fourth with its head-quarters at Machang. The Viceroy, in view of the fact that troops are now required in Manchuria, is said to have decided that the Paoting Division shall be sent thither, and that it shall be followed, later on, by the Machang men who require some further training. We have as yet no information as to the exact strength of a Peh-yang division.

The Chinese Government has resolved, it is said, to despatch a force of a thousand picked men forthwith to some point between Kulung and Kiaakta. This resolve is inspired by the repeated receipt of intelligence pointing to Russian activity in that quarter of China's dominions.

Friday, January 26.

It is stated that after frequent representations from the Chinese Government Russia has at length agreed to open negotiations with reference to the Portsmouth treaty. She will not, however, appoint any special plenipotentiary but will leave the business in the hands of M. Pokotiloff. She has certainly not shown any expedition in this matter, regarding it probably as one of form in the main. Naturally it was not expected that she would take any step to approach China until the nature of the Japanese negotiations in Peking was clearly known, but even granting that cause of delay she has not hurried herself. China's game, we think, would have been to "sit tight." It is quite on the cards that M. Pokotiloff may make her pay for the anxiety she has shown. By way of preface to this forecast we notice that the Russian Representative is stated to have severely criticised the China-Japan Convention in conversation with Mr. Tang Shou-i. M. Pokotiloff is said to have remarked that whereas Viceroy Yuan had announced his intention of conducting the negotiations in such a manner as to assert China's sovereignty to the full, his Excellency did not appear to have very successful in that respect. One does not require any very profound knowledge of Russian diplomacy to understand the character of such a prelude to the negotiations now pending. M. Pokotiloff is preparing his vis-à-vis to find that her sovereignty does not receive much respect at Russian hands.

The opening of Manchuria does not appear likely to be quite as rapid a process as might have been anticipated from the terms of the Peking Convention. It is alleged that Mukden, Harbin and Tsitsihar alone are to be opened immediately, and that an interval of 3 years will probably elapse before the other places named in the Convention are accessible to foreign traders. Active steps are now in progress, it is said, with regard to the first three places, but the procedure with regard to the others will be more leisurely. After all, there are some important preparations to be made; primarily the complete dispersal of the Hunghtuts.

A telegram to the Hochi says that China is demanding from Russia a payment of a million taels in connexion with the transfer of the railway south of Changchun to Japan. As to how this claim is made up, no particulars are given, but formal negotiations are said to have been commenced.

More or less detailed rumours are wired by the Hochi Shimbun's Peking correspondent with reference to the recently received statement that an anti-Japanese feeling was growing up in China. Lien Fang and Tang Shou-i are said to entertain such a sentiment, but Na Tung considers that the influx of Japanese subjects into Kulung, Mongolia, Shinkiang and Kangsi should be read as an indication of Japan's desire to keep the peace. Ku Fung-ki, on the other hand—and his view is understood to be shared by all the other leading members of the Government—contends that neither of the above two views is correct and that China, avoiding the growth of any feeling of reliance on Japan, should adopt the policy of depending on her own strength. The statement here made incidentally that many Japanese subjects have entered the northern and north-western extra-mural regions of China is novel.

The Governor-General of Mukden is represented as being very anxious about the opening of Mukden and the establishment of the timber company contemplated by the Peking Convention. He wishes to use all expedition in these matters in order not to be forestalled by the Japanese, but the question of funds perplexes him, inasmuch as a sum of 4 million taels will be needed according to his calculation. He suggests that this money should be obtained from abroad; in other words, that China should follow Japan's example in introducing foreign capital, and he urges that Viceroy Yuan should be consulted on the subject.

Projects for re-constructing the Chinese navy are said to be earnestly mooted in Peking. In considering this problem it has appeared to Chinese statesmen that a great impetus is given to the Japanese navy by the fact that Princes of the Blood serve on board men-of-war, and the idea is that a similar course should be adopted in China. A prince—whose name is not mentioned—has memorialized the Throne on the subject, urging that fifteen youths of noble lineage should be selected and despatched to Europe for the purpose of studying naval matters. This would indeed be a new departure in a country where for many centuries the profession of arms has been despised as ignoble and unworthy of a gentleman's attention.

Mr. Wang Wen-shao is stated to be dangerously ill.

A strange report comes from Changsha, the capital of Hunan. A man named Kelly, and described as the chief police constable there, is said to have attempted to arrest two Greeks—or two members of the Greek Church, we can not discover which is the correct version—but the attempt ended in an attack upon the constable who died on the following day from the effects of his injuries. He is said to have been hung. A telegram to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun states that the officer was shot by a foreigner.

THE ORIENTAL SOCIETY.

The Toyo Kyokai held its regular meeting in the Sanyentei on the 24th instant, Mr. Kato Takaaki, Minister of Foreign Affairs, presiding. Among those present were Mr. Inagaki, Japanese Representative in Siam, and Mr. Megata, Financial Adviser to the Korean Government. Mr. Inagaki spoke interestingly of the foreign relations of Siam. He said, in effect, that the entente between France and Great Britain had secured the maintenance of Siamese independence and that the country was now flourishing, its relations with Japan growing daily closer. Mr. Megata described the course of financial reform in Korea. He said that 5½ million yen worth of nickels had been examined up to the present and only from 2 to 5 per cent. had been found spurious. The standard currency might be said to be notes of the First Bank, some 8 million yen worth of which had already gone into circulation. There still remained in the people's hands a great quantity of cash, but the amount could not be ascertained. It appeared that the Korean nation needed about 13 million yen in the form of circulating media, a reasonable sum if the population be put at 12 millions. He proceeded to describe the various other steps taken for reforming the financial system, but as these have already been noted in our columns, we need not repeat them here. It is to be observed, however, that Mr. Megata spoke hopefully of the success hitherto attending the various changes made. He referred also to the budget, and related how great had been the difficulties with this essential part of financial control. A deficit of 2 million yen on the side of revenue had presented itself, but happily equilibrium had been secured. Korea had now a debt of 5½ million yen. Speaking of the revenue he alluded to the flagrant differences between actualities and the condition indicated by law. Immense sums were levied by officials over and above the legal amounts; large deductions were made from the Treasury's receipts on account of bogus expenses, and considerable sums remained uncollected. It was hoped that all these abuses would be remedied in time. Korean administrative officials had no manner of practical training. They could talk glibly enough, but when it came to a question of accounts they were helpless. Education was an imperative necessity and the fact had received recognition in the new programme. He believed that when the new agricultural improvements were introduced—mainly the growing of cotton—when industry was encouraged; when proper forestry laws were enforced; when rice-culture was reformed; when the extortions of officialdom were corrected, and when the administration of justice could be relied on, the 12 millions of Korean people would bless the new regimen. Mr. Megata's speech seems to have attracted much interest.

THE INCOME TAX.

As there seems to be still some misunderstanding about the income tax and the manner of its collection, a word of explanation may be useful. Up to the close of 1904 the tax was collected half-yearly, the year being computed from January to December, not as the fiscal year from April to March. But the Authorities found that this method of semi-annual payment was embarrassing after the tax had been increased by war rates, and they therefore decided to make the collections quarterly, which system came into force from January 1st, 1905. Thus the method assumed the following form:—

First quarter, January to March, collected on September 30th, following.
Second quarter, April to June, collected on November 30th, following.
Third quarter, July to September, collected on January 31st, following.
Fourth quarter, from October to December, collected on March 31st, following.

It will thus be seen that although the payments are on account of quarters of a year, the collections are actually made every two months between September and March, and no collection takes place during the period of six months from April to September. Within the past few days, notices have been issued calling for a quarterly payment on or before the 31st instant. This payment is for the quarter ended September 30th of last year. It will be followed by another collection on the 31st of March, and there will then be no further collection until the 30th of next September.

THE "SEIYU-KAI."

Our readers will have observed that at the meeting of the Seiyu-kai on the 16th instant, an announcement that the Daido Club had applied to join forces with the Seiyu-kai for parliamentary purposes evoked some derision, but there was no evidence of a serious desire to reject the overture. Collating the various reports published by the Tokyo press, we gather that the incident was part of an interesting negotiation which may be said to have assumed practical shape on the occasion of the meeting of members of the Diet held in the house of the Prime Minister on the 17th inst. The leaders of the Seiyu-kai and of the Progressists remained behind on the occasion after the minor members had dispersed, their object being to discuss arrangements for coöperation between the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists. The principal men in both parties were anxious to walk hand in hand as they had hitherto done, their object being to avert party disputes pending the final settlement of all questions arising out of the war. To understand what this involves it is necessary to note that the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists have hitherto combined to elect from their own ranks solely all the members of the standing committees in the Lower House—the Budget Committee, the Petitions Committee, the Punishments Committee and the Settled Accounts Committee. Such a system of election meant, of course, that all other parties were virtually excluded from interference in any of the subjects entrusted to these important committees for discussion. It is alleged that in a conversation between Marquis Saionji and Mr. Oishi Masami (a Progressist leader), on a date which is not mentioned, the Marquis agreed to renew this system for the purposes of the present session of the Diet. But subsequently the Daido Club came forward with an offer of coöperation, which naturally involved admission of the Daido members also to the ranks of the standing committees. The Daido Club's hope was that the Seiyu-kai would join hands with it to the exclusion of the Progressists, and the hope of the Progressists was that the Seiyu-kai would join hands with them to the exclusion of the Daido Club. The Seiyu-kai were thus placed in an embarrassing situation. No such dilemma of choice had previously presented itself, for outside the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists there had not existed any organization worthy of serious consideration. But the Daido Club is a formidable body. It commands in the Lower House votes variously estimated at from 76 to 85, being thus a very tangible force. To exclude such a body altogether from the standing committees would have been obviously unjust as well as impolitic: to admit the Daido Club as well as the Seiyu-kai would mean what the Japanese call a "flower-all-round policy," which does not count among the most dignified kinds of procedure. The Seiyu-kai finally decided, however, that the Daido Club must be admitted, but that the old relation should be, at the same time, preserved with the Progressists. It would seem that this obviously fair decision has not greatly pleased either the Progressists or the Daido Club, for it is plain that by the presence of both parties in the Seiyu-kai camp they neutralize one another's influence, the Seiyu-kai being thus in the happy position of having competence to be "happy with either were 'tother sweet charmer away." At all events, matters have been thus arranged. The three parties will be represented on the standing committees, the number taken from each being decided by working out a sum in compound proportion. The Seiyu-kai have also extended this rule of justice to the other sections of the House, namely, the Seiko Club (the coterie of Messrs. Shinada Saburo and Kono Hironaka) and the Independents. Thus for the first time all parties will have fair representation on these Committees. But, as we have said, this result is not very pleasing to either the Progressists or the Daido Club, and it is said to have weakened the already fragile tie which binds together the Seiyu-kai and the Kensei-honto.

Meanwhile the local sections of the Seiyu-kai have been formulating resolutions which sound somewhat superfluous. Thus the Tokyo and Kwanto sections, numbering some 200, met in Tokyo on the 18th instant and adopted the following resolution:—"Having accepted administrative responsibility in consequence of the former Cabinet's mistakes in foreign policy, our party recognises that the formation of a Ministry by our leader is a movement of constitutional progress. Our Party will cause the present Cabinet to follow a constitutional line of conduct and, while perfecting the post-bellum enterprises, to place the national finances on a firm basis." The To-hoku (north-eastern) section has also held a meeting and adopted the following manifesto and resolution:—"Our Party recognises that the formation of a Ministry by our leader in the difficult post-bellum situation is fortunate for the nation and is a step of constitutional progress. Therefore our Party hopes that the present Cabinet will improve the constitutional lines" (this is somewhat vague), "will accomplish real reform in the administration and finance, and will thus carry out a great policy conducive to the fortunes of the State." The resolution was:—"(1) Steps must be immediately taken to relieve the distress resulting from crop failure in the three north-eastern prefectures. (2) Railways must be built in the north-east so as provide such facilities of communication as are essential to the development of production. (3) The colonization of Saghalien must be proceeded with without delay. (4) The section's general meeting shall be held this year in Sapporo.

Various other sections of the Party met in Tokyo and passed resolutions presumably similar in general tone.

The Seiyu-kai held its general meeting on the 20th instant in Tokyo. There were present 230 members of whom 120 had seats in the Lower House. Marquis Saionji, being unwell, did not appear, and Mr. Matsuda Masahisa read an address from him. After expressing his satisfaction at meeting his trusted political friends on the eve of the Diet's session, the Marquis briefly reviewed the events of the past two years; the war with Russia which had brought victory after victory to Japan and had raised her to a place among the leading nations of the world, and the union of the people at home as well as of all politicians which had greatly contributed to the happy result. The Seiyu-kai, which had earned no small credit in connection with these events, was now entrusted with a duty scarcely less important than had been that of conducting the war, namely the duty of adjusting the post-bellum finances and carrying out the post-bellum enterprises. He himself was very sensible of his incompetence to undertake the great functions now devolving on him as Minister President, but, having been honoured with the Imperial commands, he felt that he had no choice, and he had resolved to accept the post in reliance on the sympathy and assistance of the Seiyu-kai. He had experience of the invaluable support they had rendered him since, in succession to Marquis Ito, he had taken up the duties of their President, and he did not doubt that that support would be continued to him in his new position as head of the Cabinet. With reference to the post-bellum work devolving on the country's statesmen there was, first, the regulation of the finances; secondly, the encouragement of commerce, industry and agriculture; thirdly, the extension of education, and, fourthly, the leading of the nation to a higher plane of aspirations. Further all official business would be much heavier in the period upon which they were now entering than it had been before the war, and in proportion as the Empire's intercourse with foreign States grew more intimate causes of rivalry and possible friction could scarcely fail to arise, while, on the other hand, they had to remember that the eyes of the world were fixed on Japan with redoubled intensity in the new position to which she had ascended. The most pressing duties of the country's diplomats were to give full effect to the protectorate over Korea and so to treat the Korean nation as to win its confidence and esteem; while, at the same time, cultivating friendly relations with China, convincing her of Japan's sincerity, and thus inducing her to walk hand in hand with this country along the path of progress. Such responsibilities and such duties were of the heaviest character: it was unnecessary to remind his hearers of that fact. But what had to be carefully noted was that success in carrying out this programme depended largely upon financial measures, and that unless the nation was determined to face its financial burdens stoutly and liberally, great results tending to the permanent glory of the Empire could not be obtained. He earnestly hoped that all classes would unite to carry out this great task, and he reminded his political friends that it depended largely upon their efforts whether the people could be educated to a full sense of the responsibilities devolving on the country. He earnestly called on them to unite their strength for this purpose and by their assiduity and sincerity to awaken a corresponding spirit among their countrymen. He reminded them that when, at the close of the last session of the Diet, he had used in addressing them the four words, "an absolutely united country," he did not refer to union for warlike purposes alone, but also to union in times of peace when the fruits of the war had to be gathered. The moment had now come to show the value of union in this latter sense, and it was essential that all parochial and party differences should be laid aside and that men should march hand in hand towards the achievement of national aims, not allowing themselves to be deflected from this course by any paltry issues. It was not the first time that he had addressed them in this sense, and he trusted that they would leave nothing undone to accomplish the duties now placed in their charge. It had been the great purpose of the Restoration to place the counsels of the State on a broad basis, and by pursuing that policy steadily for 40 years the country had attained the position in which it now stood. To-day was the time to place the Constitution on a firm basis and to leave to posterity a model of its working. He called on them to bring to the accomplishment of this work the utmost sincerity, liberality and zeal, and he promised that, for his own part, he would not be found wanting in anything that lay within the compass of his strength.

After some formal remarks from Mr. Matsuda Masahisa and Mr. Hara Kei, the manifesto of the Party was then read and unanimously adopted. It said:—

"Having been compelled to enter into hostilities with Russia for the sake of preserving the peace of the Far East, His Imperial Majesty's arms were everywhere successful and the troops and sailors of the Empire won renown throughout the world. For this glorious result the virtues of our Sovereign were chiefly responsible, but such achievements would have been impossible had not the whole of the people recognised their duty to the State and discharged it with the utmost loyal and zeal.

"Our Party deems it a great honour that, in spite of its defective strength it has been called on at this moment to carry out the wishes of the nation. The war has been brought to a close, and the business of the hour is to form plans such as, while reaping the benefits of the past, shall firmly establish the constitutional system and be adapted to the Empire's fortunes. These duties are multifarious and in carrying them out large financial outlays are inevitable. The task is altogether more formidable even than was that of conducting the war. Its successful achievement is quite impossible unless the nation unites as one man, and, divesting itself of all selfish considerations, fully recognises and discharges its public duties. Our Party will make the unification of public opinion its object; will work with all the diligence it can command; will endeavour to discriminate carefully between urgency and deliberation; will practise the utmost economy, and, seeking to promote development in every direction, will strive to discharge the great duties demanded by the State."

Various messages of congratulation were then read, after which the members repaired to the Maple Club at the invitation of Marquis Saionji. The Marquis, being unfortunately unable to be present, was represented by Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, who, in welcoming the guests, expressed on behalf of Marquis Saionji the satisfaction he felt at the reception given to his address by the general meeting. Speaking as an individual Mr. Matsuda eulogized the courage and devotion displayed by Marquis Saionji in accepting office at a time of such great difficulty, in spite of his weak state of health. He observed that there should now be no question of the length of the Ministry's life, but that the one object kept in view should be sincerity. A Chinese proverb said that where two united their strength even metal could be cut. If such a party as theirs worked with real union, it could move mountains.

Baron Okouchi replied on behalf of the guests, who numbered some 250.

THE MEETING OF THE PROGRESSISTS.

The Progressists held their general meeting on the 20th instant in Tokyo. The feature of the meeting was an address by Count Okuma. We can not produce it in full, nor indeed is any verbatim report immediately available, but the gist was as follows:—

In consideration of the occasion the Count deemed it of much importance to express his views to the general meeting. The great war had ended in an honourable peace, but one of its results would inevitably be to produce a marked change in the sentiments of the nation. That was not the case in Japan alone: the experience of all countries showed that such a result was to be expected. Every victorious state received an access of power and underwent a development of civilization. But such results did not come of themselves. They depended largely upon the mood of the people and their resolution. Only 50 years had elapsed since the emergence of Japan from isolation, and throughout that period she had followed a basic policy. To its unswerving pursuit must be attributed all the successes she had achieved, all the honour she had won. It was the policy of resistance to the aggressions of foreign states, and that resistance had taken the form, not of armed opposition, but of the adoption of progressive ideals and civilized improvements such as should place the country on the level of enlightened Powers. This policy had been clearly outlined in the Imperial Oath taken at the time of the Restoration, when the abuse of caste had been abolished and the whole of the people had been placed on an equal footing for the advancement of the country, so that the best talent available at home had been procured for the service of the Empire and the Councils of State had been entrusted to the direction of its wisest men. The strength flowing from this system was irresistible, and by its exercise Japan had reached the place where she stood to-day. If they examined the direct sources of this success they would find, first, the fact that every able-bodied subject was a soldier; secondly, the fact that the whole of the people were knit into an indissoluble union; and, thirdly, the fact that education was universal. Now when in the sequel of a great war the national sentiment was about to undergo a change, three points of vital importance presented themselves. These were, first, the extension of common education so that it should be absolutely universal; secondly, the reduction of the period of service with the colours from three years to two years so as to increase the number of trained men available at any moment and to produce on as wide a scale as possible the respect for discipline and the spirit of self-sacrifice which are elementary essentials of military proficiency; and, thirdly, the extension of the franchise. England owed much of her greatness to the liberality of her election laws. It was unreasonable to suppose that men who had fought for their country during two years on foreign soil were unqualified to vote for popular representatives, and it was only a degree less unreasonable to exclude from that privilege persons who were fully educated. The exact limits of the extension might be matter for discussion, but the principle could not be questioned. Unfortunately a great abuse of the electoral system had arisen in Japan. Men of moderate means could not bear the expense of elections and even men of good means were crippled by it. The origin of this abuse was to be sought in official interference. This had been frequent, and now it had taken the form of secret purchase of votes. The only way to correct this was to abolish the system of large constituencies and the system of unsigned ballots. The Japanese people had made great progress in ability and knowledge but they were still very defective in a sense of public morality. To educate the latter signed ballots would be a partially effective instrument. Considering the whole post-bellum situation there were many causes for rejoicing but there were also causes for lamentation. For example, the budget now elaborated showed that the national finance was on a very unstable basis. It was a question whether with such a system the post-bellum enterprises could be carried out. The budget abounded in continuing expenditures but did not show any definite totals. It would be the business of the House of Representatives to ascertain if possible what were the limits of the responsibilities to which the State thus committed itself. It appeared that there was a deficit of 80 million yen on the side of revenue in spite of continuing the war taxes. Germany with a debt of only 1,700 million yen was much perturbed by finding a deficiency of 20 or 30 million yen in her revenue, but Japan with a debt verging on 2,400 millions and a revenue not even half of that of Germany, seemed quite complacent in the face of a deficit of 80 millions. The fact was that the people had become accustomed during the war to talk and think in hundreds of millions, and to take an over liberal view of financial questions generally. The speaker did not intend these remarks to be interpreted in the sense of insisting on a reduction of the budget. He merely desired to suggest that room for retrenchment existed. The war taxes would have to be continued, and therefore the methods of taxation became a question of prime importance. This concerned the people's means of livelihood. The Government expressed apprehension of the growth of socialism, but all experience showed that socialism had its origin in heavy taxes. It was from that source that discontent sprang. Criticisms of this kind had been silenced during the war since they would have suggested false impressions to the enemy, but the time had now come to lay aside reticence and to consider seriously what taxes were to be permanent. The policy must be to increase the revenue on the one hand and to abolish injurious taxes on the other. There was no reason to attach any moment to pessimistic predictions that in a few years the country would be bankrupt and that by 1909 the era of inconvertible currency would re-open. But they could not close their eyes to the fact that the prices of commodities were rising and the purchasing power of money declining. It might very well be that the country would see its first socialists arise not in the ranks of the common people but in those of petty officials and other persons with fixed incomes who found their revenues quite inadequate to defray the present cost of living. If it were asked why this appreciation of commodities had taken place, he would have no hesitation in replying "because of defective finance." One serious mistake in financial policy might throw the country into a panic. They had an example of that in the case of even such a country as England where, in the sequel of a great war, the central bank had suspended the issue of notes. One effect of a war was to scatter great quantities of money among the people and so long as this unusual store of cash lasted, the naturally impoverishing consequences of war were not felt. But time must remove this alleviating factor and then trouble became inevitable. The people, it was true, did not actually utter any complaints, but it might be alleged with assurance that they looked confidently to the Diet to do something for them this session. They would soon have an opportunity of seeing an official version of the budget. Doubtless the first question to arise would have reference to the appropriation of 110 million yen for the service of the national debt. The actual interest on the war debt did not exceed 50 or 60 millions. What then was to be done with the surplus—the difference between 110 millions and 60 millions? It appeared that some 80 millions were to be obtained under another heading by domestic loans, and thus they had this strange method of financing that debts were defrayed with one hand and incurred with the other. If, on the contrary, the surplus was to accumulate for the purpose of forming a reserve to increase the country's credit, a grave and dangerous blunder would be committed. Fifty or sixty million yen would suffice to dispense with many obnoxious taxes, or would reduce by more than one half the 80 millions that had to be raised, and further, out of a budget of 500 million yen, it should not be impossible to make a reduction of 10 or 20 millions. He greatly regretted that the Saionji Cabinet seemed disposed to follow in the footsteps of its predecessor. Probably the truth was that the new Ministry had not time to re-draft the budget. The investigation committee of the Seiyu-kai had pronounced against this excessive appropriation of 110 millions, and therefore if the question were raised in the Diet, the Seiyu-kai would probably support the policy of alteration. It was a question that concerned all, irrespective of parties. Passing to the problem of administrative reform, the Count noted that it was dictated not merely by financial considerations but also by administrative expediency. A domestic debt of 480 millions had been incurred during the war and something like 100 millions were now to be added to it. No principle of justice was consulted when the people alone were burdened without the Government bearing its share. The Seiyu-kai themselves had always advocated reform of the present system of bloated bureaucracies and doubtless they would now do something conclusive. Referring to the formula so often on men's lips, "a united nation," the Count denounced it as meaningless from an official point of view. A united nation meant merely a patriotic and loyal nation. It had nothing to do with the Government, whose sole duty was to adopt methods of increasing the people's prosperity. What they had to consider was the real character of those methods quite apart from any deceptive euphemisms. Already voices of disappointment had been raised against the Saionji Cabinet, but Count Okuma was not disappointed. The Cabinet was still on trial, and Marquis Saionji was a man of progressive ideas who respected virtue, did not pay court to power and had ample administrative talents. Marquis Saionji and the Count were of the same way of thinking in political matters and the speaker did not doubt that the Marquis would act up to his convictions. There would be time enough to oppose him when he departed from them. Some people alleged that the Progressists had been deceived by the Seiyu-kai. It was for the Seiyu-kai to consider whether deception paid or did not pay. The Progressists would pursue their path sincerely and unflinchingly.

The manifesto of the Party, which was adopted unanimously by the meeting, sets out by recognizing the enlargement that the country's arms have undergone in consequence of victory in war, alludes to the undertakings at home and abroad that await the nation, and declares that the Progressists, confronted by this new situation, will, with due regard to the state of foreign Powers and with careful consideration for the country's resources, regulate the rate of procedure and seize the fitting occasions, so as to place the Empire on a basis of perennial prosperity. Having made this general exordium, the document proceeds to particularize as follows:—

1.—In addition to incurring the heavy responsibility of preserving the peace of the Far East in accordance with the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and of maintaining the integrity of distant China and India, the Empire has extended its protection to Korea, has obtained the lease of the Liaotung Peninsula and other matters in Manchuria. To consummate these rights and privileges it is necessary that the policy should be adopted, abroad, of placing Manchuria and Korea in a state of defence, and, at home, of regulating the Army and Navy and increasing them in proportion to the nation's resources.

2.—The expenses connected with the defences of Manchuria and Korea as well as with various other undertakings have greatly augmented the burdens that the people have to bear. It is therefore necessary that business enterprises should be encouraged so as to assist the national economy. Especially must the administration of Korea be reformed, its finances adjusted, and plans adopted for meeting the outlays needed in connexion with the functions of protection, to the mutual advantage of both sides.

3.—A result of the war has been to suddenly increase the national debt and double the taxes, thus disturbing the finances and the economy. Steps of adjustment should be quickly taken, the system of taxation should be amended and the balance of incomes and outgoings should be restored, so that the Empire's financial credit at home and abroad may be strengthened. Above all, accompanying and in accordance with the development of the country's prestige, every device for encouraging domestic production must be perfected, and all suitable methods for increasing foreign trade must be adopted, so as to promote the growth of the national economy.

4.—Administrative reform has been a standing problem for many years, but no signs of its accomplishment are yet visible. Complication of laws has become a disease of the Empire's administration, alike in the localities and at the centre, and there is no limit to the multiplicity and confusion of regulations. Nothing is more pressing than to accomplish unifications of official procedure and utilization of the services of officials, such a reform being needed not only for its own sake but also because it greatly affects the adjustment of the finances and the development of economy. Administrative reform must therefore be enforced by all means.

5.—The chivalrous service of a united nation has been a principal cause of the great achievement of crushing a powerful enemy and to this gift of the constitutional system we owe it that every individual of the nation recognises his responsibility to assist the State in its time of stress. Therefore in order to promote the future large development of the Empire, the franchise must be extended.

6.—With the object of pensioning or succouring men rendered cripples by the war or the families of those killed in battle or who died of disease, the present system must be amended so as duly to recognise their services.

7.—Simultaneously with extending education and promoting learning there is need of reforming the existing system of instruction. Especially must choice be made of essential branches of learning; the period of study should be shortened and the courses in practical specialities extended so as to conform with actual needs.

8.—To establish the security of the individual's rights conferred by the Constitution the responsibility of administrative officials and their control must be strictly enforced so as to prevent all display of arbitrariness.

The manifesto concludes with a declaration that the time calls urgently for these reforms and that the Progressists intend to labour earnestly for their accomplishment.

GENERAL KAWAMURA.

It is now evident that the Army of General Kawamura, which attacked the extreme Russian left in the Battle of Mukden consisted of two Divisions, the Kwanto Kobi (second reserves of the Tokyo region) and the Eleventh. This is a very interesting feature. General Kawamura—then a Lieut-General—landed originally at Takushan in command of the Tenth (Himeji) Division. His function was evidently limited to preserving communications between the First Army under General Kuroki, which was marching northward on the right, and the Second Army under General Oku which was advancing on the left. This function was successfully discharged and presently the Fifth Division was added to the Tenth, so as to form the Fourth Army of which General Nozu took command. This disposition of forces continued until the fall of Port Arthur, Lieutenant-General Kawamura remaining in command of the Tenth Division at the battle of Liaoyang and in subsequent operations until the month of January, 1905.

Then suddenly Kawamura disappeared from the field and nothing was heard of him for some time, until, on the very eve of the Battle of Mukden, he was found operating against the Russian left. Even then the general public knew nothing of the manner in which Kawamura's army had been placed in such a position or of its composition. These points are made clear now for the first time. Kawamura's Army consisted—as stated above—of two Divisions, the Eleventh and the Kwanto Reserves. The Eleventh had been engaged in the siege of Port Arthur, but immediately after the fall of that fortress the Division was marched up the Liaotung Peninsula and then deflected eastward across southern Manchuria so that it finally emerged on the extreme right of the Japanese line. Meanwhile the Kwanto Reserves had been landed in northern Korea and moved up the left bank of the Yalu.

Crossing that river's upper waters, the Division headed north-west through the mountains and finally joined hands with the Eleventh which had approached by crossing southern Manchuria. These movements seem to have completely bewildered Kuropatkin. He calculated that the Port Arthur Army would be brought into the field of action in central Manchuria without delay, and since the natural line of operations for that Army would have been to advance up the railway and manœuvre on the Russian right, Kuropatkin anticipated that it would adopt the opposite course and that, moving eastward from the Liaotung Peninsula, it would be thrown against his own left. This anticipation was confirmed when his spies brought him news that a large Japanese force was crossing Manchuria from Liaotung in a north-easterly direction. He immediately identified this force as the Port Arthur Army and made his own dispositions to repel the turning assault which thus appeared about to be delivered from the Fushun direction. But in fact the Eleventh Division was on its way to join the Kwanto Reserves, and to form with the latter a new Army, strong enough to seriously menace the Russian left, but quite independent of the Port Arthur Army which, under Nogi, was held in the leash to be slipped against Kuropatkin's right at the psychological moment. It sounds almost incredible that these big bodies of troops should be manœuvred so as to deceive the enemy as to their purpose, but the feat was performed by the Japanese in Manchuria, and it certainly proved the means of winning one of the greatest fights in the history of the world, the Battle of Mukden. General Kawamura made his official entry into Tokyo on the morning of the 20th. He was received in the usual manner, and the crowds which assembled to welcome him showed as much enthusiasm as they had evinced on any previous occasion. General Kawamura is the youngest among the full Generals, and his career is expected to carry him far.

SENDAI FAMINE FUND.

Terrible telegrams come from Fukushima Prefecture describing the effects of the famine there. Various public works have been started to relieve the distress, but of course this method of aid does not reach all sections of the population, and people are said to be dying of cold and starvation. Recent snow-falls have greatly augmented the distress. At the elementary schools little children fight fiercely for one another's food, and many men are resorting to robbery in preference to dying helplessly. These messages indicate a shocking state of affairs. They show that while many among us have been doubting the trustworthiness of evidence collected and laid before us assiduously by charitable missionaries, the unhappy people are perishing miserably.

A telegram to the Yorozu says that owing to the insufficient rice crop, the villagers of Nikawa, in Toyama prefecture, are suffering from a famine and are in a distressing state. There was no crop over an area of 350 cho r (cho, about acres  $2\frac{1}{2}$ ) in the district of Kami-Niikawa, and over an area of 260 cho in the district of Naka-Niikawa.

POLITICAL PARTIES.

The House of Representatives meets on the 22nd but it will not proceed at once to any legislative business as certain steps of organization have to be taken, namely, the elections of a President and of the Standing Committees. We explained in our last issue that the composition of the Standing Committees had been a topic of indirect discussion, and that it would depend on the attitude of the parties towards each other. If the Seiyu-kai and Progressists combined as in recent sessions, then the Standing Committees would be nominated solely from their ranks; if the Seiyu-kai and the Daido Club combined to the exclusion of the Progressists, then these last would find no place on the Committees. And if, finally, all three combined, then the Committees would be composed of representatives from all, the numbers being proportionate to the respective strengths of the parties. This last method has been taken and we learn incidentally that the forces which the various parties can muster in the House are as follows:—

Seiyu-kai .....	145
Progressists .....	98
Daido Club .....	75
Seiko Club .....	36

379

Still another question has arisen, namely, whether any representation shall be extended to the Unattached. If they be regarded as a distinct section of the House, entitled to the same consideration as that extended to a duly constituted party, the following will be the composition of the Committees:—

	Seiyu-kai	Progressists	Daido	Seiko	Unattached	Totals
Budget Committee .....	24	16	13	6	4	63
Settled Accounts .....	17	12	9	4	3	45
Disciplinary .....	10	7	5	3	2	27
Petitions .....	17	12	9	4	3	45

If, on the other hand no recognition be extended to the Unattached, then the figures will stand thus:—

	Seiyu-kai	Progressists	Daido	Seiko	Totals
Budget .....	26	18	13	6	63
Settled Accounts .....	18	13	10	4	45
Disciplinary .....	11	7	6	3	27
Petitions .....	18	13	10	4	45

It is evident that in neither case do the Seiyu-kai possess a working majority in any of the Committees: they must depend upon the support of either the Daido Club or the Progressists, and if these two latter are from the outset disposed to disagree with one another they may at any moment be found in different camps with regard to special issues. The Seiyu-kai, however, and therefore, the Ministry, seem safe in any case, for the only contingency that could embarrass them would be the extremely unlikely one of a coalition between the Progressists and the Daido Club for purposes of opposition.

The Kokumin writes as though the outcome of these arrangements had been a definite split between the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists, the latter's view having been that the former should have made a definite choice between the Progressists and the Daido Club instead of opening its arms to both. That is certainly a not unnatural view, but although it is attributed to Mr. Oishi Masami, his associate in the leadership of the Progressists, namely, Mr. Inukai Ki, is credited with much gentler opinions and with having declared that the entente between the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists will continue as before. These doubts will probably be dispelled at the meetings which the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists are to hold on the 20th by way of preface to the opening of the Diet on Monday. Meanwhile we notice that the Jiji Shimpō attributes pacific intentions to the Progressists during the present session at all events. As time goes by, however, causes of dissension will doubtless arise and they will find the Progressists not unwilling to take advantage of them. That, it seems to us, is a foregone conclusion. The Progressists are not destined merely to play in a Seiyu-kai orchestra: they must perform a tune of their own sooner or later. The party which has made most substantial use of the situation is the Daido Club. It evidently holds the balance of power. Whether the Seiyu-kai or the Progressists be in power, they must secure the Daido alliance in order to command a majority in the Lower House.

Although Count Okuma's remarkable speech at the general meeting of his Party embodied remarks which suggested a disposition to fall out with the Seiyu-kai, there are as yet no public evidences of such a division. The newspapers which might have been expected to echo the feeling if it existed adopt a tone of obvious circumspection, and it seems safe to infer that although some special measure may at any moment create friction if not an actual collision, the general endeavour at first will be to work smoothly and harmoniously. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun has a powerful article on the importance of the four ideographs kyo-koku-it-chi, which, according to our contemporary, have not yet fulfilled their functions by any means, being just as necessary in this post-bellum period as they were during the war. The Nichi Nichi, we may mention en passant, is the subject of an amusing cartoon in the Tokyo Puck. The picture represents the editor of the Kokumin Shimbun in the form of a dog returning to his box and finding, to his consternation, that it has been occupied in his absence by the editor of the Nichi Nichi. This illustrates the quaint shibboleth of a certain class of publicists, namely, that to support the views of the statesmen in power is servile, to oppose them heroic.

The Kokumin Club (People's Club) held a meeting on the 21st under the auspices of Messrs. Kono Hironaka, Otake Kanichi, Yamada Kinosuke and others, one of whose distinctions is that the greater part of them are undergoing trial on a charge of having incited the riots of last September. A very strongly worded manifesto and a comprehensive resolution were unanimously passed, heaping reproaches on the head of the Katsura Cabinet and constituting the Kokumin Club overseer of the doings of the present Ministry.

THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

Prince Tsai and his party arrived in Tokyo on the 22nd by the 9.30 a.m. train. The Nichi Nichi welcomed them with an article which, while rejoicing that China seems to have awaked to the value of Western civilization and to the importance of friendship with her eastern neighbour, notes that the conflict between the new and the old is at its height just now in China and that any precipitate attempt to force theories of European administration upon the people of the Middle Kingdom would probably result in disaster. The China of to-day may be said to be much in the position that Japan occupied when the Iwakura Mission sailed for Europe more than thirty years ago, and if Prince Tsai can learn what factors operated to produce in Japan the results we now see, and can put those factors into activity in his own country, he will have achieved a memorable feat without counselling any heroic measures. The Nippon, however, is disposed to doubt whether the Embassy can accomplish much in the brief time at its disposal. At all events the fact that China must introduce reforms is unquestionable, and the fact that she is about to do so just at the time when Russia has turned her face in the same direction, is a remarkable coincidence. As between the two countries the Nippon thinks that China's task is much the easier, for her people from time immemorial have busied themselves with problems of statesmanship and administration, so that the mind of the nation is already prepared and the machinery of constitutional government can readily be organized.

The Yomiuri, however, takes a very pessimistic view of China's future. She is totally wanting in the first essential of national reform, a fixed policy. Her people are divided into numerous parties each swayed by its own wind of doctrine, and her statesmen are undetermined whether to rely on Russia, or on Japan, or on the mutual rivalry of Western States, but as to relying on themselves and their country, that elementary principle of strong independence does not seem to be familiar to them.

Admiral Togo went to Shinbashi to meet Prince Tsai, who arrived at 9.45 a.m. on the 22nd instant. Mr. Yang, the Chinese Representative in Tokyo, introduced the illustrious Admiral to Prince Tsai, who seemed much impressed by the meeting and declared himself fully sensible of the honour of being welcomed by such a distinguished officer. The Prince repaired immediately to the Shiba Detached Palace where he and his immediate suite will be accommodated during their sojourn in Tokyo. It is stated that the Emperor will receive Prince Tsai on the 25th instant at noon.

RUSSIAN PRISONERS.

Saturday, January 20.

A dangerous state of affairs exists at Nagasaki. Seventeen hundred Russian prisoners were carried thither from Kokura, Fukuoka and other places, but on arrival it was found that the Russian authorities had not yet provided transports. The men had to be distributed among some thirty private houses in Inasa, where they are guarded by a detachment of 90 Japanese soldiers and some police and gendarmes. Every effort is made to prevent them from obtaining supplies of liquor, but how long this restriction will prove effective no one can tell, and there are said to be serious apprehensions that trouble may occur.

Sunday, January 21.

It appears that the unexpected detention of some 1,700 Russian prisoners at Nagasaki is due to the desire of the Russian Authorities to segregate the naval and the military men. Then while the embarkation of the naval prisoners is proceeding without interruption, these 1,700 soldiers are left in charge of the Japanese on shore. The Asahi Shimbun justly observes that the Russian prisoners are a troublesome lot.

SHANGHAI CORRESPONDENCE IN "THE TIMES."

Telegraphing under date of December 10th, that is to say, before the Mixed-Court riot occurred, the Shanghai correspondence of The Times gave a long and interesting account of the manifestations of a new spirit in China and appended an analysis of its causes. Among these causes one is said to be "the influence throughout the provinces of large numbers of half-educated students, who have returned from Tokyo imbued with the idea that China is capable forthwith of following the example of Japan. These students, proclaiming crude ideas of China's sovereign rights, and urging the abolition of extra-territoriality, impose their views on the ignorant officials and gentry. Their influence, moreover, obtains additional weight from the presence in the provincial yamens of numerous Japanese advisers and instructors." The last part of the statement is somewhat obscure, but it unquestionably reads as an allegation that the numerous Japanese advisers and instructors in the provincial yamens lend weight to the anti-foreign propaganda of the returned students, and a casual reader of the passage would at once conclude that the Japanese are accused of being sympathetic towards such a propaganda. We can not think that such was the correspondent's intention in drafting the telegram. His meaning, as we interpret it, is that the average Chinaman, observing the important positions assigned to many Japanese subjects in his country, attaches vicarious credit to the doctrines enunciated by Chinese students who have received instruction in Japan. The correspondent's object was probably to draw attention to the special responsibility attaching to Japan, in his opinion, on account of her special influence in China. This is a sufficiently legitimate line of reasoning, whereas it would have been at once unreasonable and untrue to hint that the Japanese employees of China lend themselves directly or indirectly to promote an anti-foreign spirit.

There are one or two points to which it may be profitable to draw attention in this context. The first is that whatever may have been the Shanghai correspondent's intention he certainly succeeded in conveying the impression that Japanese residents in Shanghai took an active part in the riots resulting from the Mixed-Court affair. But we have not been able to gather that he possessed any evidence warranting such an accusation. His information appears to have been that in some cases Japanese were seen fraternizing with the mob, which is an altogether different thing from joining in the mob's riotous proceedings. Several foreigners fraternized with the Japanese mob in the Tokyo riots of last September but they took no part in the disturbance, and inasmuch as in nearly all riots the mob comprises a majority of peaceful, law-abiding citizens, the fact that a man is seen mingling freely with the mob has little if any significance. Such an incident, even though it were proved, which in this case seems doubtful, does not constitute any valid ground for an accusation of criminal participation.

The second point is that the Shanghai correspondent, in his telegram of December 10th to The Times, wired:—"Other causes contributing to the confidence with which this (anti-foreign) spirit is manifested lie, first, in the Peking Government's assumption that the Anglo-Japanese alliance guarantees the integrity of Chinese territory, come what may." In other words, China, believing in British benevolent tutelage as guaranteeing her against the effects of misconduct, proceeds to make Great Britain the corpus vile of such misconduct. That is what it comes to, for Great Britain's interests in the Middle Kingdom outweigh the interests of all other Powers, and therefore she would be the principal sufferer by any insurrection against foreigners. Of that fact China is perfectly cognizant; she has had it engraven upon her mind by many drastic lessons. Relying, then, on Great Britain's protection the Chinese assail this same Great Britain. Such is the paradox presented to us. Besides, if the Peking Government attach such credit to one part of the alliance, it must necessarily attach credit to every part. Therefore it must believe that Great Britain and Japan intend to maintain in China the open door and equal opportunities. But if that be credited in Peking, how can it possibly be imagined that a revolt having for object the expulsion of foreigners, or, at any rate, their deprivation of all privileges, would be condoned by Great Britain and Japan? We are not arguing against the growth of a very troublesome and dangerous spirit in China. That is only too evident. But we do contend that the Anglo-Japanese alliance can not possibly be assigned as a cause of it.

The Times, commenting on the telegram referred to above, says:—

That the defeat of the European Power, which had so long overawed China, at the hands of an Oriental nation numerically very inferior to the Chinese would necessarily exercise a powerful influence over the minds of the latter has, of course, been foreseen. It has led to all sorts of hasty generalizations in Europe not all of which have been untainted by political considerations, and amongst them to the bold prophecy that our old friend the "Yellow Peril" would presently appear to an astonished world in the garb of a regenerate and militant Middle Kingdom. Some of the prophets may perhaps imagine that they discern the first steps to fulfilment of their foreboding in the movement which our Correspondent describes. We shall believe it, when we perceive any tangible proofs that the Chinese possess the qualities of mind, and still more the features of character, to which alone must be attributed the unparalleled revolution by which Japan has risen to her proud place amongst the nations. So far there is not much evidence which points in that direction. Of a truer appreciation of China's military and material weakness, of a new consciousness of ignorance, and of a new readiness to learn, some signs, it is said, have been visible for the last two or three years even in high official circles at Peking. But of the moral revolution, without which all other changes are futile, we have not yet heard that many symptoms exist. Until they become abundant, the notion that China is ready and willing to walk in the footsteps of Japan, may be left to the half-educated students, who have returned from Tokyo, and who, it seems, are propagating this view with the confidence of youth and of half-education combined. A test of their common sense is afforded by the demand which they make for the abolition of extra-territoriality in China. When Chinese jurisprudence and Chinese Judges have risen to the level which was attained in Japan when first she demanded that right, the Powers will no doubt be ready to extend it to China. That happy day seems at present to be sufficiently remote. The reform movement itself, though it may command the support of some genuine patriots, is mixed up already with pecuniary projects of the usual Chinese pattern. The local gentry and the provincial officials have laid their heads together and have decided that, when they have got rid of the foreign concessionnaires, they will take in hand all manner of wild schemes themselves. They are already deep in plans for the exploitation of railways—to be built on the Chinese model—and of mining enterprises—under purely native control. By way of preliminary the promoters are busy organizing bureaux, which our Correspondent tersely characterizes as "of the usual corrupt type"—but that, of course, is not peculiar to China.

But the triumph of Japan is not, according to our Correspondent, the sole cause of this curious movement. There are subsidiary causes of different degrees of importance. The conciliatory spirit in which the Government of the United States has met the recent "boycott" is said to have been misunderstood and to have fostered the natural arrogance of an ignorant Oriental race. The presence of Japanese advisers and instructors in many provincial yamens is stated to have been another cause, and the withdrawal of the China squadron a fourth. The Chinese are still in that stage of civilization when a menace ceases to be formidable once it is out of sight. There is yet one reason more for the new attitude of the Central Government. It boldly assumes that the Anglo-Japanese Agreement guarantees the integrity of the Chinese Empire in all circumstances and conditions, and it takes courage from this assumption to treat foreigners in a fashion in which it has not ventured to indulge for many years gone by. The action of the Shanghai Taotai in defying the order of the British assessor in the Mixed Court last Friday, and in inciting his runners to rescue the prisoners from the municipal police, is a significant instance of how far this spirit has gone and to what dangerous complications it may lead, if not promptly and firmly dealt with. Happily the Anglo-Japanese Treaty appears to provide very completely for the situation. One of its objects, as stated in the preamble, is the preservation of the common interests of all Powers in China, not only by ensuring the integrity and independence of that empire, but also by preserving the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations. Its first article lays down that whenever any of the rights and interests named in the preamble are in jeopardy, the two signatory Powers will communicate with each other fully and frankly, and will consider in common the measures which should be taken. We do not know that much in the shape of measures is necessary in the present case. But it seems desirable that England and Japan should join in watching and discussing the development of this new spirit in China, and in keeping it within bounds.

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

The committee appointed to receive H.R.H. Prince Arthur of Connaught are Admiral Togo, General Kuroki, Vice-Admiral Ijuin, Mr. Nagasaki Seigo, Major-General Fukushima, Captain Takarabe (of the Navy), Colonel Utsunomiya (of the Army), and Messrs. Watanabe and Asano of the Imperial Chamberlains' Department.

The leading Japanese business-men of Tokyo held a meeting in the Bankers Club on the 23rd instant to discuss what steps should be taken by the city for the purpose of welcoming Prince Arthur of Connaught. A final decision was not reached on that day and another meeting was set for the 24th.

In connexion with this subject the time seems to have come when the British non-official residents of Tokyo should discuss their plans for welcoming the Royal visitor. An entertainment in the form of a banquet or a ball appears to be out of the question, not only because of the very limited number of the community, but also because the Prince's programme during his short stay in Tokyo will not afford any latitude for such a purpose. Nothing seems possible except the presentation of an address, and perhaps it may be thought that one ceremony of that kind would suffice; in other words, that the Tokyo residents should associate with their Yokohama fellow-countrymen in assembling on the wharf to receive the Prince. Whatever course be deemed best, it would appear that some steps should be taken to discuss the matter while there is yet time to give effect to any independent resolve.

Mr. Takahira, Japanese representative in Washington, who is now on a visit to Tokyo, and Count Terashima, Private Secretary of the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, have been appointed members of the Committee for the reception of Prince Arthur of Connaught.

The net profit of the Yokohama Electric Light Co. for the last half of 1905 is yen 68,779.57, and the interim dividend is fixed at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum.

KOREA.

Saturday, January 20.

A Korean official of Chinju seems to have conceived a large plan of plunder. He organized a party to waylay the Government tax-collectors who were conveying a sum of half a million yen to Seoul. This official, Hin Yong-son, had arranged to escape with his plunder to China, but he was captured flagrante delictis.

The Il Chung-hoi appear to be losing caste, though whether the fact is due to their own misdeeds or to the lawlessness of men who pretend to be affiliated with them, it is not clear. Complaints are said to be coming from many districts that they are robbing and assaulting freely.

A Seoul telegram says that the Government is resorting to extreme measures for the purpose of enforcing the sumptuary law recently issued against the wearing of white garments. Any one found to be thus habited is seized, and the police inscribe upon his snow-white coat in large black letters the legend "blue colour." This process is said to have converted into consternation and mourning the rejoicings usual at the New Year season.

Sunday, January 21.

The French Representative closed his Legation and left Seoul on the 20th instant.

General Hasegawa is to discharge the functions of Resident-General from the 1st of next month, pending the arrival of Marquis Ito.

Friday, January 26.

The Minister of the Household in Seoul has resigned his post, alleging for reason that the funds available for meeting the expenses of the Department at the New Year are quite inadequate, and that the Finance Department, having already lent money in anticipation of incoming revenue, refuses to entertain any further appeals. It is stated that the real source of difficulty is to be sought in the enormous personnel of the Household Department. No less than 5,600 officials or parasites of various kinds have to be provided for, and the privy purse's capacities have not kept pace with the growth of this flagrant abuse.

The leading Japanese residents of Seoul, to the number of 84, gave a farewell banquet on the 23rd instant in honour of Mr. Hayashi, who leaves his Korean post with the highest reputation. Mr. Hayashi has presided over the Japanese Legation in Seoul throughout a long period marked almost continuously by grave diplomatic perplexities, and not a single mistake is known to disfigure his record. That is a signal achievement, and it will doubtless receive due recognition at the hands of his Government.

It is stated that in consequence of the new sumptuary regulations a great demand for coloured kanakin has sprung up in Seoul, and the Korean women are taking largely to wearing goods of Japanese manufacture.

The man who threw a stone at Marquis Ito and struck him in the face, has been released from confinement at the expiration of the lenient sentence pronounced on him by the desire of the Marquis. We may mention that the so-called "stone" would be more accurately described as a chunk of granite. Several other persons connected with recent demonstrations, including the editor of the Kojo Shimpō, have also been set at liberty.

Mr. Maruyama, the Japanese adviser of the Police Department in Korea, has just inspected three prisons under the Chemulpo jurisdiction. He reports that the 25 prisoners detained in these places have only one garment, in spite of the bitter cold; that they have no sleeping furniture, and that they receive but one meal a day. Mr. Maruyama describes their condition as most pitiable. He adds that among these prisoners there are some who have been 10 years in confinement without judgment being definitely pronounced on them, their offense being that they sold land to Japanese subjects. Mr. Maruyama obtained the immediate release of 3 men, and has drawn up a very strongly-worded report.

THE MONEY MARKET.

Some alarm appears to be felt about the probable effects of the Government's scheme for redeeming 100 million yen worth of 6 per cent. domestic loan bonds between May 16th and August 25th, a period of only a little over 3 months. Already the market is said to be overstocked with money for which there is no demand, and the apprehension is that if a further sum of 100 millions be suddenly added there may spring up a feverish desire to find investments, with the result that reckless enterprises will be floated and perilous speculations encouraged. The Nichi Nichi Shinbun is evidently disposed to take that view, and it accordingly advises the Treasury to change the order of its procedure in the sense of postponing the redemption of these six-per cent. bonds until the domestic loan which forms part of the new financial programme has been subscribed. On the other hand, the Treasury doubtless reckons that its loan will command better terms if it is issued subsequently to the redemption operation as the market should then be eminently favourable. It is too late now to raise this question for the scheme of redemption has been officially announced with Imperial sanction and the first drawing of bonds to be redeemed takes place in less than a month. But later on there will be another operation of redemption involving a like amount, and the Government may be disposed to put off the latter until the final installment of the war loans has been floated. A small per-centage becomes important when the principal is counted by tens of millions, and consequently the terms likely to be obtained when the domestic loan is floated may be a matter of much consideration to the Minister of Finance. But for our own part we do not see either that the order of procedure in this case is of great moment or that the redemption of the six-per-cent. bonds is likely to surfeit the market. It has to be remembered that the progress of loading up the domestic money market may be said to have been going on almost continuously ever since the spring of 1904. The 480 millions of yen borrowed at home and expended on account of the war did not all leave the country by any means. The calculations are that not more than 30 per cent. went abroad; namely a total of about 145 to 150 millions. At the same time 820 millions were borrowed in the Occident, and of that total some 70 per cent., or 575 millions came to Japan. Thus the nett result was that the domestic money market received an amount of from 425 to 430 million yen. It is still carrying that sum and we can not wonder that money is easy. The Government now contemplates two operations: one is to redeem, within the next 14 or 15 months, 200 million yen worth of six per cent domestic bonds and to float 230 millions of new five-per-cent. bonds. Will there be any appreciable difference so far as the market is concerned whether the former transaction precedes or succeeds the latter? And if the addition of over 400 millions of yen to the nation's stock of floating capital has not caused any tendency to engage in speculative enterprises, is that evil result likely to be precipitated by operations which, in the course of the next fiscal year, will end in the nett withdrawal of 30 millions from the market?

THE LOSS OF THE "AQUIDABAN."

The old Brazilian turret-ship Aquidaban has gone to the bottom in a sensational fashion and this time there seems no hope of resurrection. In 1894 this vessel, during one of the Brazilian revolutions, was attacked in St. Catherine's Bay by the sea-going torpedo-boat Gustave Sempao which, after missing with three torpedoes, hit the iron-clad on the port bow with a fourth causing such damage that the Aquidaban was at once abandoned by her crew. In the hands of her captors, however, she was able to reach Rio de Janeiro with her two forward compartments full of water. There her name was changed to the 24 de Maio, and having been temporarily patched up she was sent to Stettin for reconstruction. This work was completed in 1896 and the vessel resumed her place in the navy list under her original name.

The Aquidaban, built at Poplar in 1885, was of steel, sheathed and coppered; she had two screws, two turrets in echelon, one funnel and two military masts. Her length was 280 feet, her beam 52 feet and her maximum draught 20½ feet. She displaced 4,950 tons and had a paper speed of over 15 knots though really steaming only 10. Her engines were 3-cylinder, compound, by Humphrys and Tennant. She had a compound belt of armour 7 feet wide and 7 to 11 inches thick, had 10 inches protection on her turrets and 2 inch deck-plating. As to her armament Brassey retains her four 9.4 and four 5.5-in. batteries while Jane gives her four 8-in. and four 4.7-in., both calibres quick-firers.

GENERAL NOGI AND THE STAFF OF THE THIRD ARMY.

On the 20th instant the official dispersal of the Staff of the Third Army took place. General Nogi, in addressing the officers whom he had commanded for 19 months, alluded to the great hardships they had undergone; thanked them heartily for the gallant and loyal assistance they had rendered, which had enabled him to discharge duties all too heavy for his inferior capacity, and expressed the earnest hope that although they were now to part and although they were each to resign their special functions, they would always remember the events of their united service and would hold themselves in readiness to stand forth at any moment in behalf of their country.

Major-General Ichinohe, speaking on behalf of the officers and men, alluded to the qualities which had won for General Nogi the respect and affection of every one serving under him, and had been chiefly responsible for the successes in which his staff had enjoyed the honour of participating.

THE SEOUL STORIES.

We take the following from an American exchange:—

Washington, December 28.

In a private letter to a friend in this city Durham White Stevens, diplomatic adviser to the Korean Government, comments as follows upon recent reports that the treaty establishing a Japanese protectorate was extorted by force. He says many false reports have been circulated, and then says:

"Marquis Ito came from Tokyo with an autograph letter to the Emperor of Korea from the Emperor of Japan. This letter inclosed a hope for a closer union between the two countries. Its tone and purport were well calculated to demonstrate Japan's friendly intentions and to soothe Korean susceptibilities. The choice of an envoy, moreover, was decidedly happy, as Marquis Ito is especially persona grata to the Emperor of Korea. He came here on a somewhat similar mission at the beginning of the war, and several times since to my personal knowledge has been urgently requested by the Emperor to repeat the visit. His reputation for fair dealing and considerate regard for Korean rights had earned him a high place in the Emperor's estimation.

On this occasion he presented the autograph letter at a formal audience, and several days later had a private audience of over four hours' duration. He explained the situation and Japan's wishes fully to the Emperor, and the latter agreed in principle to the propositions which the Marquis stated would be formally submitted later on by the Japanese Minister. The Emperor stated that the decision regarding the details of the new arrangement would be left to his Cabinet, and gave orders that the latter should consult with the Japanese Minister.

"Conferences then ensued between the Minister and the Cabinet, the last one by mutual agreement and in accordance with the Emperor's order taking place at the Palace. All of the Cabinet Ministers came to this meeting, in accordance with the prearranged plan, and there were no soldiers present except Korean soldiers forming the Palace Guard. The Japanese Minister, with his secretaries and interpreters, attended, and there was a full and frank discussion of all of the details of the proposed treaty. Ultimately Marquis Ito was asked to attend, and he came, accompanied by General Hasegawa, but unattended by any soldiers save the small bodyguard of a half dozen gendarmes who go about with him everywhere in Seoul.

"The discussion then proceeded for several hours; amendments were proposed by the Korean Cabinet and accepted, and finally the amended form was agreed to by a majority of six out of eight members of the Cabinet. Thereupon the treaty was signed and sealed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs in conformity with the direct order of the Emperor. During all these proceedings there was no show of force and no unseemly exhibition of any kind whatever. The Emperor was not personally present during the conference, but, as is the custom, remained in his private rooms, whence he communicated his wishes through the Minister of the Household or by one or another of the Ministers summoned to his presence from time to time.

"Perhaps the fact that at Marquis Ito's farewell audience this afternoon the Emperor earnestly requested him to defer his departure, which the Marquis has consented to do, somewhat against his own wishes, as I happen to know, is the best commentary one could make upon these alleged outrages upon the Emperor and his Cabinet.

"The alleged rape of the seal belongs to the same mythical category as the other stories. It was brought to the palace from the Foreign Office, where it is kept by the clerk who has custody of it, in obedience to the order given personally by the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

"I have inflicted a much longer letter upon you than I intended, but only because I desired you to know my views regarding what seems to me a deliberate attempt to put Japan in a false position. Of course, there was opposition in Korea to the treaty; it would be foolish to deny that fact. But there is no such thing as popular opposition in the sense in which we understand the word in America. There is opposition among the official classes, a great deal of it; honest opposition, with which we can sympathize, although we know them to be mistaken.

"From the Japanese standpoint some greater measure of control over Korean affairs was imperatively necessary. Hers is the responsibility of introducing and enforcing reforms and of doing all those things for Korea's good which her own rulers have seemed unable to accomplish. It is not a task which Japan has undertaken willingly, but solely because she has been forced to it. But having undertaken it, and having assumed the responsibility, it seems to me that of right, as well as of necessity, she is entitled to possess the means for doing those things which the world expects her to do in Korea."

This disposes finally of the falsehoods assiduously circulated by a Seoul newspaper and reproduced with marked display of credence by one of its Yokohama contemporaries. The two main points of the slanderous count were that the celebrated Convention was wrenched from the Koreans by an open display of armed force, and that the seal of the Minister of Foreign Affairs was taken by violence from his office and affixed to the document contrary to his wishes. It was observed in these columns at the time that such charges were a public insult to Marquis Ito, who had presided over and directed the whole proceedings, and who must necessarily be assumed to have been cognizant of, as he certainly was responsible for, the methods pursued in negotiating and concluding the Convention. This consideration did not at all deter the sensation-mongers, nor did they apparently attach any importance to the obvious suggestion that Marquis Ito would never have agreed to assume the direction of Japan's new relations with Korea under the Convention had they been founded on a display of force and fraud. It will be curious now to observe the attitude taken by the slanderers when confronted by this unimpeachable testimony coming from one who had direct personal cognizance of everything that occurred officially in the Korean capital on those memorable days. Will they frankly admit that they were misled by rumour, an accident which may happen to the most conscientious men; or will they endeavour to discredit this new evidence and to re-affirm their own version? It is not difficult to foretell.

A noteworthy point in Mr. Stevens' narrative is that two out of the Cabinet Ministers were objecting parties to the conclusion of the Convention. It was doubtless from these statesmen that the rumours of an exhibition of force emanated. From their point of view the arrangement, having been made in spite of their protests and resistance, became invested with a certain character of force majeure, but to endorse such an estimate would be to admit that the minority in all divisions are coerced. The Korean Cabinet were not unanimous. That is all that can be said truthfully and all that need be said. But as for the whole procedure connected with the discussion and conclusion of the Convention, it was perfectly regular and free from every feature inviting criticism of the kind indulged in by the Seoul newspaper and its Yokohama echo.

"TOKYO PUCK."

It is really a pity that the English editor of Tokyo Puck does not have his compositions supervised. Very frequently his ideas are distinctly clever and he never fails to express his meaning, but we doubt whether there are a score of Japanese in Japan who could compose grammatically faultless ideomatic English text for a comic paper, and the English Editor of Puck is not one of this band of rari aves. To say this is not to depreciate Japanese ability as compared with foreign, for if there be not a score of Japanese thus qualified, there is not, we are confident, so much as one solitary European or American competent to act as Japanese editor of a Japanese Puck. What we mean is that if the proprietors of the Tokyo journal think it worth while to have an English text at all, then it should be worth their while not to impose an impossible task on the editor but to provide him with adequate assistance. Here are a few specimens of the English that adorns the pages of the latest Puck:—

"Ugly Man (thinking this beauty have fancy on him)":—

"Oh, there the ditch! Stop, stop!"

"A couple of young man and girl standing by:— 'What a fool to come to shrine for saying prayer on such cold day; to be sure a lunatic.'"

"Mr. Cholly:—'No! will be enough if you don't like me. No need of treat of such kind.'"

"On my! You rude! You mustn't take it."

"The would-be professors returned home from a study in abroad."

Considering the remarkably low price at which the Tokyo Puck offers itself to subscribers we are aware that too much can not be expected of it, but such English as the above makes the periodical ridiculous.

THE "ROMAJI-KAI."

On the 23rd instant a farewell banquet was given to Mr. Sawayanagi of the Education Department, who goes to England to lecture on the Japanese system of education. Advantage was taken of the occasion to advertise the Romaji-kai, which has Mr. Sawayanagi's earnest support. A letter was read from Viscount Hayashi, Japanese Ambassador in London. The Viscount forwarded a contribution of 100 yen to the funds of the Society and dwelt upon the enormous difference in facilities that would result when the Japanese language could be transcribed by a type-writer. He mentioned also that, with the present system of caligraphy, the proper pronunciation of personal names is often uncertain. For example, when there was question recently of an English Order for Marquis Yamagata, some trouble was caused by perplexity as to whether the Marquis' second name is "Aritomo" or "Ariyoshi." Lieut-General Okura, who was among those present, capped this story by telling of a case where the Spanish Government, misled by different readings of the same ideographs, duplicated a decoration.

PROLONGED EARTHQUAKE.

An earthquake of great duration was experienced on Sunday night in Tokyo, Yokohama and the adjacent parts. Beginning at 10.51 p.m. the earth movements lasted for eight minutes and forty-two seconds, both horizontal and vertical motions being involved. The preliminary tremors continued for thirteen seconds; the vibration then became violent reaching on the earth level two and three millimetres and lasting for forty-one seconds; slight motions ensued for thirteen seconds and these were succeeded by severe horizontal and vertical motions, becoming gradually gentle till the close. The Yokohama Meteorological office observations are as follows: Maximum amplitude of horizontal motion 6.8 millimetres per 1.6 second; maximum amplitude of vertical motion 0.07 millimetre per 1 second. Direction N. E. to S. S. W. Origin of earthquake, Tokyo Bay. The shocks were felt over a wide area but the severe motions were limited in extent.

No damage has to be reported in Yokohama.

The Tokyo seismologists say that the earthquake of the 21st instant seems to have had its origin on the coast of Fukushima and Miyagi. It was felt in Tokyo at 10h. 55m. 29 sec. p.m. and the seismographs of the Imperial University show that the shocks lasted for nearly two hours. There were 40 light shocks before the disturbance developed alarming dimensions. Many people left their houses and took refuge in the streets. The earthquake was felt most severely in Utsunomiya and Sendai, and the area affected by it was very extensive—16,000 square ri—but no damage was done.

RE-OPENING OF THE RUSSIAN LEGATION.

M. Kosakoff, Secretary of the Russian Legation in Peking, arrived in Tokyo on the 19th instant, and announced his desire of taking up the duties of Russian Representative pending the arrival of the newly appointed Minister. Thus diplomatic relations between Japan and Russia have been once more restored.

Mr. Kosakoff was accompanied by two student interpreters. He was formerly a student interpreter at the Russian Legation in Tokyo, and subsequently served as Consul in Masampo. The re-opening of the Russian Legation is hailed with universal satisfaction.

THE KOREAN ENVOY.

Prince Li Chai-on, the Korean delegate to Japan, who comes to return Marquis Ito's visit, arrived at Shimbashi on the 23rd instant. His suite numbered twelve. They proceeded at once to the Imperial Hotel.

The Korean Envoy Prince Li Chai-on, who arrived at Shimbashi on Tuesday morning, was received on the platform of the railway by about a hundred persons, among whom were Mr. Furuya, representing Marquis Ito, Mr. Chinda, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, Major-General Murata and all the Koreans resident in Tokyo. The Prince and his suite proceeded to the Imperial Hotel in carriages sent by the Household Department. His Highness is to have audience of the Emperor on the 27th instant.

VLADIVOSTOCK.

The Foreign Office in Tokyo announces the receipt of a notice from the Russian Chargé d'Affaires, dated the 21st instant, saying that as the Vladivostock Medical Inspection Station is not now officiating, ships will not be allowed to enter that port unless they are provided with health certificates granted to them at their last port of call.

The following telegram has been very kindly placed at our disposal by the United States Legation:—

Vladivostock, January 23.

There was no loss of foreign life and property in the riots yesterday. Quiet is now restored.

SNOW.

Four inches of snow fell in Tokyo on the afternoon and during the night of the 24th instant. That is a somewhat unusually heavy fall but it is welcomed by the people as indicating a good season. We shall probably have two or three further visitations of the same nature before spring sets in.

According to observations by the Yokohama Meteorological Office, snow fell in Yokohama on Wednesday to a depth of four inches and a half.

Telegrams from the interior report the snow fall to be heavier than has been experienced for many years past.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Last session the Diet passed a law which was subsequently promulgated, providing for the hypothecation of railways as security for loans, but this measure did not extend to electric railways, the latter being controlled by a special system of regulations and presenting special features which demanded careful consideration before any system of mortgage could be applied to them. On the other hand, it was obviously unjust that this important class of communications should be excluded from the benefit of being able to borrow capital at cheap rates. Hence a bill to meet the position has been drafted and is now about to be submitted to the Diet. The Tokyo Denki Tetsudo stands alone among Japanese enterprises of that nature in so far as it has obtained considerable assistance from foreign capitalists, but in that case the capital came simply through the sale of shares, British investors having been found sufficiently liberal to invest money in a purely Japanese enterprise and without any special security.

On the evening of the 19th instant their Excellencies Sir Claude and Lady MacDonald gave their first Ambassadorial reception at the British Embassy. The rooms were crowded with distinguished personages, and as all officers and officials appeared in full uniform the brilliancy of the spectacle was very marked. At one moment in the evening a group standing in the principal salon included Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, Admiral Togo, General Kuroki, General Oku and Vice-Admiral Kamimura, and in their immediate vicinity were Marquis Ito and Count Inouye. The band of the Imperial Household performed during the evening and refreshments were served from ten o'clock.

It is officially announced that the redemption of 100 million yen worth of six per cent. bonds will commence from the middle of March. The dates of the various transactions and the amounts are given as follow:—

First drawing—March 15th; redemption period, May 16th to 25th; amount 10 millions.
Second drawing—March 15th; redemption period, June 16th to 25th; amount, 32 millions.
Third drawing—March 15th; redemption period, July 16th to 25th; amount, 23 millions.
Remainder, redemption period, August 16th to 25th.
These amounts are liable to more or less variation in accordance with purchases in the open market and convenience of drawing.

At the recent meeting between the Minister President of State and a number of Members of the House of Representatives, Mr. Sakatani, Minister of Finance, was reported as having stated, in reply to Mr. M. Kato, that a sum of 80 million yen was expected from Russia by way of compensation for the keep of her prisoners. We reproduced the statement but with considerable doubt, inasmuch as no such figure had previously been estimated, and moreover the Minister's reference to the matter of domestic loans, in the context of which this assertion occurred, seemed confused and greatly wanting in explicitness. On inquiry we learn that what His Excellency did say was this:—A total sum of 430 million yen is to be raised by means of loans. But of that amount 150 millions will be subscribed by the Deposits Bureau of the Finance Department, the sum to be actually floated in the shape of a public loan being thus reduced to 280 millions. Inasmuch, however, as a considerable interval must elapse before the war-notes put into circulation in Manchuria by the Japanese troops are presented for redemption, and inasmuch as their redemption constitutes one of the charges to be met by the proceeds of the loan, there will be no immediate occasion to issue more than 200 million yen worth of bonds. Finally this last figure will be substantially diminished by the payment obtained from Russia for the maintenance of her prisoners, though as to the exact dimensions of that payment no calculation has yet been made for publication.

The first dock at Maizuru was completed recently but since last year the construction of another dock of very large dimensions has been going on. We read in Japanese papers that it will be the largest dock in the empire and that its building will occupy 8 years.

Thirty-two Japanese soldiers who had been made prisoners by the Russians in Manchuria arrived at Nagasaki from Vladivostock on the 22nd instant. No intimation of the despatch of these men had been given by the Russians and thus their arrival took the Japanese completely by surprise. They were all wounded, some having lost limbs and seven being unable to walk. Among them were ten out of the company which, having been surrounded by a Russian brigade shortly before the declaration of an armistice, was virtually annihilated. These prisoners report that they received the kindest treatment from the Russians. They were treated in the hospital at Harbin, and they say that the food given to them was better than that provided for Russian privates, while in the matter of clothes they were excellently provided. Despatched by railway to Vladivostock they had to remain for two days extra in the train, owing to the disturbed state of that place, and on arrival they were again placed in hospital and kept there for nearly two weeks.

It is stated that the second celebration in Tokyo for welcoming the victorious troops will take place between the 13th and the 20th of February. The date has been chosen in consideration of the fact that the last troops of the First Division will not reach the capital before the 10th of next month. General Kuroki, having been included in the first celebration, will not take part in the second, but the four Generals, Nogi, Nozu, Oku and Kawamura, will be present.

At a somewhat belated date the Tokyo newspapers publish the text of the Imperial Message addressed to Baron Komura and Mr. Uchida on the 1st instant when they repaired to the Palace. His Majesty uses the words:—"You showed circumspection, accomplished your duty well and have given me profound satisfaction."

A telegram received in Tokyo on the 18th instant announced that Dr. Rutherford Harris, who is now in Japan, had been re-elected by his constituency, Dulwich. Dr. Harris is a Unionist in politics. The Liberal and Free Trade candidate was Mr. D. Williamson, a prominent local Nonconformist, and the Education Act was one of the principal issues.

The sixty students from Korea hitherto studying in the Tokyo Middle School have been expelled en bloc. These youths went on strike when they learned of the conclusion of the new convention between Japan and Korea. Earnest endeavours were made to explain the true situation to them, and in deference to a request from the Korean Representative who, on his return to Seoul, promised to make some arrangement, the Japanese Authorities refrained from taking any final step. Subsequently a telegram is said to have been received from Mr. Hayashi in Seoul asking that one more attempt be made to bring the lads to reason, but this too having failed, the whole sixty have now been expelled from school. The youths doubtless imagined that they were obeying the dictates of patriotism, but it is to be feared that they have sacrificed their careers on a very useless altar.

The following interesting letter appears in The Times :—

Sir,—As chairman pro tem. of the Anglo-German Friendship Committee, I am desired to draw your attention to the extraordinary mis-statement contained in the report of Mr. Bonar Law's speech at Wolverhampton.

The Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Trade is reported to have said :—"We have not a large market. Germany has a market of 60 millions of people from which we are excluded."

So far from this being the case, in the Board of Trade Statistical Abstract [1905, Cd. 2566] the imports into Germany from Great Britain are given as 594,000,000 marks, or in round numbers £29,700,000.

In fact, not only does Germany not exclude our productions, but she actually takes more of them than any country in the world, except India.

In the interests of a good understanding between the two countries it is important that the real state of the case should be made clear.

I am yours faithfully,

AVEBURY.

6, St. James's-square, S.W., Dec. 9.

That is certainly a very notable fact, notable for many reasons.

News from Hokkaido says that the snow has accumulated to a depth of 8 feet, and northern Echigo wires that it has 5 feet. These figures are not unusual at this time of year.

Telegrams state that the Russian Volunteer Fleet steamer Amur reached Saseho from Port Arthur on the 23rd instant by means of her own steam. The Amur is now called the Anakusa. She was sunk, it will be remembered, while lying in dock at Port Arthur, and her presence—she is a ship of 2,590 tons—in such a place caused much inconvenience. On the 25th of last October she was raised, but nothing had been publicly stated as to her condition or her change of name prior to this news of her arrival at Saseho.

Captains Sakamoto and Ijichi, who are to bring out from England the new battle-ships Katori and Kashima, left Tokyo by the 11 a.m. train on the 23rd instant. There were about 40 officers in all. A great number of naval men assembled to see them off, including Vice-Admirals Saito, Ijuin, Dewa, Misu, Ito, Yamanouchi and Arai, and several Rear-Admirals.

The former Mayor of Tokyo, Mr. Matsuda Hideo, died suddenly on the night of the 24th. The deceased gentleman enjoyed the highest reputation in the capital. He was the city's first mayor, a post which he held for five years.

THE PLAGUE IN OSAKA.

Another case of plague was reported on Jan. 20th in Kobe.

A plague patient died at Kobe on Jan. 22nd. The Osaka City Office has decided to encourage the catching of rats.

A case of bubonic plague was reported in Kobe on January 23rd.

A new case of bubonic plague was reported on Jan. 23rd in Osaka, the patient being a woman residing in Namba-machi.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

The usual fortnightly meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society was held in Van Schaick Hall on Friday evening when a varied programme was presented to members and their friends.

The paper read by Mr. Karl Lewis was descriptive of a visit paid to Rotorua, the centre of the New Zealand thermal spring district, and of a bicycle ride thence to Napier, in the Hawkes Bay Province, 160 miles away. Mr. Lewis's contribution consisted chiefly of extracts from a journal that he kept at the time and was illustrated by some extremely beautiful limelight views which greatly enhanced its interest.

The North Island of New Zealand, he said, is traversed by a line of volcanic activity, the extreme known points of which are White Island in the Bay of Plenty (east) and the famous mountain of Ruapehu, over 9000 feet in height, situated 150 miles to the south-west. Rotorua is on this line; and by consequence is a dreary, desolate hole, the soil being mostly pumice and sand on which the ti tree alone can maintain life, but the boiling springs, fumaroles, solfataras and mud-geysers afford the necessary distraction to sightseers. Moreover, it is the railway terminus and attractions are provided in the shape of a hospital and sanatorium, while for those who are not ardently fascinated by such objects, the small park and garden, fountains, tennis-lawn, arbours and pleasant shady walks offer a pleasant contrast to the desolation that too largely prevails. The place is 990 feet above the sea and the air is more dry and bracing than that of the coast, from which it is 40 miles distant. The mean temperature in winter is 45° and the most agreeable months are February, March and April. But of course it is the baths that make Rotorua so favoured a resort—and this despite the mosquitoes, which bite through one's clothes. Having referred to the artificial geyser in the Park, Mr. Lewis proceeded to describe the baths which are apparently good for, among other ailments, rheumatism and cutaneous diseases, and almost any conceivable temperature may be obtained from 80 to 180 Fahr.

Ohinemutu, a mile distant, teems with streams and springs, holes, jets mud-pits, pools, and so on—all, or nearly all, on the boil. Some are used for washing clothes, and others as boilers by the native community. Some of the latter springs are large enough to accommodate a bullock; there are also small fissures where eggs may be boiled without undue waste of caloric; and some moderately sized orifices are used as steam baking ovens. In the adjacent lake there is an island, attached to which is the romantic story of Hinemoa, who, from the mainland opposite, swam across one night to her lover and afterwards took the chill from her body by laving herself in Waikimihia, the hot spring of the island, hence known to this day as Hinemoa's bath. Her sweetheart does not seem to have been a person of much spirit or he would not have allowed the lady to risk her life; probably he could not swim, and at any rate his name was Tutanekei. This place was formerly the island home of the fathers of the tribe and the seat of the religious ceremonies, where the priests kept sacred the emblems brought from their ancestral home. All the natives, men, women and children, smoke, and between soaking themselves in hot water and baking themselves in the sunshine their lives flit lazily and pleasantly by. If they have plenty of riwai (potatoes) and tobacco all is well; if they have plenty of rum all is better. If rest be happiness these people are filled up with happiness for they rest mostly all the time, everything is so easy for them. After a few days' stay at Rotorua Mr. Lewis and a friend started on bicycles for Napier, the capital of the province of Hawkes Bay, which they reached on Christmas Day. The road passes through country in which every prominent rock seems to have a name derived from legend, and special notice was taken of the wonderful Te Huka falls on the Waikato river near Lake Taupo, and of the mountain Tongairoro. The lecturer related many of the old Maori legends which cling to these famous spots. Though the going was very bad in places, owing to the pumice-sand, until they got out of the volcanic region, the trip was evidently much enjoyed by the bicyclists.

Mr. Lewis having been warmly thanked, the musical programme was proceeded with. In Mr. Kenneth Young, the Society found a capital entertainer and his songs and patter proved most acceptable to his audience.

Pianoforte Solo ... "Fantaisie Impromptu" ... Chopin.

Mrs. R. J. Ward,

Humorous Musical Sketch ... "Singers and Songs"

Mr. Kenneth Young.

Violin Solo ... "La Serenata" ... Tosti.

Mr. C. H. Thorn.

Humorous Song ... "Advertisements" ...

Mr. Kenneth Young.

At the next meeting, on February 2nd, the well known authoress, Mrs. Hugh Fraser, will speak, her address being entitled "The days of my youth in old Rome." This address will be illustrated.

JAMES WATT ANNIVERSARY DINNER.

Steam users and others interested in engineering matters held, on the 19th instant—the birthday of James Watt—a 5th annual dinner in honour of the memory of the great inventor. The function took place in the Imperial Hotel, and was attended by some 50 Japanese, and 10 foreign guests.

Among the guests were Mr. K. Inouye, President of the Tanko Railway Co., Mr. T. Miura, Director of the Koku Railway Co., Dr. Shimose, President of the Oji Gunpowder Factory, Mr. Ota, Director of the Patent Office, Dr. Arisaka and Captain Kondo of the Navy Department, Mr. K. Kishi of the Shibaura Co., Professors Inokutsu, Terano, C. D. West, Shiba, F. P. Purvis of the Imperial University; Messrs. Tejima, Sakata, Hirata, Lefroy, Eddison, Thurn, Michel, Webb, Hatfield, Kroto. The Chair was taken by Dr. Nakahara, Professor of Engineering in the Tokyo Higher-Technical School (at Asakusa).

Speeches were made in memory of James Watt, and in connection with toasts given to "Progress of Engineering in Japan," and "Progress of Engineering in other countries."

Just in time for the dinner, a cablegram was received from Glasgow, at which place a similar dinner, of very large proportions, is held annually on the Saturday nearest to the birthday. The Chairman of the Glasgow meeting, Mr. James Gilchrist, of the Engineering and Shipbuilding firm of Barclay and Curle, and the Secretary, Mr. E. H. Parker, cabled the greetings of their gathering. To this message a suitable answer from the meeting in Tokyo was drafted and despatched in time to be read at the Glasgow dinner.

A fukubiki followed the dinner, at which some very amusing and some valuable presents were drawn by the various guests.

FOOTBALL.

Owing to the lateness of the notice the game of Association football played on Saturday afternoon at the Cricket Ground did not attract many lookers-on and the weather was far from enticing. The teams were :—

Born in Japan.		The Rest.
E. Powis	Goal	F. J. Lias	Backs
W. S. Moss		A. W. Cooper
D. Drummond		W. B. White
W. B. Mason	Half	H. Cartwright	Half
W. J. White		E. J. Frageley
D. Weed		S. R. Ford
J. Drummond	For-	B. C. Lambert	wards.
J. E. Moss		S. Clarke
O. Strome		J. W. Dixon
H. W. Kilby	Referee:	McDougall	Mr. C. T. Mayes.
J. M. Mollison		E. N. Lambert

The first point in the game was scored by Lambert for The Rest, but Kilby soon equalized and scored again before half-time. In the second half "Born in Japan" maintained the aggressive; a third goal was scored by J. E. Moss, and Kilby got a fourth, the "native-born" thus easily maintaining their unchallenged supremacy. The play was spirited and the form shown on both sides was good.

THE PROGRESS OF CONSTITUTIONAL INSTITUTIONS IN JAPAN.

DURING the past fifteen years students of constitutional history have been watching intently the development of representative government in Japan, and some of them complain that they can not yet discover any signs of finality. Two interesting articles on the subject have just appeared in the columns of the Japan Times, but the impression they produce is not as definite as could be wished. Briefly summarized our contemporary's view seems to be that the time is not yet ripe for party government, and that its unripeness is due mainly to two causes, namely, the influence of the Elder Statesmen, who may be said to command the situation while standing aloof from party affiliations; and the obstruction of the House of Peers, which is a conservative force steadily opposed to government by the people in its radical form. Without questioning the correctness of such an analysis, we may be permitted to say that a mistaken view seems to be commonly taken of the place held by the Elder Statesmen in the Japanese body politic. The trend of the comments frequently penned with reference to them is that they constitute a sort of moribund excrescence which ought to be lopped off, which is distinctly anomalous and which nevertheless retains an inconvenient measure of vitality. But what would be the position of these Elder Statesmen in any constitutional State of the Occident? Would they not be the very backbone of the Administration? They have not retired from public life. On the contrary, every one of the four—we do not include Count OKUMA since he is a party leader, or Count ITAGAKI, who no longer takes any share in politics—every one of the four might become at any moment the head of a Cabinet. Neither the Japanese nation nor foreigners would have expressed or felt any astonishment had Count KATSURA's place been taken by Marquis ITO, or Marquis YAMAGATA, or Count INOUE, or Count MATSUKATA. These men are all at a time of life when, so far from being put on the shelf, they would be counted the natural and proper administrative heads of any Occidental nation. There is consequently neither anomaly nor impropriety in the place they occupy in Japan. The anomaly and impropriety are all on the part of those who, for the sake of working out an academical theory, would thrust aside a band of veteran statesmen proved by achievements such as can scarcely be claimed for any other group of administrators in any other country. Naturally one is prompted to enquire whether the sacrifice of these men is an essential preliminary to party government in Japan, and if so, why such should be the case. We are disposed to answer that at one period the sacrifice seemed likely to be demanded, but that the period is past. The opening of the Diet meant, in effect, the opening of an arena where for the first time in the history of Japan a number of popular agitators obtained the privilege of crossing lances with the statesmen in power. During ten years a prefatory contest had been going on, and throughout nearly the whole of that decade the agitators, baffled, checked and, according to their own conviction, tyrannized over, were steadily laying up a store of indignation and wrath. Thus when the collision took place on the floor of the House of Representatives, it developed at once its maximum calorific. The members sent up by the constituencies spoke and acted in such a manner as to suggest that the contest lay between liberty and despotism, they themselves standing for the former and the so called "clan statesmen" for the latter. Then, if ever, administrative power should have fallen into the possession of these agitators, for their cause glowed with a fervour of zeal and conviction which must inevitably cool with the lapse of time. But they failed—failed when their opportunities for success were brightest. It is not impossible that had they refrained from all semblance of attack and proved themselves anxious for the welfare of the State rather than for the vindication of their own cause, they would have drawn the statesmen into their ranks and party cabinets would have become an accomplished fact by a gentle and scarcely discernible process. But since they indulged from the outset in a vehement attack there was created between them and the statesmen a gulf not likely to be bridged until the memory of all this artificial animosity had died out or been obliterated by some larger issue. That is what both sides are now awaiting. Marquis ITO tried to expedite the result when he organized the Seiyun-kai. It has been said that he acted prematurely but certainly without his preparatory step the present Ministry could never have been formed. For the present Ministry is precisely what Marquis ITO must have had in view as the solution of the dead-lock, a ministry composed partly of party politicians and partly of young statesmen, who, having been reared at the feet of the Genro, bring to the coalition the influence and goodwill of the latter without their actual personality. It is, in fact, one of those graceful compromises in which the Japanese delight.

COUNT OKUMA ON THE SITUATION.

IT is at once interesting and unexpected to find that Count OKUMA advocates a return to the old system of small election districts and closed ballots. Such a system was tried in Japan during the early years of constitutional government, and the results were so unsatisfactory that Marquis ITO interested himself actively in legislation for greatly enlarging the election districts and abolishing signed ballots. The contentions of the two statesmen are analogous, but their arguments follow exactly opposite lines. Marquis ITO holds that small districts and signed ballots create facilities for swaying elections in party interests; Count OKUMA holds that large districts and unsigned ballots create facilities for governmental interference. As a matter of theory it is impossible not to endorse Marquis ITO's view. Quite obviously the smaller a constituency is and the more effective the scrutiny to which voters can be subjected, the greater are the opportunities for bribery and corruption. A candidate who has to deal with only a few scores of voters can bring influence to bear on them much more easily than if he has to deal with as many hundreds, and, having manipulated them to his satisfaction, the result is rendered incomparably safer if the vote cast by each can be distinctly traced. These truths are elementary. But Count OKUMA looks at the matter from another standpoint. He sets aside altogether the question of undue influence and corruption under party auspices and contends, in effect, that the present constituencies are too large to be manipulated by non-official hands, and that in unsigned ballots men find an opportunity to evade their obligations to the party whose principles they profess. It is evidently a question of degree. Here are two evils, undue party influence and undue official interference. Which is the lesser? We should expect that a statesman like Count OKUMA who believes in the consummation of party cabinets in Japan and who has always advocated political purity, would support an arrangement of constituencies founded on the former prospect and calculated to promote the latter purpose. If party cabinets are to become an accomplished fact in this country and if the integrity of electoral methods be a desideratum under such a system, then official interference is a merely transient incident, and to recast the constituencies for the sake of checking that abuse seems an exaggerated caution.

It is also very interesting to find that Count OKUMA in his speech and the Progressists in their manifesto attribute Japan's success in arms largely to the influence of the Constitution. The blessing of a constitution—so their argument runs—inspires men with a feeling that they are part and parcel of the State and thus begets a nationalistic sentiment which redoubles patriotism and renders self-sacrifice easy. Such a proposition appeals to reason, but what we doubt is whether Japan's case is a well chosen example of its application, especially when the choice is made by politicians whose habitual complaint is that the reality of constitutional government has not yet been attained in this country, and when we observe that probably not one soldier out of every thousand who fought in Manchuria Korea and Saghalien possessed the franchise. Count OKUMA himself has told us—and indeed we knew it well already—that foreign pressure supplied the influence which launched Japan on her wonderful career of modern progress and impelled her people to make sacrifices unparalleled in history. Her very exceptional insight showed her that no effective resistance could ever be made to the menace of the White Peril unless she centralized her administration, abandoned her old fashions and equipped herself with all the implements and appliances devised by Western intelligence. The unflinching patience she evinced in obeying this conviction, the unflagging assiduity and the quiet self-confidence, constitute a remarkable record. What was the impulse underlying it all? Was it the possession of a constitution? Scarcely, for the Constitution was not granted until the Meiji era was nearly a quarter of century old, and we can ourselves remember in 1868, before the Imperial Oath had been sworn and before constitutional institutions had entered even the realm of Japanese dreamland, that on the lips of every Samurai one heard the very formula now employed by Count OKUMA himself, "place the country on the same plane with Western States." Besides, are we to forget bushido? If the Constitution be chiefly responsible for the giyū hōkō, the chivalrous service, justly admired and eulogized by the framers of the Progressists' manifesto, what becomes of bushido to which so much has been attributed; bushido, a heritage bequeathed from centuries long antecedent to even the term "constitution"? And after all if constitutional government be the basis of patriotism, it is difficult to account for the splendid exhibitions of that quality with which the histories of so many other unconstitutional nations abound. We are not attempting to belittle the value of a constitution as a moral force, but it appears to us that patriotism is an instinct largely independent of administrative systems.

CHINESE NEWSPAPERS AND JAPANESE EXPERIENCES.

FROM an article in the North-China Daily News we gather that the tone of the Chinese newspapers has completely changed of late, and that whereas they formerly devoted their columns to pointing out the abuses of Chinese law and its administration, they now devote them to vilipending foreigners. What lends piquancy to this metamorphosis is that these papers could not have existed without foreign protection. They made themselves so obnoxious to the Chinese authorities a few years ago—that is to say in the early days of their journalistic career—that steps were taken to rule them out of existence. On the 8th of October, 1898, the EMPRESS DOWAGER promulgated a decree declaring that, "As newspapers serve only to excite the masses to subvert the present order of things, and as the editors concerned are composed of the dregs of the literary classes, no good can be served by the continuance of such dangerous instruments, and we hereby command the entire suppression and sealing up of all newspapers published within the Empire, while the editors connected with them are to be punished with the utmost rigour of the laws." Such a pronouncement would have abruptly terminated the career of all the newspapers then appearing in Chinese dress had there not been a resource: the proprietors had merely to establish their printing offices within the limits of a foreign settlement where the writ of the Chinese authorities does not run. And if that precaution did not seem sufficient, they had the further device of constituting foreigners their nominal or real proprietors. This they proceeded to do, thus acquiring absolute immunity from all processes of Chinese law. The thing worked well enough—that is to say well enough from the foreign point of view—so long as these journals applied themselves to the propagandism of Western civilization in China. Of course they became all the more obnoxious in the eyes of their own officials, and indeed the latter must have been endowed with more than a human share of magnanimous patience had they felt anything but aversion towards countrymen of their own who, under the ægis of foreign protection, attacked and abused native institutions. But it did not matter to the editors what amount of Chinese resentment their writings provoked: their own properties and persons were safe. There does not appear, however, to have been any considerable degree of sincerity in this pro-Occidental crusade, for the papers have now made a thorough volte-face, and are leading the anti-foreign outcry. They have, in fact, fallen in with the temper of the time, and their conversion is said to have reconciled them with the native officials who no longer regard editors as the dregs of the literary classes or the journals themselves as instruments for inciting rebellion. The writer in our Shanghai contemporary seems to be struck chiefly by the inconsistency which this flagrant change of principles betrays, but to us another aspect of the case presents itself. Was it right that these journals should have been allowed to elude the laws of the land by flying to the sanctuary of the foreign settlement? This is precisely the question that Sir HARRY PARKES had to ask himself 35 years ago in Tokyo. He had to consider whether the immunity from native jurisdiction enjoyed by foreign residents was ever intended to protect Japanese borrowers of foreign names, and whether when the treaties secured to foreigners the right of carrying on trade and industry within the settlements, such an occupation as the publication of newspapers in the Japanese language was contemplated. Sir HARRY decided in the negative. He issued an ordinance vetoing such publications, and declaring that no journal composed and printed in the Japanese language in Japan was entitled to foreign protection under any circumstances. His action provoked a great deal of criticism at the time. Some clamoured that it represented a retrograde policy, a flagrant interference with the sacred right of free speech; and others contended that it was ultra vires, and that the Orders in Council did not and could not invest any British Minister with such power. Yet it would be impossible now-a-days, we opine, to find many persons prepared to deny the wisdom and the propriety of Sir HARRY PARKES' decision. The Japanese press has fought its battle stoutly in the open and has emancipated itself from virtually all restrictions. It is now a recognised and flourishing power in the land. What would it have grown to had it been condemned from the first to the hole-and-corner existence of a prolegi of aliens and an excrescence on an obnoxious system? Bound to support a system beyond whose ægis there would have been no safety, these hybrid journals would have incurred all the animosity attaching to the system, and would further have greatly accentuated that animosity by offering themselves as flagrant examples of the abuses to which extra-territoriality is liable. Those that cried out against Sir HARRY PARKES as an enemy of free speech should rather have recognised in him its far-seeing friend. And what was true of Japan five-and-thirty years ago, is true of China to-day. If China is ever to have a robust newspaper press the pioneer journals must cease to take refuge under the wing of foreigners. It is an invidious act on their part to turn and bite the hand which has hitherto protected them, but if by alliance with the spirit of the time they can obtain for themselves an officially recognised lease of life, their present anti-foreign attitude will be as nothing compared with the permanent gain to their country.

MISS RIDDELL.

Miss Riddell, whose name is associated with a remarkable work of charity on behalf of the lepers of Japan, has been decorated by the Emperor with the Ranju Hōshō. Miss Riddell is the first foreign lady who has been thus distinguished.

Apropos of the decoration of Miss Riddell of Kumamoto with a special medal in appreciation of her services in connection with the Leprosy Hospital which she established at her own expense, it is stated that according to official investigations, the estimated number of lepers throughout the Empire is as follows:—

Cities.		Prefectures.
	Patients.		Patients.
Tokyo	35	Aomori	60
Kyoto	21	Yamagata	36
Osaka	59	Akita	49

THE IMPERIAL DIEL.

Representatives of the various parties met in the Library of the Lower House on the 21st instant and decided that the membership of the Standing Committees should be distributed as follows:—

	Budget.	Settled Account.	Petitions.	Discipli- nary.	Totals
Seiyu-kai .....	25	18	18	11	72
Progressists .....	16	12	12	7	47
Daigo Club .....	13	9	9	5	36
Seiko Club .....	6	4	4	3	17
Unattached .....	3	2	2	1	8

Totals ... 63..... 45..... 45..... 27..... 180

As to the names of the committee-men, these were left to be fixed by the voting in the House on the 22nd.

It was further decided at this combined meeting that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole should be elected from the Progressists, and that the Chairman of the Budget Committee should be a member of the Seiyu-kai.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.07 p.m. on the 22nd instant.

The Vice-President, Mr. Minoura, was in the chair.

Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, the former President, announced that, having received the Emperor's command to form one of the Cabinet, he had to resign his position as President. He thanked the House for the assistance it had rendered him during his term of office, assistance which had enabled him to discharge his duties without serious blunder, and he said that he should always deem it one of the greatest honours of his life to have shared the House's patriotic attitude during the war. He concluded with these words which were loudly cheered:—"Though entering the Cabinet I shall never cease to labour for the consummation of perfect constitutional government, and this I swear before heaven."

Mr. Iwamoto Haruaki, the oldest member of the House, then expressed briefly the Representatives' appreciation of Mr. Matsuda's services and their regrets that he was obliged to leave the presidential chair.

The next business was the election of a President in succession to Mr. Matsuda. The first ballot resulted thus:—Mr. Sugita Teichi 288; Mr. Ebara Soroku 90; Dr. Hatoyama Kazuo 30; Mr. Sasa Tomofusa 18; and Mr. Kono Hironaka 16. As each of the three names submitted to the Throne for nomination must have received more than one half of the votes of those present (328), a second ballot had to be taken to decide the second and third names. It resulted thus:—

Dr. Hatoyama.....	176 votes.
Mr. Ebara Soroku .....	187 "
Mr. Sasa Tomofusa.....	72 "
Mr. Kono Hironaka .....	62 "

Thus the three names submitted for the Emperor's nomination were:—Mr. Sugita, Dr. Hatoyama and Mr. Ebara.

The House then proceeded to elect a Chairman of the Whole, and the result of the ballot was as follows:—

Mr. Seki Naohiko .....	229 votes.
Mr. Arakawa .....	7 "
Mr. Shimada Saburo .....	5 "

Mr. Seki was thus elected. He belongs to the Progressists Party. The members of the Standing Committees having been elected the House rose.

On the 23rd instant the House of Representatives elected the Chairmen of its Standing Committees. The four posts all fell to Seiyu-kai members; namely, Mr. Kuribara Ryoichi (Budget Committee), Mr. Kurizuka Seigo (Settled Account Committee), Mr. Takenouchi Yasaburo (Petitions Committee) and Mr. Isobe Shiro (Disciplinary Committee).

The Emperor has nominated Mr. Sugita Teichi to be President of the Lower House, in accordance with the result of the members' voting.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.16 a.m. The principal business on the Order of the Day consisted of three Government bills. They were:—

(1) Bill for amending the Law of the Industrial Bank in the sense of increasing its capital and developing its machinery so as to adapt it to various economic undertakings. The main points are that the Bank's capital is to be raised from 10 million yen to 17½ millions; that the face-value of its shares is to be 50 yen instead of 100; that a Vice-President is to be appointed; that within 3 months after the date of this Law's operation, the Bank must call up at least one-fourth of the face value of one half of its unpaid shares; and that when the issue of shares reaches 150,000, the whole of their face value must be paid up.

(2) Bill for amending the Law of the Bank of Formosa. (This presents no feature of special importance.)

(3) Bill for amending Law No. 39 of the 35th year of Meiji (1902). This measure extends the same protection to female constables at women's prisons as is given to male constables and wardens at men's prisons.

After various reports had been read by the President and some applications for leave had been disposed of, the Minister President of State, Marquis Saionji, ascended the rostrum and spoke as follows:—

"I deem it a great honour that, having accepted a heavy responsibility in reverent obedience to the Imperial Commands, I am now enabled to make in this House a brief statement of views with regard to the situation. Two years ago war had to be opened against Russia and in its course the Empire's belligerent undertakings and various dispositions at home and abroad were all successful; no error was committed in dealing with the exigencies of the time, and by signal victories the prestige of the country was enhanced. We owe these things to the virtues of our Sovereign, above, and to the valour of our soldiers, below, but such results could not have been achieved had not the people responded to the Imperial purpose with chivalrous service and exhibited the verity of a united nation. So soon as the President of United States showed his respect for peace by offering friendly suggestions to this Empire and to Russia, our Sovereign, deeply sensible of this friendliness, concluded a treaty of reconciliation with Russia and thus we witnessed the restoration of peace. I join with you, my Lords and Gentlemen, in hearty congratulations that our nationals, living in this era of glory, have been enabled to unite as one man in contributing their share to this unprecedentedly great achievement.

"The renewed treaty of alliance concluded with England was well suited to the time and its good results have been conspicuous. By its agency the guarantees of peace in the East have become securer than ever. Hereafter it will be our business still further to strengthen these guarantees, thereby permanently accomplishing the object of the alliance.

"With regard to Korea the relations of this Empire have been rendered more intimate by means of repeated Conventions and we have been able to define our position clearly.

Our country, by just and impartial conduct during the war, won the deep sympathy of foreign States, and it is a source of great rejoicing that since the re-establishment of peace our relations with them have grown in friendship.

"In order to consummate the results of the country's victories in war and to promote its fortunes still further, there is not less need of a united nation now than there was throughout the conflict. We are immediately confronted by the task of carrying on undertakings in Manchuria and of discharging the duties of a protectorate in Korea, so that not a day may be lost in developing the national resources. At home we have to make the finances firm; to restore the Army and Navy; to contrive the growth of industry, and to provide for the extension of education and the progress of learning. These are things which admit of no delay, and it is therefore essential that all administrative duties connected with their consummation should be discharged earnestly and fully. Abroad, we have to put into practical operation the rights and privileges acquired in Manchuria, and in order to achieve our protectorate over Korea in accordance with treaty, we are imperatively called on to lose no time in endeavouring to lead her without error into the path of enlightenment. Another equally pressing duty of our foreign policy is to deepen our friendship with China, to make her fully understand this Empire's sincerity and to urge her to accompany us along the high-road of civilization.

"In addition to the above there are very many other measures essential for preserving the honour and the rights won in our victorious war and for extending them still further. In sum, the duties that have now to be discharged at home and abroad are multifarious; every one of them is urgent, and it is inevitable that they should involve increased expenditures. Unless the nation again displays the same zeal that marked it during the war and unless it makes up its mind to bear these heavy responsibilities, the honour of the Empire can not be handed down intact and the rights of the Empire can not be asserted. This is the time for all classes, with one heart, to face the great problem of the post-bellum undertakings. I myself am profoundly sensible of the great responsibility I have incurred in taking office, but I am determined to discharge it to the utmost limit of my capacity. My Lords and Gentlemen, I sincerely trust that for the country's sake you will endeavour at this juncture to promote national unity and to consolidate popular opinion."

The Prime Minister added a brief reference to the Bills that would be submitted for the House's consideration and expressed the hope that they would obtain approval.

The Order of the Day was then taken. Mr. Sakatani, Minister of Finance, explained the Bill relating to the Industrial Bank, and said that the additional capital was to be raised in London. Arrangements had virtually been made, and the issue would take place during the present month, so it was most desirable that the Bill should be passed quickly. It was entrusted to a Special Committee, as was also the Bill relating to the Bank of Formosa, after brief explanation by Mr. Sakatani. Mr. Hara, Minister of Home Affairs, introduced the Bill for amending Law No. 29 of 1902, which was handed to a Committee, and the House rose at 10.40 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met 1.10 at p.m., the Order of the Day being:—

(1) Government Bill relating to the payment of Extraordinary Events Expenses. This measure is based on the necessity of having recourse to public loans to defray outlays connected with the repatriation of the troops and the rewarding and pensioning of officers and men. It empowers the Government to obtain temporary accommodation, to transfer and employ the Capital Funds belonging to the Special Accounts and to issue public loans, the total amount of such transactions not to exceed 363 million yen. Further, for the purpose of military and naval restorations, and military preparations in Manchuria and Korea, the Bill allots 70 millions. Altogether this measure confers large powers on the Government in case of necessity.

(2) Government Bill relating to a Capital Fund for adjusting the National Debts. The preamble declares the necessity of creating a capital fund to adjust the National Debts as a point of post-bellum undertaking and the advisability of making this fund a matter of special account. It provides that a sum of not less than 110 million yen shall be carried annually from the general accounts to this Special Adjustment Fund, and it empowers the Government to employ the Fund for conversions, for redemptions by purchase and in other profitable and safe methods.

(3) Government Bill for amending the Extraordinary Special Tax Law. The preamble says that large funds will be needed during a number of years for the service of the national debts, and for pensions and rewards, and that it is necessary to apply to these payments the proceeds of the Extraordinary Special Taxes. Therefore these taxes are to be deprived of their extraordinary and special character and are to become permanently continuing.

(4) Government Bill relating to Appropriations for the Naval Maintenance Fund. In this measure it is explained that financial necessity exists for abandoning from the 39th fiscal year (1906-7) the appropriations to the Naval Maintenance Fund, and the House is asked to abolish this particular item of special accounts.

(5) Government Bill for amending the Railway Construction Law. This measure provides for completing the connexions of the Sanin and Sanyo as well as of the Hokuriku and Hokuyetsu roads, which are included in the First-Period lines, and also for amending, as a matter of financial necessity, the annual appropriation for railway construction.

(6) Government Bill for rescinding Law No. 3 of 1898. This Law of 1898 makes the State Railways Account applicable to the Hokkaido lines, but as these latter will be operated from 1906 under the State Railways Special Account, the Law of 1898 becomes no longer necessary.

(7) Government Bill relating to Expenses of Experiments and Instruction in the matter of Productive Enterprises. The preamble of this Bill declares that the system of state assistance now pursued with regard to Agricultural Experimental Stations is incomplete and must be supplemented. It is proposed that the Treasury shall grant a sum of not more than 200,000 yen annually during 5 years, by way of assistance to experimental stations and places of instruction in agriculture, industry and marine products.

(8) Bill relating to silk-conditioning. Hitherto the conditioning of silk at the various kensa-jo has been conducted without charge, in the hope of encouraging the trade. But it is believed that the time has come when conditioning fees may fairly be charged. Further it is thought advisable in the interests of the silk industry that some special system of restraining the export of inferior or adulterated goods shall be devised. Therefore the Bill empowers the Minister concerned to order, should he think it necessary, that application be made for the inspection of silk intended for export, and if, after receiving such an order, the silk is exported or if an attempt be made to export it, without submitting it for inspection, a fine of from 50 to 1000 yen may be imposed. It is proposed that the new law shall go into force from April 1st, 1906, and that the present Law shall then cease to be valid.

(9) A Government Bill seeking post-facto assent to Imperial Ordinance No. 194 of 1905. (i.e. an urgent Ordinance empowering the Treasury to raise a loan of 300 million yen).

(10) A private Bill for amending the Law of Finance. This is a measure based upon complaints that the Treasury is disposed to abuse its power of granting assistance to private individuals or firms, (the assistance granted by the Katsura Cabinet to the 130th Bank is adduced as a case in point), and to delay unduly in presenting the settled accounts to the Diet, (the failure of the Katsura Cabinet to present the Settled Accounts until four years after the year to which they referred is mentioned). The presenter of the Bill is Mr. Ozawa Heikichi.

Mr. Sugita Teiichi took his seat as President and was welcomed by Mr. Iwamoto, the oldest member of the House.

After various reports had been read, Marquis Saionji ascended the rostrum and delivered the same speech as that made by him in the forenoon in the Upper Chamber.

Mr. Oishi Masami then rose and said that from the tone of the Minister President's speech His Excellency seemed to approve the issue of the peace negotiations. But it was owing to the bad result of those negotiations that the nation had to bear a heavy burden. He desired to inquire whether the Minister President approved or disapproved of the peace negotiations.

Marquis Saionji replied that his speech had not contained any expression of praise for the negotiations.

Mr. Hadano Denzaburo remarked that the Prime Minister had spoken of the results of the war having been perfected; a phrase which implied approval of the peace negotiations.

Marquis Saionji answered that he had made no reference to the negotiations.

Mr. Sakatani, Minister of Finance, then ascended the rostrum and spoke as follows:—

"I have now the honour to submit to you, Gentlemen, the Budget for the 39th fiscal year, together with various special budgets, a supplementary budget for the 38th year (1905) and a supplementary budget of extraordinary war expenditures. With regard to extraordinary war expenditures, considerable sums are required on account of deficiencies resulting from the development of operations, on account of the withdrawal of the troops, and on account of rewards. These sums have been embodied in a supplementary budget. They amount to 500 million yen, but since certain outlays were pressing so that the assembly of the Diet could not be awaited, recourse was had to an Imperial order in December and 60 millions were paid out. It results that the supplementary budget now submitted to you covers only some 450 millions. We propose to obtain this money entirely by means of loans. About 88 millions have already been collected, and thus the sum to be hereafter floated is 362 millions.

"The amount of the fixed reserve for War outlays in 1905 was 80 million yen, but owing to the developments of the situation and the payment of interest on loans, there arose here a deficit of 36 millions. Out of that amount 28,800,000 yen had to be paid out immediately without waiting for the assembly of the Diet, and it was consequently disbursed in December under the authority of the Sovereign. Hence the supplementary budget for 1905 now presented to you covers an amount of 7,200,000 yen only. The funds called for under this heading will all be obtained from surplus revenue.

"Another supplementary budget is submitted which provides a sum of 46,700,000 yen for the purpose of redeeming debts. This will be defrayed by the sale of consolidated bonds and from surpluses in the Treasury.

"The expenditures and revenues in the Budget for the 39th year are 492 million yen respectively. We have included in the enterprises to be carried out during the next fiscal year only such works as, though temporarily postponed or stopped during the war, have an essential relation to the development of commerce and industry, for example, the completion of land and sea communications at Yokohama and Kobe, the building of customs premises, the construction and improvement of railways, the supply of telephones, and additions to the Iron Foundry. It results that in next year's budget the outlays for purposes not connected with the war, namely, those for railways, telephones and the Iron Foundry, to meet which recourse is to be had to loans, aggregate some 235 millions.

"In the Budget for next year the expenditures necessitated in the sequel of the war are some 257 million yen, of which those belonging to ordinary outlays total 172 millions. Against this figure we have the proceeds of the war taxes—160 millions—, which are to be continued, and to these we propose to add 13 million yen from the surplus of the Ordinary Revenue. The extraordinary outlays arising out of the war amount to 84 millions, which belong to the General Accounts, and have been placed in the Treasury's Budget under the general heading of "War Reserves." The funds to meet these outlays are to be partly obtained by the sale of unneeded articles in the possession of the Army and Navy—giving 16 millions—and by floating loans (68 millions).

"The greater part of the outlays connected with the Russo-Japanese War were met by means of loans, which, up to-day, have been issued to the total amount of 1,280 yen. A further sum of about 362 millions will have to be issued to meet the expenditures shown in the supplementary budgets of extraordinary war outlays, and a further sum of 68 millions must also be issued, as explained above, so that the grand total is calculated to reach the large figure of about 1,710 millions. To adjust and redeem this a fixed policy must be adopted and we must endeavour to place our finances on a sound basis. This part of the problem has received our special attention and a scheme is now submitted to you.

"I have now explained the broad features of the Budget for next year, and I hope that, after due deliberation, you will give your consent.

Mr. Hayami remarked that the Minister of Finance attached great importance to the question of adjusting the national debts. Did he attach importance to the problem of adjusting the taxes.

Mr. Sakatani replied that the latter subject also had received full attention, but he had spoken chiefly of the debts as the more pressing.

The bills enumerated above were then handed to committees after those relating to finance had been explained by Mr. Sakatani; that relating to vessels of war by Mr. Wakatsuki; those relating to trade and industry by Mr. Matsuoaka. The last bill on the Order was postponed and the House rose at 2.10 p.m.

THE LAW COURTS.

CLAIM OF A DRESS-MAKER.

In the Yokohama Local Court, a case filed by K. Ono, a dress-maker, claiming twenty yen against Mrs. Eisenberg, came up on Jan. 19th before Judge Iyeyri.

Plaintiff stated that in December last, Mrs. Eisenberg ordered him to make a dress, giving him some kenchu silk. It was made up on Dec. 20th after the usual necessary trying-on by the plaintiff. The same day plaintiff handed the dress over to defendant and asked for twenty yen, that being the charge agreed upon between the parties. The defendant, however, would not pay this amount.

Defendant contended that the dress-maker did not make the dress in accordance with instructions. She refused to pay for the work, and as counter-claim asked for the return of the kenchu silk.

At this stage, the plaintiff asked the Court for leave to examine a Chinese dressmaker, Ah Chin, as a witness. Plaintiff said that the Chinaman took part in the work.

The Court, giving consent to the plaintiff's request, adjourned the case till Jan. 26th.

CLAIM AGAINST THE DIRECTOR OF THE RAILWAY BUREAU.

T. Iidzuka, formerly an employee of the Okazaki Station on the Tokaido Railway, has filed a case in the Tokyo District Court claiming a hundred and twelve thousand yen from Mr. S. Hirai, Director of the Railway Bureau. According to the petition, the plaintiff resigned his position in December last intending to find a post in a government office. The defendant, however, impeded his efforts, and plaintiff and his family are now in an embarrassing condition. The first hearing will take place on Feb. 8th.

FOREIGNER SENTENCED.

A foreigner, whose name is given as Mr. Alfred Hume (45), was sentenced on Jan. 25th in the Tokyo District Court to two months' imprisonment with hard labour, a fine of four yen, and six months' police surveillance. It was alleged that he dined on Jan. 10th at the restaurant Kumada, in Tsukiji, Tokyo, and went off without paying his bill, which amounted to yen 4.04. Some Tokyo papers report that he was a teacher of English in a Japanese school.

OLD AGE.

As one ascending some vast minster steps,
Sunlit from western skies,
Might turn and watch the heav'nly pageant fade
With half-reluctant eyes;
Might pause—while through the little swinging door
Singly the crowds go in—Content to listen just a moment more
To all the stir and din:
So at the portal of my House of Rest
I wait, full willingly;
My sunset light, my comrades at their work,
Still claim me smilingly.
But by and by the punctual hour will strike,
It cannot now be long,
And the staid bells I hear insistently
Shall stop for evensong.

HESBA D. WEBB.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

The Osaka Shosen Kaisha's steamer Tanagawa Maru went ashore in Hirado Strait at 6 a.m. on Jan. 24th on her way from Nagasaki to Fusan, Korea. The steamer Kouwa Maru left Nagasaki the same morning to assist her. The passengers, crew and cargo of the Tanagawa are safe.

The sailing vessel Asahi Maru, which was reported to have gone amissing in the neighbourhood of Iki island, was found on Jan. 24th by a steamer drifting in a snow storm. The Asahi Maru was brought to Nagasaki.

THE BOOKSHELF.

"Some Chinese Painters of the Present Dynasty," by Professor FRIEDRICH HIRTH, Professor of Chinese, Columbia University, in the city of New York.

A SHORT time ago Professor Giles, of the Cambridge University, gave to the world a book entitled "An Introduction to the History of Chinese Pictorial Art." It was an admirable work. In reviewing we particularly welcomed it as a volume which must help materially to correct a false impression prevalent in Europe, the impression that Chinese painting is an insignificant art, scarcely worthy of study. In truth Chinese pictorial art is one of the greatest achievements of human genius. It is the basis of Japanese pictorial art, and no Japanese painter has ever succeeded in rising to an appreciably higher level than that reached by his Chinese prototypes. Professor Giles' collaborator, the curator of the British Museum, gives it as his opinion that the Chinese school of landscape painting was the greatest the world has produced, and though we may hesitate to endorse such a wholesale verdict, we are certainly prepared to accept it with reservations. Mr. Giles made two omissions, one scarcely pardonable, the other easily explained. The first was that he failed altogether to notice the work done in this field by the late Dr. W. Anderson. The very first to draw Western attention in a worthy manner to the beauties of Chinese art was Dr. Anderson and for fully twenty years his excellent analysis with its accompanying list of artists stood quite alone and unchallenged. It is inexplicable that Professor Giles should have had no knowledge of Dr. Anderson's great work. One other omission made by the eminent Cambridge Sino-logue is that he gives no account of the artists of the present dynasty, his alleged reason being "lack of materials." Professor Hirth corrects both of these omissions. He does justice to Dr. Anderson's memory and he meets Professor Giles' denial of the existence of any authoritative work on art under the Manchu Tartars by giving a list of 6 books, 85 volumes in all, devoted chiefly to the artists of the present dynasty. From this library, which Professor Hirth has carefully consulted, he selects the names of 67 among the greatest masters of the dynasty and gives a list of them, appending in each case an appreciative statement. There are also two appendices; the first containing copious "biographical notes" on 45 of the greatest masters who flourished prior to the present dynasty; and the second, notes on 25 of China's old art-publishers and historians. There are several well executed reproductions of illustrative paintings. They show, we think, what Professor Hirth very frankly acknowledges, namely, the great difficulties besetting any Occidental who endeavours to procure really fine specimens of Chinese paintings. After China itself Japan is undoubtedly the richest repository of these treasures, and it was because Dr. Anderson studied in Japan at a time when foreign collectors enjoyed an unprecedented and unrepeatable opportunity, that he was enabled to obtain some examples worthy to form a basis of judgment. Professor Hirth does not appear to have been equally fortunate, if we may draw an inference from the illustrations in his book, and Giles, Anderson and Hirth must all give place in this respect to the authors of the beautiful volumes recently published in Japan under the auspices of the Shimbi-Shoin. Apart from its illustrations, however, the work of Professor Hirth is a highly valuable contribution to the Occident's knowledge of China's pictorial art. It will not greatly interest the general reader since the author refrains from any discussion of the characteristics of the art. But for collectors and historians it is indispensable.

Philippine Life in Town and Country, by JAMES A LE ROY: New York and London, G. P. Putnam's Sons.

THIS volume forms one of the series which Messrs Putnam are issuing under the generic title of "Our Asiatic Neighbours," and is uniform in format with Dr. Knox's well-known "Japanese Life in Town and Country." The publishers in their announcement concerning the book declare that "Mr. Le Roy is eminently fitted to write on life in the Philippines. He was for several years connected with the Department of the Interior in the Philippine Government, when he made a special investigation of conditions in the Islands. Since his return he has continued his studies and is already known as an authority on the Philippines." As a matter of fact our author spent but two years in the island. We have one objection to urge at the outset: it is that the title of the volume is rather misleading. From it one would infer that the reader is to be given glimpses of the Filipinos as they pursue the easy tenor of their way in town or country, while what one finds is an elaborate argument on the social medium of the Philippine Islands at the present moment. The author attempts to convey some idea of the difficulties attending the task of the Americans in their new possessions; the reasons why some projects are foredoomed to failure; the possibilities which lie before others; the hopes which may reasonably be formed concerning the future of the Filipinos, and the ideals which some of the Insular government departments,—particularly the Educational,—have set before them. But he suffers from a too facile pen: the best of his work is submerged beneath a torrent of words, mere words. He would have achieved a greater success had he said what he has to say in half the space which he has covered with printer's ink. The book bears the stamp of a precocious sophomore essay rather than the well-reasoned, duly proportioned work of a man of the world who has weighed his words in the balance before putting them into sober print. There are too many loose-ended arguments, while a sentence starting out firm and strong limps to a distressingly weak-kneed end. Still, for all that, the book conveys a good deal of information concerning a very interesting quarter of the globe. Mr. Le Roy takes a sympathetic view of the Filipino. He has worked with him and seen what he is capable of, and like David P. Barrows, late chief of the Philippine Ethnological Survey, he thinks that rich returns will be forthcoming if the present educational policy is carried to its logical conclusion. The book is divided into ten chapters. In the first is set forth the Point of View, and the author's attitude can be gathered from one sentence: "The best Filipinos are optimistic as to their race and its future. We ourselves can at least be decent enough to give them the benefit of the doubt, if not to encourage that optimism." In Chapter II. he discusses Racial Origins and Blends, and comes to the conclusion that, despite the great variety of dialects, there is a practical homogeneity running through all the tribes of the archipelago, whether they be Christians, Mahomedans or pagans. Chapter III. describes a typical Filipino Community; Chapter IV., Manila and other city dwellers; Chapter V. is devoted to religion and the religious question, and is a model of fair statement. Chapter VI. deals with Caciquism (the local name from bossism, borrowing a Spanish term transplanted from Hispaniola) and local self-government; while Chapter VII. discusses education and public opinion. This leads on to a chapter treating of the question of Tribal and Geographical Influences towards Disunion; while Chapter IX. is devoted to Trade and Internal Development, the final chapter discussing the Filipino in his relation to the Orient. Our author scouts the idea that Manila and the Philippines will ever swing back into the position they occupied as a trade and distributing centre before Spain had lost Mexico and the South Americas. Trade has cut for itself new channels since those days, and the supremacy of Singapore, Hongkong, Shanghai and Tientsin will never be seriously challenged by Manila, despite all the prophecies of enthusiasts. We have space for but one quotation. It deals with the subject of the Press. Says Mr. Le Roy:—

The Filipino press is only a part of the press of the Philippines, though to-day the larger part; but we have not to do here with the survivals of the Spanish journalism that was once so intolerantly domineering in the islands, nor with the American newspapers which have sprung up since the invasion of American soldiers, most of them highly discreditable to the name American, reeking of the cheapest of cheap race prejudice, and the manners and gossip of the saloons which are the rendezvous of the type of Americans who are mostly concerned in publishing and reading them, viz., adventurers and riff-raff. There have been two or three honourable exceptions to this general description of American publications but, with reference particularly to Manila, the American journalism of 1899 to 1905 has been a disgrace and an injury to the nation's interests.

Since 1898 and the beginning of the Filipino revolutionary publications, Filipino journalism has gradually been coming into its own. It is a very serious, and sometimes a very humorously serious, institution; but it gives promise, and has indeed already borne fruits of a sort not to be expected from the soil from which it sprang, and the atmosphere in which it was at first nourished. * * * Sometimes the criticisms are petty and puerile, or based on the worst of bad information or a deficient knowledge of public affairs * * * Generally it is the manner, rather than the matter, that one finds either amusing or distasteful, it being a bad imitation of Spanish journalistic style which is quite too often simply bombast.

The Princess Priscilla's Fortnight, by the Author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden." London, Fisher Unwin.

WE must own to a feeling of deep disappointment in closing this book. "Elizabeth and her German Garden" was a volume, which, though it set the vogue for writings that eventually proved rather tiresome and twaddly, was itself of such merit as to make one look forward to later production from the same pen. But that first book evidently marked the flowering-time, was the supreme effort, for none of its successors can compare with it. "The Princess Priscilla's Fortnight" tells of the adventures of Her Grand Ducal Highness the Princess Priscilla of Lothen-Kunitz, the daughter of an English Princess of uncomfortable and unexpected originality, who, tiring of the etiquette of Court life, flees to England with an aged tutor and her maid and sets up house-keeping in an English village. Most of the book is taken up with descriptions of the muddles which the Princess tumbled into and scrambled out of as Princesses in such a position are expected to do—but we must own that the humour of the various scenes is rather thin. In the end, of course, the Princess returns to her own people, a little disillusioned maybe, but certainly quite ready to marry the Prince whom before the memorable fortnight she had pretended to despise.

What Foods Feed Us, by EUSTACE MILLS:—London, George Newnes, Ltd. Yokohama, Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

THIS book is dedicated "to all who are seeking better food as a help to better health." The author deserves a wide circulation for his brochure for it is capably written, and though dealing with a scientific subject dispenses with scientific terminology and descriptions wherever possible. He thoroughly endorses Sir Michael Foster's dictum, "Proteid matter we must always have," and shows how we can obtain it by the use of the plainest, commonest, most easily obtained of foods. We can heartily recommend the book to every house-keeper in Japan, and certainly to every mother.

The Royal Collection of Paintings at Buckingham Palace and Windsor Castle: London, Wm. HEINEMANN, 2 volumes; price to subscribers 20 guineas, net.

ENCOURAGED by the notable and well-deserved success which attended the "Great Masters" series of photogravures, Mr. William Heinemann, of 21 Bedford-st., London, has launched another superb fine-art production and lays the picture-loving world under a great debt of obligation. To dwellers in distant possessions of the British Crown as well as to residents of foreign countries generally such a publication as this comes as a great and priceless boon. To them, in fact, such a collection of photogravures will appeal even more strongly than to the King's subjects who have not strayed beyond the four corners of the home-land, for the home-stayers have the opportunity, which the overseas men and women certainly have not, of seeing the King's treasures at first hand whenever they will.

The two volumes of the Royal Collections of Paintings are imperial folio in size and comprise 100 photogravures of pictures in Buckingham Palace and 80 from Windsor Castle. The Buckingham Palace pictures were ready on October 16th of last year, but the Windsor Castle pictures cannot be delivered to subscribers until May 15th, 1906. These photogravures are charming specimens of artistic craftsmanship, surpassing even the "Great Masters" series in point of effective treatment, and they are printed on pure rag paper, thus ensuring permanency. The introduction and descriptive text which accompanies each picture are by Mr. Lionel Cust, M.V.O., Surveyor of the King's Pictures and Works of Art, and it goes without saying that he has done his portion of the work excellently well. We quote the following from his introduction:

The Royal Collection of Pictures dates back to the reign of King Henry VIII., some of the early portraits still existing being mentioned in the inventory of that King's collection as early as 1542. During the reigns of his three children and successors many important paintings were added to the Royal Collection, so that at the accession of James I. there were already many paintings of great value belonging to the Crown, by Holbein, Antonio Moro, Lucas d'Heere, Pourbus, Marcus Gheeraerts, and others, many of which have survived to the present day, chiefly portraits, but including some historical paintings of the greatest value. Under James I. a series of portraits were added by the Court-painters of the day, Paul Van Somer, Daniel Mytens, Miereveldt, Gerard Honthorst, and others. The first art collector and connoisseur in the Royal Family was Henry, Prince of Wales, the eldest son of James I., who in his short life formed the nucleus of an important collection of paintings. After his death this collection became the property of his younger brother, Charles, who was to succeed his father as Charles I.

Charles, as Prince of Wales, had already acquired a remarkable collection of paintings and statuary before he succeeded to the throne. Even at this early age he was a worthy rival to the great collector of his day, Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, and he found a rival and imitator himself in his favourite, George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. From all parts of Europe the treasures of art were brought to swell the collections of Charles I., Arundel, and Buckingham. When Charles and Buckingham went on their celebrated journey to Spain, they returned laden with works of Art, which Spanish hospitality deemed it incumbent to bestow upon them. In 1629 Charles I. made his most important acquisitions, by purchasing the whole collection of the Duke of Mantua, including the great series of "The Triumph of Julius Caesar," by Mantegna. In 1630 the King acquired the famous "Seven Cartoons" of Raphael.

Charles I. has a high reputation in the history of art, not only as a collector, but also as an expert, and many stories are told which testify to his skill as a connoisseur. In 1639 a catalogue was prepared of the pictures and statuary in the Royal Collections by Abraham Vanderdoort, the keeper of the collections, which catalogue, subsequently printed by Vertue, remains as one of the landmarks in the history of picture-collecting.

Charles I. was also indebted for much of the splendour of his collection to the genius of his Court-painter, Anthony Van Dyck, whose principal paintings still remain in the King's possession. This golden age of picture-collecting was, however, brought to an end by the outbreak of the Civil War. After the execution of the King, the Parliamentary Government found themselves confronted with financial difficulties of a very serious nature, to meet which it was resolved that the personal estates of the late King and his family should be inventoried, appraised and sold, except where the State thought fit to reserve them. The dispersion of the collection took about four years to accomplish, and from the proceeds the debts of the Royal Family and household were discharged, either in cash or in batches of pictures and works of art.

So great, however, was the reputation of the collection, that foreign monarchs and amateurs sent their agents to compete for the pictures. Philip IV., the Archduke Leopold (Regent of the Netherlands), Queen Christina of Sweden, and Cardinal Mazarin all sent agents to the sale. The banker, Jabach, bought many pictures, which eventually were acquired by Louis XIV. of France, and a Dutch amateur, Van Reynst, was also a large purchaser. In this way many priceless works by Titian, Raphael, Mantegna, Correggio, and others have become the pride of such great collections as the Louvre, in Paris, and the Imperial and Royal Galleries at Vienna, Munich, Madrid and elsewhere, though they once belonged to the Crown of England.

At the Restoration an attempt was made to reconstitute, as far as possible, the collection of pictures. Many were found still in the possession of the late King's retainers, and were recovered by persuasion or by compulsion. The States General of Holland purchased the collection formed by Van Reynst, and presented them to Charles II. In this way the great bulk of the collection was recovered, but some of the more priceless gems had passed away beyond recovery. Charles II. and his successor, James II., did little to add to the Royal Collection, except in the matter of portraits by Lely, but the catalogue of the pictures in the collection of Charles II., drawn up by William Chiffinch after his death, shows how valuable were the remains of Charles I.'s collection, which had been recovered for the Crown. William III., who transferred the royal residence from Whitehall, which had been devastated by a fire, in which some valuable works of art perished, to Kensington Palace and Hampton Court, like a good Dutchman, added some valuable Dutch paintings to the Royal Collection, but he more than compensated for these additions by removing some valuable paintings to Holland, which his successor, Queen Anne, was unable to recover from the States General. The first two Georges were no lovers of art, but a new royal connoisseur appeared in Frederick, Prince of Wales, eldest son of George II., who purchased some very important paintings. It is possible that it was to this Prince, whose life was prematurely cut short, that the negotiations were due, which resulted in the purchase by George III. of the extensive collection of paintings by Venetian artists of the 18th century, Canaletto, Zuccarelli, and others, which was the largest accession to the collections since the day of Charles I. Though no connoisseur himself, George III. was a steady patron of English art, which is well represented by fine examples of the great portrait-painters of this date.

George IV. combined with a love of display and extravagant tendencies, the taste and feeling of a true connoisseur. He was a liberal patron of Gainsborough, Hoppner, Lawrence, and other native artists, and he had the good sense and the good luck to follow the prevailing inclination for the Dutch School of painting, and with the advice of the best amateurs and professionals to form a collection of Dutch paintings, which is now perhaps without a rival. As an art collector George IV. will always be famous, not only for the extent and cost of his acquisitions, but for the fortunate prescience which enabled these works of art to be acquired at what would now be considered very reasonable prices.

The short reign of the sailor-king—William IV.—left no mark on the Royal Collections; but the accession of Queen Victoria and the Queen's marriage with Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha marks another epoch in the history of art. In the early days of their married life the Queen and Prince Albert devoted much of their time to the cultivation and encouragement of the arts. They rearranged the collections in the Royal palaces. Prince Albert formed a select and, as events have shown, very important collection of early Italian paintings at Osborne, and also acquired en bloc the important collection of early German and Netherlandish paintings formed by Prince Ludwig von Oettingen-Wallerstein. The Queen extended her patronage to many painters—Edwin Landseer, John Phillip, Frederic Leighton, and others; and it was only due to the low standard of painting in England and on the Continent at this date that so many of the paintings acquired by the Queen and Prince Albert have so little value in the eyes of modern critics. The lamented death of Prince Albert in 1861 put an end to these artistic enterprises, and for the remainder of her long and useful life Queen Victoria preferred to cherish the memory of what Prince Albert had achieved, and as far as possible refrain from disturbing what his hands had put in order.

It thus came about that the accession of King Edward VII. proved a favourable opportunity for a complete revision and re-arrangement of the Royal collection of works of art, to which some important additions were now made from His Majesty's own private collection. The paintings were re-arranged in the Royal palaces and classified, numerous pictures being brought to light which had long been lost to view. Through this re-arrangement, the extent and value of the collection of paintings came perhaps for the first time to be fully appreciated. Nearly every great painter of note is represented—Holbein, Titian, Velasquez, Rembrandt, Van Dyck, Hogarth, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Hoppner, Leighton, Millais, Wilkie, Landseer, Meissonier, and countless others of note.

It is a section of these paintings that the present work is destined to exhibit to the public, many of them being practically unknown and for the most part inaccessible to students and connoisseurs.

Our readers will gather from this Introduction that King Edward has thrown open a lordly treasure house, and art-lovers throughout the world should show their appreciation of his generosity by giving their heartiest support to this magnificent édition de luxe.

THE PRESS LEAGUE.

A meeting of the Newspaper League was held at the Maple Club, Shiba Park, Tokyo, on Friday, Jan. 19th, at 6 p.m. instead of at 4 p.m. as announced. About seventy representatives of Tokyo and Yokohama newspapers were represented, including the Deutsche Japan Post, Japan Gazette, Japan Advertiser and Japan Mail. After a two hours' wait the meeting was opened with an address by Mr. T. Yokoi, M.P., of the Nichi Nichi, who referred to the Imperial Edicts proclaimed on the occasion of the Tokyo disturbances for the restriction of the newspapers and for the administration of Tokyo by martial law. He spoke strongly against the Katsura Cabinet in this connection. On the motion of the speaker and by consent by all present, Mr. K. Minoura, M.P., proprietor of the Hochi, then took the chair. Mr. K. Yenoji of the Yorozu Choho, representing the standing committee of the Press League, made a report with reference to the steps the committee had taken as regards the Imperial edicts. Mr. Y. Yamaguchi, M.P., President of the Jiyu News Agency, read a draft of a resolution denouncing the Katsura Cabinet for its recent action against the press, which was declared to be unconstitutional. This was adopted, and as it was considered that the objects which had led to the formation of the League were now attained, it was agreed to dissolve it but that when necessary circulars should be issued by the Standing Committee, which was elected to consist of representatives of the Nichi Nichi, Jiji, Asahi and other journals and news agencies.

FIRES.

Fire broke out on the night of Jan. 17th in the well-known Buddhist temple Hoshō, at Hatogaya near Urawa, destroying the building. A man was killed while struggling to remove some property.

At 5 a.m. on Jan. 19th, fire broke out in the district of Awa, Chiba prefecture, destroying seventy-two houses.

A Matsuzawa telegram says that on the night of Jan. 20th, fire broke out at Niihama, destroying sixty houses.

At 2 p.m. on Jan. 23rd, fire broke out in Aioi-cho, Kanda, Tokyo, destroying fourteen houses.

On the evening of Jan. 24th, fire broke out in one of the Hokkaido Colliery and Railway Co.'s lighters in the canal near Akashi-cho, Tsukiji, Tokyo. One man was killed.

An outbreak of fire occurred early on the morning of Jan. 24th in Kamiya-cho, Shiba, Tokyo, destroying twenty-two houses, and one godown. An old woman was killed and a man severely injured.

On the morning of Jan. 22nd, B. Kamiya (64) a wealthy merchant in Abura-cho, Nihonbashi, Tokyo, murdered his second son, Gennosuke (31) by stabbing him in the throat with a short sword. It appears that the victim was guilty of dissolute conduct and committed dishonest acts for which he had been punished seven times with imprisonment. Lately he had often demanded money from his father and used threats. On the occasion of the tragedy, he assaulted his father with a sword. The father, however, took the weapon and attacked the son with it. He gave himself up at the Nihonbashi Police Office.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

We had no space in our last Summary for an epitome of an excellent essay which appeared in the December Taiyō from the pen of Dr. H. Otsuka. Dr. Otsuka writes as a psychologist and his observations bearing on the working of the Japanese national mind during the war and after the declaration of peace merit the attention of thoughtful people. The title of his article is "The Nation's Mental Depression." He traces the causes of the bitter disappointment felt by the whole nation for some time after the signing of the Portsmouth Treaty of Peace. The attitude of the national mind to the war in its early stages Dr. Otsuka describes as characterized by determination and expectancy combined with a certain amount of anxiety. When on land and on the sea Japan won victory after victory, the nation reached a state of jubilation which had never before been experienced in the same degree. Self-confidence that was quite new was the natural mental product of the unparalleled success. Then we began to say to ourselves, observes Dr. Otsuka, "If we have shown ourselves capable of doing such great things in war, there can be no task in time of peace that is too difficult for us." Our young men saw visions and our old men dreamed dreams concerning the nation's future greatness. One of the conditions of peace, we thought, would be the payment to us of a huge indemnity that would enable us to occupy an unrivalled financial position in the Far East. In international politics as far as this quarter of the world is concerned we were to take the lead. In civilization, instead of continuing to borrow from the West, we were to figure as the pioneers of the new type of civilisation we Japanese have evolved, a type which has blended the best elements of the Oriental and Occidental systems. The yellow peril indeed! We felt that we had it in us to show that we could prove a yellow blessing to the world. Prior to the Portsmouth peace as a nation we were up in the seventh heaven of delight. When the terms of peace were made known our spirits dropped to zero. The feeling throughout the country was one and the same. We felt that we went to the Portsmouth Conference as conquerors, that we stated our terms as conquerors, but that when pressure was brought to bear on us we gradually receded from the position we had taken up and accepted the most unfavourable terms. There is no doubt an explanation or there may be several explanations, of how this came about. But unfortunately these explanations do not help much to remove existing national dissatisfaction. Whether it is true that foreign pressure was brought to bear on us, or whether peace was forced on us by the state of our finances or by military exigencies which could not be overcome we are unable to determine. In either case the national disappointment is the same. The theory that our diplomacy was unduly influenced by a spirit of generosity, in my opinion, says Dr. Otsuka, may be dismissed as untenable. We went into the Conference with strictly business notions. Our first demands showed no desire to forego the rights for which we had fought. Our action in the later days of the Conference was certainly not the result of a sudden fit of generosity, as some people seem to imagine. On the necessity of accepting the terms of peace offered the Government and the general public disagree. The Government maintains that the circumstances were such that they were obliged to make peace, and they accuse the general public of ignorance of the real state of affairs and of entertaining ambitious ideas which could never be realized by a country like Japan. The Katsura Government did its best to allay the general feeling of hostility to the Portsmouth peace terms, but it succeeded only very partially. The feeling exists as strong to-day as it ever did. The notion that the results obtained by the war are not worth the enormous sacrifice of life and treasure involved prevails very widely. And there are not a few who are beginning to say that the war was a foolish affair, and that if patriotism commands only such mean notice as it has received it had better not be encouraged.* In future, say the malcontents, we shall beg to be excused from making big sacrifices for the State. No Government can afford to treat with contempt such sentiments as these when held by a large section of the nation. Already the effect of the general dissatisfaction with the Government's action is seen in the withholding of money needed for such enterprises as the building of a volunteer fleet. There is one thing that the semi-feudal Katsura Government failed to realize, and that is that the old feudal form of patriotism are in this country giving place to the modern European and American type of patriotism. In Japan it has been always the custom to expect people to fight loyally for those in power without regard to the policy rulers may adopt or the rewards they may bestow. There are no doubt hundreds and thousands of Japanese who still hold to the feudal type of patriotism and who are prepared to fight and make big sacrifices from a mere sense of duty. But there is also an ever growing section of the nation which is only ready to serve the Government when it approves of its policy and thinks it is to its interest to do so. After what has happened it would be very impolitic for any Government in this country to rely solely on the old type of blind patriotism, for the carrying out of a great national enterprise (Nan demo dajji ga okotta naraba, Kimi ni chi, mata kuni ni hōko save sureba yoi no de aru to iu yō na keppaku na dōtokushin wo motte oru hito mo arimashō. Zuibun takusan arimashō, shikashi sō in kokoromochi ga itsu made mo Nihon kokumin ippan no kokoro de aru to omotte, sore wo ate ni shite, Seifu ga mata mata taijiyō wo kuwadate yō to suru koto ōi ni meate ga hazurete, yōdai (恨恨) suru toki ga aru to wa takushi wa osoreru no desu). There are no doubt a good many people who accept the Government's explanation of the acceptance of unfavourable peace terms. "We got as much as with our resources it was possible for us to obtain," says the Government. "Those Japanese who say we ought to have got more ignore the fact that neither our armies nor our finances could have stood the strain put upon them by further protracted campaigns." But in as far as this theory has been accepted national self-confidence has, as a natural consequence, declined. The history of the war seemed to show that we had nothing to fear from the Russians. Victory followed victory, and there was no great repulse. But according to the Katsura Government had the war been continued longer the tables might have been reversed. They said in effect we have accomplished about as much as we are capable of accomplishing. This conclusion, if accepted, must damp national ardour and shake the unbounded confidence which during the war we placed in our troops. Whether the view of the Government is right or wrong, the effect of the wide acceptance of their theory cannot but prove a set-back to national enterprise. The feeling among many is, "We are not the nation we took ourselves to be. We have over-estimated our powers." The resignation of the Katsura Government and the assumption of power by statesmen who hold different views will do little towards restoring the self-confidence which existed prior to the publication of the terms of the Portsmouth peace. There are many indications that the stubbornness with which the Government have maintained that they got as good terms as the power at their disposal allowed of has bought over a crowd of waverers to their side, who now are very sceptical as to Japan's possessing the strength she was supposed to have had.†

To sum up, the way in which the nation was treated by the Katsura Government during the negotiations for peace has created such hostility in the minds of the Japanese people as a whole that should there come another great crisis in which the Government had to ask for support beyond the power of Law to demand and contrary to the interests of the people to voluntarily give, if it had to call upon the nation to make a great sacrifice, the sacrifice would not be made. The men in power would then perceive how dire are the consequences of contempt for public opinion at such a crisis as that through which we have passed. . . . There are those who maintain that the discontent of the people concerning the results of the war has been worked up by the newspapers and by stump orators and that hence it is not worth serious discussion. But this is not the case. The sentiments to which I have drawn attention are universally held, and it will be found to be no easy matter to uproot them. The Portsmouth Conference entirely changed the nation's outlook. The rapid expansion, the vastly augmented prestige that we had anticipated to be the result of the war were shown to be unattainable, and so to-day we find ourselves still in the position of a small island country far removed from the big Western world. Our commerce and industry will doubtless go on increasing; our art and literature and our religion will undergo further development, but in the record of the great events of the world there will, I fear, be little about Japan.

* We ourselves heard two soldiers expressing these sentiments in the train on their return from the war. We believe them to be very common. — (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

The subject of the independence of the Imperial University has been discussed in newspapers and magazines almost ad nauseam. The question at issue may be stated in a very few words. It is this: Can an institution that is financially dependent on the Department of Education claim the right to administer its affairs just as it pleases without consulting the Mombushō? In the Character Sketch contributed to the January number of the Taiyō, under the heading, "The sacrificed Mr. Yamakawa Kenjiro," Mr. Toyabe Shunkō discusses the relation of the University to the Department of Education in a very sensible way. He says in effect that there are a good many people in the world who prefer to spend money supplied by another in their own way without consulting the donor, but that few donors are prepared to permit this, and if the right be not willingly granted by the donor, the recipient of the money has really no cause for complaint at all. It is universally admitted that at present the Imperial Universities cannot be rendered financially independent. The Department of Education might, were it so disposed, supply the two great institutions with ample funds and leave the administration to the teaching faculty of each establishment. But it is not so disposed for various reasons. So each President in turn from Mr. Watanabe Kōki to Mr. Yamakawa has been subject to the control of the Minister of Education. Numerous objections to the arrangement have been plausibly stated, but no Cabinet has seen fit to take them into serious consideration. Public sentiment is doubtless in favour of allowing professors at the University to teach as they please and even to publicly oppose the Government when they consider it to be acting unwisely. But for such a radical change as this would involve hitherto no Cabinet has been prepared. But as to Mr. Yamakawa's action it has throughout been very noble. He had the sympathy of the whole teaching faculty with him. No less than a hundred odd professors protested against the steps taken by Mr. Kubota, the Ex-Minister of Education, to remove him from the Presidency. . . . It is difficult to see that the commotion made by the professors has effected anything beyond compelling Mr. Kubota to resign. It certainly has not helped forward the cause of the independence of the University very much; though Mr. Yamakawa resigned in the hopes of effecting this desirable end. As far as one can see the incident will not materially change the attitude of the Government to Tokyo's great seat of learning.

Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō writes in the Taiyō at some length on "The Tōkyō Imperial University," giving a history of the development of the institution and urging the importance of making it independent of politics. He says that the interference of Ministers of Education who know little about higher education with the affairs of the University has been an habitual cause of friction between the Department of Education and the Tōkyō Imperial University. The selection of men to act as Ministers has, as a rule, been marked by an utter disregard of the qualifications required in an official whose will is to be obeyed in the University. Hence disturbances like that concerning Dr. Tomizu's suspension. There is hardly any limit to the harm which an ill-informed, headstrong, blundering official may effect in a short time when at the head of the Education Department. The Imperial University faculty certainly has far higher ideals than are to be found in a Government department like the Mombushō. That the men whose ideals are low should govern those whose ideals are high is a calamity that calls for speedy remedy. This is the gist of what Dr. Inoue has to say and this too is the gist of an article on the same subject by Dr. Tomii.

Mr. Shimada Saburō, in a concise article on "Three Great Duties," published in the January Taiyō, insists on the necessity of (1) extending the franchise; (2) of abolishing the practice of granting exemption from military service to certain schools only and denying it to others; (3) and of shortening the term of military service. On the last subject Mr. Shimada says that in most cases a year and a half's drill is quite sufficient to turn out efficient soldiers, and that it is a waste of time and labour to insist on the 3 years' service, as is now done. In respect of the partiality shown to certain schools arbitrarily selected by the Mombushō, Mr. Shimada's remarks are much to the point. Excellent private schools are handicapped by not being able to secure for their students the privilege of exemption from military service. Mr. Shimada advocates equality of treatment in education and military service alike and the abolition of the pernicious practice of favouring state schools as such apart altogether from their merits as educational agencies.

Count Okuma contributes a somewhat racy article to the January Taiyō on "Japan's policy in Korea." Here is his introduction:—In defining man's nature certain learned men have called him "A laughing being." The horse may be defined as a "runner." As in the year cycle this is the "Horse Year," we have laughing and running combined. But there are many ways of laughing and many ways of running. There is the innocent, joyful, natural laughter of childhood and youth, there is the laugh of anger, the smile of contempt and the grin of pain. So there are many kinds of running; some of which compare very unfavourably with the graceful, rapid movements of the horse. In Korea we have laughed and we have run. But our laughter has expressed contempt and anger rather than delight and our running has resembled that of the most awkward class of animals. The motion of a horse is regular, and in running his destination is fixed. But in Korea we have been floundering along aimlessly in a verugly fashion. People say glibly, continues Count Okuma, that our policy in Korea has now been determined, so there is not much cause for concern. It may have been determined on paper, but the carrying out of any satisfactory policy in a country like Korea must prove to be a work of enormous difficulty. We have taken from the Korean Emperor and the Korean Government all the power they have hitherto wielded, and so we have rendered ourselves entirely responsible for the administration of public affairs throughout the country. Failure henceforth, in the eyes of the world, will be no longer Korean failure, but Japanese failure. Many of our politicians do not realize what a big thing we have undertaken. We shall start to work with an ideal, but shall at once discover that we are working in conjunction with a set of officials who care not a straw for our ideal; who will only seek to enrich themselves at our expense and who are not to be weaned from their corrupt ways in a short time. There is a danger that in our eagerness to reform the country we shall act too despotically. It is most undesirable that we should rob the Emperor of all dignity and make him a mere puppet. He should be encouraged to keep up the state becoming to a King, and money should be furnished to him for this purpose. He should be allowed to confer rank and honour on favourites of who are not connected with politics. The Korean nobility too should not be permitted to sink into poverty and obscurity under the new regime. Let us not be too sure that we shall succeed in this novel experiment of ours. To preserve the golden mean between excessive liberality and excessive despotism will be no easy matter. Local administration will be found to bristle with difficulties owing to the traditions, customs and want of education among the peasantry. To try and follow Japanese methods straightaway will certainly end in failure. The preparation of railways, the opening of mines, the starting of new industries, the development of trade—these and many other undertakings will all demand our attention. The profits accruing from our administration will come gradually. Our aim must be to benefit the Koreans directly and ourselves only indirectly. But the peninsula is tolerably rich in resources, and so in time it ought to become a source of wealth to us.

Writing in the Shigakkai (Historical World) Mr. M. Endō points out that the term Yamato-damashi (Japanese national spirit), has been used in different senses from time to time. His article on this subject is founded on a paper read before the members of the Gakushikaiin by Dr. S. Kurokawa 21 years ago (published in No. 2, Vol. IX of the Society's Transactions). The term Yamato-damashi, according to this authority does not occur in ancient literature at all. But in the middle ages it began to be used in quite a peculiar sense. One of the results of the study of Chinese literature was a large amount of isolation from the world and unfamiliarity with political and social affairs. The term Yamato-damashi hence got to be used in the sense of worldly-wise. It was applied to the men who instead of, or in addition to, giving most of their time to the study of a foreign literature, devoted attention to the affairs of Japan, were practical in spirit instead of being academic. The word has in recent times only come to bear the meanings, national temperament, national spirit and chauvinism.

"The Views of Viscount Akimoto on the Genroku period" (1688—1704) is the title of a short article in the Shigakkai. After calling attention to the famous Genroku pattern, which for centuries was highly prized by Japanese drapers and no less appreciated by foreign traders, the Viscount passes on to discuss the general characteristics of this period. It has been denounced, says the Viscount, as an age of luxury and licentiousness. Undoubtedly compared with the early part of the 17th century the last three decades were marked by dissolute habits especially among the higher classes. But art, literature and philosophy were perhaps never more prosperous than at that time. The art of the Genroku period possesses charms of its own.

In an article on love and marriage among the Esquimaux published in the Shigakkai No 8, Vol. VII we are told that the Esquimaux do not believe it possible for twins to be born. They think it a great dishonour to have no children; their families are usually small. The births of Male children cause much more pleasure than those of females.

The Chūokōron has been somewhat enlarged and the price has been raised. In addition to a few fairly good articles in the January number there is the usual supply of translated articles. A Mr. K. Shimoda and Mr. Ebina Danjō write on that perplexing subject, as far as this country is concerned, the social intercourse of young men and young women. Mr. Shimoda maintains that until the respect for women felt in Western countries is felt here, it will be necessary to place many restrictions on social intercourse between the sexes. In this matter the times move very slowly and imitation of foreign ways is held to be dangerous by many enlightened men and women. But by degrees the foreign system with some few modifications will doubtless be practised here, says Mr. Shimoda.

Mr. Ebina Danjō's article shows that he is in favour of radical changes. He strongly disapproves of the practice of making women sit apart from men at public assemblies. In this way a family is broken up and half the enjoyment of attending entertainments is lost. Just as men and women sit side by side in the tram car and the railway train, so should they in the lecture hall. Even in Japan the notion that men can get on without the society of women is incorrect. It is because men desire female society that the geisha are used. If it became the general fashion for men to meet and converse with educated, superior women the practice of summoning geisha to public entertainments would die out. In the case of school girls in their teens and students nearing 20 years of age, they can only be allowed to meet each other in the presence of older people. The practice of sending young girls up from country villages to reside in lodging-houses in the capital quite alone cannot be too strongly condemned. While still at school neither young boys nor young girls have much time for social intercourse, and during that period it may be better that the sexes should keep apart as much as possible. The newspapers are very fond of running down the modern school girl, says Mr. Ebina. But taken as a whole the female students of Japan to-day are in all respects well behaved. At the beginning of the Meiji era most school girls were immoral. Now only a very few are. Education has had the effect of raising the standard of morals among school girls and to-day there are not many girls to be found who are careless about their reputation. Newspaper comments on this subject are too often cruel slanders.

As a general business organ and a magazine that specially devotes itself to the discussion of new Japanese industrial and commercial enterprises the Taiheiyo (The Pacific Ocean) has long occupied an unrivalled position. It has just entered on the fifth year of its existence. It commands the services of several well known business men. During the past two years it has undergone enlargement several times. As a supplement to the New Year's number a very useful map has been published giving all the industries of Manchuria, which should prove of great value to business men. It bears the title of Manishu Jitsugyō Chizu, and doubtless can be purchased separately. Much of the information given has been supplied by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, which for a long time past has been collecting statistics bearing on Manchurian enterprises. The mining information is specially valuable. The number of places that produce coal is very large. Gold dust is found at numerous places and the province is shown to be rich in almost every kind of agricultural product.

Dr. Soeda Jūichi contributes to this month's Taiheiyo an article entitled Komponenteki Keizai Mondai (Fundamental Economic Questions), of which the following is the substance. A country's financial condition fundamentally depends on five things:—(1) Population; (2) the Supply of Raw Material; (3) The Cost of Production; (4) Capital and Co-operation; and (5) The General Industrial Policy. Let us consider Japan's situation to-day in regard to these particulars.

(1) Population.—The present population of Japan is about 46,732,000 and the increase is at the rate of about 500,000 per year. The increase is gratifying from one point of view. It means more labour. But there is a risk that we shall have more mouths to feed than we have food for, and that on this account the Malthusian creed, which has been adopted in some parts of Europe and in America, will perforce have to be accepted here. If we can cultivate new land and open up a number of new industries we need not fear the growth of population. We have Formosa and the Hokkaidō lying practically undeveloped, and Korea will yield us much. The question of the supply of food has lately been discussed very seriously in England as a life or death question. Islanders as we are, we cannot afford to ignore it here. It is possible that in time of war we might be entirely dependent on the home supply of food.*

(2) The Question of Raw Material.—The area of Japan is not large compared to the growing population and taking into consideration only productive land. It is quite evident that eventually we shall have to depend on industry rather than agriculture for maintenance. Industry depends on a good supply of cheap raw material. The cotton used in our factories is largely imported from India, China or America. This might in time of war be very awkward. England even is talking about growing her own cotton instead of importing it principally from a country with which she might have to go to war. We ought to take steps for doing the same. We might grow cotton in abundance in Formosa. Our silk production is still imperfectly developed. Our mulberry plantations are insufficient.

(3) —The Cost of Production. It is not enough for us to manufacture sufficient articles for home use. We must be in a position to export manufactured articles to foreign markets, where they will come into competition with manufactured articles from other countries. At present our things are so roughly made that, considering the price asked for them they compare unfavourably with English, American and German goods. In order to reduce the price of production, we must economize labour, make transport by sea and by land cheaper and employ more water-power for driving mills and factories. In reference to labour, though wages are cheaper here than in the West, the results of the work done by our workmen are not so satisfactory as those shown in Europe and America. The Japanese employer gets less for his money than the foreign employer. There is more skill, more perseverance and more conscientious work where European or American workmen are employed. More than this, in many cases men engaged in running small factories in Japan have little capital and little knowledge of proper business methods and organization. Moreover, they are often lacking in integrity, intelligence and zeal. Unless in all these things there are the most radical reforms, the future of our industries will cause great anxiety (Itsu dai-kakushin kaizen wo danko suru ni arasubaba, hōpō sangyō no sento wa jitsu ni yūryo ni taye-saru nari.)

(4) Capital and Co-operation. For the improvement of our manufactures capital is needed, and in the main it must be locally supplied. The taking up of foreign loans should only be encouraged for some very big and exceptional enterprise. The amount of capital in the possession of a people depends on their general habits and ways of living to a large extent. If extravagance is avoided, economy practised and saving becomes a regular practice, wealth gradually accumulates. Unfortunately in this country we are still suffering from the effects of feudalism, which in many ways encouraged idleness and want of thrift. The number of people who loaf around and do next to nothing is still very large. The reckless spending of money is still admired a good deal, and the old contempt for money-making as such is cherished by thousands of educated people. Hence it is that compared to the size of the population the amount of capital available for business purposes is small. There is far too much jealousy and pettiness among our business men. Co-operation such as is now witnessed in all progressive Western countries is practically unknown here. Our railways are a case in point. They are badly worked and uneconomically managed, because there are owned by different companies or by the Government. But in other businesses the same thing is to be seen. There are cement companies and paper-factories that cannot be got to co-operate with each other. Consequently it sometimes happens that a large foreign order cannot be executed owing to the rivalry of the companies. In America the trust system is doing wonders in the matter of supplying the world with cheap goods. There is only one way of turning out first-class articles at low prices, and that is by running business on a big scale.

(5) The Industrial policy to be adopted. (a) We must pay far more attention to industrial education, making it universal. It is not a thing that can be done in any country in a day, but that it can be accomplished in a most effective way has been more than demonstrated by what Germany has effected. (b) We must cultivate among ourselves greater respect for labour. Our people must be taught to feel that work is divine. Till this comes industrial progress will be slow. (c) The Government must do more than it has done to promote the growth of industry. Laws that impede its development should be abrogated. Let the Government put a stop to waste and extravagance as much as possible while affording all the facilities they can for the development of industry. The war has brought with it new responsibilities. The burdens of the nation can only be met by opening up fresh sources of wealth.

Baron Kaneko has a very optimistic article in the Taiyōhei on "The place Japan occupies in the Pacific and measures for developing her national strength." He thinks that one result of the war will be to enable Japan eventually to hold the same position in the Pacific Ocean as England does in the Atlantic as regards the carrying trade and general commerce. He thinks that the present time affords to Japan a unique opportunity for showing the world that she is a country that can excel in times of peace as well as in war. Baron Kaneko purposes continuing the discussion of the development of commerce in his next article. Among the things he advocates as necessary are the encouragement of shipbuilding, the extension of industrial education, the retention of the Chinese ideographs reforms in industry, and an economic alliance with America (Nichi-Bei Keizai Dōmei).

YOKOHAMA SEAMEN'S MISSION.

We have received from Rev. W. T. Austen, the report and accounts of the Yokohama Seamen's Mission, from which it will be seen that this most valuable and deserving institution continues to do good work in its special field. The following is the report to Dec. 31st, 1905:—

The Chaplain has great pleasure in presenting to the subscribers and friends of the Mission, his report and financial statement for the year 1905.

The year under revision was one of much anxiety. One of the chief difficulties was caused by the Mission launch Gleaner being ordered by the local marine bureau to be docked for extensive repairs, which meant not only that she would not be available for use for more than two months, but also added a large item to the expenses for the current year. Thanks, however, to the many friends of the Mission, not the least among whom were nearly fifty shipmasters, who contributed about six hundred yen, and ships' officers and crews six hundred and fifty yen more, to the Launch fund, a sufficient amount was received to meet all the liabilities and to carry over a good balance to begin the New Year.

The amount of over 1,000 yen given to the work by captains, officers and seamen of the merchant ships visiting the port, is a sufficient reply to one or two critics, that "the Mission does nothing for merchant seamen."

The foreign merchant shipping in the harbour has been regularly visited by the Chaplain, and the Japanese by Mr. Kanaiwa, his assistant, day by day throughout the year. A friendly welcome has been extended to one and all, and personal invitations given to attend the regular services, meetings, and social entertainments held at the Seamen's Institute.

Officers and seamen in the General, U. S. Naval, and R. N. Hospitals have also been regularly visited. The seamen's free reading and recreation rooms at the Institute in French Hatoba Street have been open daily from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m., to seamen of all nations. Also the Institute at No. 20, Kaigan Dori, to Japanese seamen. The privileges and benefits of these institutions have been enjoyed by a large number of seamen, mostly from the merchant ships, as the war ships have been absent for the greater part of the year. For two weeks in October the British Fleet were in port, and during that time upwards of 200 of their crews slept at the Institute. The crews of the six torpedo boat destroyers attended the services at the Seamen's Institute Church, on the two Sunday mornings they were in port. Admiral Noel also kindly called and went over the Institute, and was very pleased to leave fifty yen in aid of the working expenses.

The American battleship Wisconsin was also here in October, and divine service was conducted on board by the Chaplain.

Three religious services, and one social entertainment have weekly been held in the Institute during the year, with very good attendances. On Christmas Day, and at Watch Night, the attendances at the services were very large, and the offertory at the former amounted to 68.11 yen, which was given to the Famine Fund. On Christmas Day gifts and cards were given to forty sailor patients in the various hospitals, and on Boxing Day a Christmas entertainment was provided at the Institute at which nearly fifty seamen were present. A great many captains, officers, and apprentices have been entertained at the Chaplain's private residence, No. 60-c, Bluff, by Mrs. Austen and her three daughters, and numerous letters have been received from distant ports in grateful remembrance of the happy times spent at Yokohama.

The Chaplain avails himself of the present opportunity to thank most heartily all the subscribers to and friends of the Mission, (many of whom have subscribed to the work for upwards of thirty years), for their continued support, to the local press for free copies of the daily papers, and other kind favours, and to all others who have contributed books, magazines and newspapers, and cast off clothing. Also Mrs. W. K. Wilson, the honorary organist, and to Mr. W. K. Wilson for auditing the accounts. And last, but not least, to the Rev. A. R. Morris, the honorary treasurer of the Mission.

The Statistics for 1905 are:—

2,419 Visits to Merchant Ships, 41 to Men of War, 787 to Sailors' Homes and Boarding Houses, 394 to Hospitals. 77 Services afloat, 161 in Institute, 160 in Hospitals. Holy Communion, afloat 1, on shore 26. Held Bible Readings in Boarding Houses 19. Temperance Meetings 11, Magic Lantern Entertainments, Concerts, etc., 65. 1,012 Attendances of Seamen at Services afloat, 2,294 at Services in Institute, 902 at Services in Hospitals, 94 at Readings in Boarding Houses, 4 at the Holy Communion afloat, 176 at the Holy Communion on shore, 214 at Temperance Meetings, 1,022 at Entertainments and Concerts. 8,106 Frequenting the Institute. Sold 13 Bibles, Enrolled 22 Temperance Seamen, 1 Mission Helper. Issued 2 Service Boxes. Offertories in Seamen's Church £18.16.10.

The Financial Statement shows that the receipts on account of the Seamen's Free Reading Room Fund amounted to yen 1,935.18 and that the expenditure left a balance of yen 66.75. For the Steam Launch Fund there were receipts of yen 1,747.19 and the expenditure (which included yen 743.58 for repairs) left a balance of yen 88.72. The Seamen's Institute Church Account shows that income and expenditure balanced at a total of yen 183.77.

G. NICKEL AND CO.

At the third annual meeting of the shareholders of Messrs. C. Nickel & Co. Ltd., at Kobe, Mr. A. Woolley presiding, the directors' report and the accounts for the year to Oct. 31st, 1905, were adopted. They showed that the balance brought down to Profit and Loss Account from Working Account, as showing the Gross Profit in the latter's account, is yen 46,665.50, to which adding the balance of yen 10,572.91, brought down from previous year, leaves available yen 57,238.41. It will be observed on reference to the Accounts, added the report, that, after deducting yen 11,632.00, there remains a net profit for the year amounting to yen 45,606.41. An interim dividend of yen 1 per share (equal to 4 per cent.) on ordinary shares was distributed to shareholders on July 20, 1905, absorbing yen 5,000, thus leaving a balance of profit available of yen 40,606.41. From this the directors recommended a further payment to shareholders of yen 2 per share (equal to 8 per cent.) making yen 3 per share or 12 per cent. for the year, absorbing yen 10,000, leaving the balance to be dealt with as follows:

Amount written off for depreciation	Yen
of property .....	20,500.00
Transfer to Marine Insurance Fund...	5,000.00
Balance carried forward.....	5,106.41

The property of the Company, afloat and ashore, has been maintained in an efficient way, and is in first class order and condition,

THE CAMPAIGN WITH KUROPATKIN.

There was a very good attendance at the Public Hall on Monday evening to listen to Mr. Douglas Story's description of his experiences on the Russian side during the late war, and to look at and to admire—as they certainly deserved to be admired—the views which he exhibited in illustration of the campaign. The evening was very cold so that overcoats and wrappings were quite in order even within the Public Hall, but his hearers paid the deepest attention to the lecturer and had by no means tired of him when the time came for him to dismiss them. Mr. Story's address consisted for the most part of a running commentary on the pictures, with anecdotes interspersed.

By way of introduction, Mr. Story having declared his intention to dissociate himself from the politics of the war, told of the news of the outbreak of hostilities being received in Hongkong, and of the state of affairs in Shanghai which, he said, was such that his brain reeled and he hurried away to Nagasaki. There he found that he had passed out of the realm of the spectator and had entered that of the worker. In one short week the Japanese had laid down two miles of railway with platforms and had put down turn-tables, so that the troops and stores were carried straight to the wharves and put on board the steamers. Then he came to Yokohama. Here there was absolutely no sign of the war and when he went to Tokyo and found that it was represented by a large board on which the General Staff moved pegs to represent the various units, he realized that that was not a war for the war correspondent or the military attaché. He retraced his steps, therefore, to Shanghai and thence proceeded north to Newchwang, where there were three gunboats for the protection of the foreign residents, and a battery and a half of Russian guns which were magnified picturesquely in their journals by erudite correspondents. He described the sensation caused by a pilot boat which, signalling by flash-lights the depth of water on the bar, was fired upon by the Russian artillerymen, who hit nothing, but were more successful when the junks in mid-stream attracted their attention—subsequent events in the North Sea casting apparently a somewhat dark shadow over this affair in Newchwang. Among the views displayed in connexion with Newchwang were photographs of Siberian troops, and these led him to say that the fortunes of the war were due to Japan's knowledge of the physical conditions of the country and her acquaintance with the psychological conditions of her enemy. Until the battle of Liaoyang Russia was outnumbered in guns, her troops were untrained and they consisted mostly of Siberian forces. He asked his audience to consider the unsuitability of men accustomed to the wide horizons of the far north to fight in the steep and narrow passes shown in some of his photographs. In such country Gordon or Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders would have rendered a different account of themselves. He commented upon the great disproportion between the generally supposed military strength of Russia east of Lake Baikal and the force actually at her disposal, which it was due to Kuropatkin to state did not at the outbreak of war exceed thirty to forty thousand available for active operations. It was not surprising, therefore, that Kuropatkin should say to him; "At the end of the first month they will say I am inactive; at the end of the second month incapable; at the end of the third month a traitor and at the end of six months—nous verrons!" Mr. Story paid a cordial tribute to the qualities of the Russian soldier, and spoke of Louis Etzel who during the expedition to Peking saved many Chinese women from a fate worse than death, yet was shot by Chinese. He explained the various photographs that he had taken in and about Liaoyang and Mukden, in some of which the officers of the censorate were shown. Apropos of war correspondence he said he did not believe it was at an end as had been said in many quarters. He did not believe that war correspondence would cease so long as war unhappily continued to be waged. It seemed to him that they would always have wise war correspondence concerning itself with the local circumstances of war and not with details as to guns, men, and ammunition which really were only intelligible to the expert few but made war correspondence unintelligible to the general public. If war correspondence was kept within its limits it would maintain its position as one of the higher branches of journalism. Mr. Story was turned back on his way to the Yalu and went to Mukden. Photographs of priestly ceremonial evoked from him the remark that it struck him as very like our own High Church ritual, which called forth some laughter and applause, though he said he did not suggest that the particular picture on view was to be taken as illustrative of the resemblance. A photograph of two or three shapeless objects lying on the plain reminded him that there were usually three to five executions a day, with special matings on Tuesdays and Thursdays. Obtaining permission at last to go to the front he went to Liaoyang and there found that Kuropatkin had made many changes, but, as he pointed out, in many cases the defences were rendered useless by the alteration in the configuration of the country when the kiaolang grew. He commented on the wretched condition of the Russian troops in the months of June and July and the difficulties of transport as the result of the rains, the men being unsufficiently clothed and cut off from their supplies. They always had their soup, however, as a stand-by and this with the ever-present tea served largely no doubt to ameliorate their lot. The battle of Wapang-ho, which he declared to have been the critical fight of the war for upon it depended the fortunes of the Russians for the rest of the campaign, was described by the aid of a plan and reference was made to the small part taken by the Russian cavalry in this and other engagements. In the earlier stages the Japanese kept in the hills while the plains were practicable for cavalry, and later, as at the Battle of Liaoyang, the kiaolang was so high that this expensive arm of the Russian force could not be used. But he protested against the idea that the Cossack had proved his ineptitude in this war. He was one of the finest horse soldiers in the world, and if ever he was encountered on ground suitable for his work he would recover his position in the eyes of his critics. Mr. Story told of the death of his comrade Middleton and spoke highly of the conduct of the doctors and nurses who tended him, and dwelt at some length on the share taken in the campaign by General Keller, rendering a tribute of admiration and esteem to the memory of that distinguished officer. He also took the opportunity of saying that among the Japanese generals lately returned from Manchuria the officer (General Kawamura) who landed at Takushan did as much as any other towards the attainment of the ends of the war. The fighting in and about the Motiening pass was described, and the battle of Tashichiao also had its share of attention. The leading officers of the Russian armies were referred to with sketches of their particular characteristics—Kuropatkin, Rennenkampf and so forth, the Viceroy, Alexieff, being also the subject of a brief description. Finally he said a few words in favour of the Russian medical service. He had heard and read a great deal in criticism of the Russian doctors in the war, but he pointed out that there never had been a medical organization in the world so perfect as to take charge of 60,000 casualties in one week. In London, New York or Berlin a great number out of such a total must be unattended to. It was extremely unfair to attack the doctors and nurses who were working at the front to save life, whereas the responsibility for the conditions there should lie with the statesmen at home who had provoked the war. The men who did their utmost at the front should, he thought, be relieved as far as possible from criticism after the war had ended.—(Applause).

Rev. Dr. Dearing intimated that by the kindness of Mr. Story the proceeds of the lecture would be devoted to the purposes of the Men's Reading Room Association, and called for a vote of thanks to the lecturer which was very cordially rendered.

YOKOHAMA ENGINE AND IRON WORKS, LD.

The half yearly meeting of shareholders of the Yokohama Engine and Iron Works, Ltd., was held on Wednesday afternoon at the office of the company. Mr. B. C. Howard, Chairman, presided and there were also present Messrs. C. K. M. Martin, F. J. Abbott, F. S. James, C. B. Bernard, E. W. Frazar, J. Rosenthal, W. K. Tresize (Manager), J. W. Weaver (Foreman), and R. T. Bell (Secretary).

The notice convening the meeting having been read, the Chairman said:—The Directors have the pleasure to lay before you the accounts for the half year ending November 30th last, from which you will note that with the balance carried forward from last year, after providing for depreciation of buildings, plants and machinery, Directors' and Auditors' fees, we have an available balance of yen 33,149.17. Since our meeting in July last the war with Russia, as you all know, has been brought to a close, and renewed activity in the shipping trade is being felt and this has kept the works busy and the result shows itself in the accounts now presented, which your Directors consider most satisfactory. They recommend a payment of an interim dividend of 5.00 yen per share to be declared at this meeting, which will absorb yen 13,000, leaving a balance of yen 20,149.17 to be carried forward.

The declaration of the dividend having been proposed from the Chair, Mr. C. B. BERNARD seconded and the proposal was adopted.

This was all the business and the CHAIRMAN was about to close the meeting when, Mr. Bernard said—I would like to ask, if the present machinery, plant etc., is sufficiently modern to cope with the increasing shipping and other trade of Yokohama. Considering the great difference in the build and appliances of steamers of to-day as compared to those of vessels at the time the company was first started it would appear necessary that the company should have the latest and most up-to-date machinery sufficient to undertake any kind of repair work offering. The accounts of the company appear to be in a satisfactory condition, and there is apparently no want of work, but possibly the time may come when we shall have to refuse good work for want of the necessary machinery and appliances. I should like to know if this has the attention of the Directors. It will not do to go back, and with the powerful rivals there are in the field it appears to me we should be in a position to hold our own. Whether this can be done with the plant and machinery at present in use I should very much doubt and I would like to ask the opinion of the Board on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN—This matter has had the attention of the Board; they have gone into it very thoroughly and we hope that in the course of a few months we may be able to increase the plant with new and more modern machinery. They therefore hoped to see quite an improvement in the plant.

Mr. BERNARD said that was satisfactory. He had noticed that they had been writing down their plant a good deal and had got down to such a very low point that it seemed quite inadequate to undertake the work on the new ships that were being built.

The CHAIRMAN agreed that the new ships would require new machinery for the execution of repairs and said the Directors had had in view the cost that would be entailed.

Mr. BERNARD said he simply wanted to have information from the Board as to what was being done in the matter.

This was all the business.

Mr. John G. Woolley, of Chicago, editor of the New Voice, Prohibition Candidate for the Presidency of the United States at the time of one of Mr. Bryan's campaigns, will reach Japan shortly on his return from a visit to Australia. He will deliver lectures in this country in the cause of Temperance, of which he is now the leading representative in the United States.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A snowstorm was experienced in Aomori Prefecture on Jan. 17th.

The Kawasaki Shipbuilding Company, Kobe, intends to raise a foreign loan of ten million yen.

Mr. K. Takahira, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, will leave San Francisco to-day, Jan. 25th, for Yokohama.

Lieut.-General Iida, Commander of the First Division, will arrive in Tokyo at 10.39 a.m., on Jan. 27th by train from Hiroshima.

On January 21st and 22nd, snow fell in Sapporo and the surrounding country, being about twelve feet deep at places near Kuromatsu. Traffic on the Hokkaido Railway is interrupted.

Notwithstanding the snowstorm on Wednesday some twenty enthusiasts braved the elements in the afternoon and attended the first practice in Van Schaick Hall of "The Captives of Babylon."

The death is announced of the mother of Marquis Kuroda (descendant of the feudal lord of Chikuzen province), Vice-President of the Upper House. The funeral will take place on Jan. 27th at the Aoyama Cemetery.

Major Prince Kuni, Major Prince Nashimoto, and Lieutenant Prince Kitashirakawa, who recently returned from the front, will give a dinner on Jan. 26th in the Shinjuku detached palace to high officers of the Army and Navy, and Ministers of State.

Mr. F. Carruthers Gould, the famous Liberal cartoonist, whose work has won the approval of the German Emperor, must be numbered among the prophets. In a cartoon published by him in the Westminster Gazette on December 9th, he depicts Mr. A. J. Balfour and the Hon. Alfred Lyttleton, dressed as monks, consoling each other on the joys of retirement. Both these statesmen have been defeated at the polls.

During last year, the yield of copper, iron, kerosene oil, and coal in Japan is reported by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce to have been as follows:

Copper.....	53,538,368 kin.
Iron.....	20,863,078 kwan.
Kerosene Oil.....	1,073,640 koku.
Coal.....	11,581,755 tons.

One kin. = 1,323 lbs; 1 kwan. = about 3.76 kilos; and 1 koku = about 5 bushels.

The Duke of Connaught has been nominated for re-election as Grand Master of English Freemason. Mr. T. F. Halsey, M.P., Deputy Grand Master, announces that the Duke has granted the rank of Past Senior Grand Warden to Viscount Hayashi, and of Past Junior Grand Warden to the Lord Mayor. It was resolved, in accordance with a message from the Grand Master, to alter the constitutions so as to increase the number of Grand Officers by about 20.

The deed appointing Dr. Kochibe as mining expert to the Korean Government was signed on Jan. 12th by the Japanese and Korean Representatives in Seoul. The text of the agreement, according to the Seoul Press Weekly, grants to Dr. Kochibe the right of deciding all matters relating to the mines, which have been previously submitted to the Korean Government. The monthly salary of Dr. Kochibe is to be yen 400 with an allowance of yen 100 for house rent.

Early on the morning of Jan. 23rd a man armed with a short sword broke into the house of Y. Hiwatari, a charcoal and fuel dealer in Tomikawacho, Fukagawa, Tokyo. Hiwatari was absent in Tochigi Prefecture on business and the intruder bound the two servants with cord, and then proceeded to the room where the wife of the merchant Fuku, (24) and an infant, their only son, were asleep. There the man murdered the occupants by stabbing and strangling them. He then set fire to the fulon and stole a small amount of money which was all he could find. After the burglar had gone the servants untied themselves and one of them attempted to put out the fire while the other ran to the Fukagawa Police Station and reported the affair.

It is announced that the Ven. Horace MacCartie Eyre Price, Archdeacon of Osaka, has accepted the new Bishopric of Fukien, which will be concerned with territory taken from the diocese of Victoria, Hongkong. Archdeacon Price was for seven years Principal of the Church Missionary Society Boys' School at Osaka, and was afterwards Principal of the Divinity School there for three years. He became archdeacon in 1901, and has been for some years secretary for the Church Missionary Society at Osaka and in Central Japan.

The Osaka Shosen Kaisha held a general meeting on Jan. 22nd in Tosabori, Osaka. The accounts for the last half of 1905 were submitted to the shareholders. The net income during the period was yen 718,705 to which a balance of yen 164,337, brought from the previous account, was added. Of the total, yen 75,000 was set apart as reserve; yen 10,000 to be paid to employees as bonus; yen 446,660 to the shareholders as a dividend of 5 per cent. for the half year; and the remainder was carried forward to the next account.

News has been received by the P. & O. Agency in Yokohama of the death by a carriage accident of Mr. H. I. Choje, agent in Singapore of the P. & O. Company. Mr. Choje was well known in Japan, having spent several years in Yokohama and Kobe before his transference to Singapore. He was a son of the late Rev. Canon Choje, distinguished by his part in the promotion of congregational music and also by the publication of a work on carols. During his stay in Japan Mr. Choje took much interest in church matters and was one of the honorary organists of Christ Church. He was married and leaves a wife and a young family.

A boy of eleven years, Kosaku by name—he does not know his parents—and apparently a beggar, who usually wanders about in Isezaki-cho, Yokohama, was arrested on Jan. 22nd by the Kotobuki-cho Police on a charge of having set fire on Jan. 10th to the Chinese restaurant, Pak Hatein, Isezaki-cho. According to his statement at the police office, he and another boy started the fire with cotton soaked in kerosene at the rear of the building. During the confusion he tried to steal food from the restaurant. Ah Chinyong, the wife of the proprietor of the restaurant, who was undergoing examination in the Yokohama Local Court on suspicion of connection with the case, was acquitted on Jan. 23rd.

According to the budget recently submitted to the Diet, the Government intends to improve the arrangements of Yokohama Harbour at a cost of about yen 8,180,000 and to complete the work in six years commencing with this year. The following is an estimate of the sums to be spent on Yokohama yearly:

	Various establishments on	Reclamation, land.	Sundry Expenses.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
1906 .....	301,539	598,731	—
1907 .....	397,759	1,764,318	99,730
1908 .....	321,331	1,316,632	77,850
1909 .....	202,894	1,507,828	77,850
1910 .....	—	967,035	77,850
1911 .....	—	312,883	77,850

One-third is to be defrayed by Yokohama city.

On the improvement of Kobe Harbour, the Government proposes to spend yen 3,960,000. The plan is to extend the hatoba, to build another pier, to construct a breakwater on the east side of the new pier, and to reclaim an extent of about seventeen thousand tsubo on which cranes are to be provided, thus facilitating the landing and shipping of cargo.

The First Bank will hold an ordinary general meeting on Feb. 3rd in the Bankers' Club, Tokyo. The net profit for the last half of 1905 was yen 797,414.54 to which a balance of yen 220,109.30 brought from the previous account was added, making a total of yen 1,017,523.84. The following payments are to be made from this amount: yen 39,800 bonus to employees; yen 250,000 as a legal reserve; yen 80,000 as reserve at the branch in Seoul; yen 30,000 as a fund for establishing a new office in Seoul; yen 250,000 as an interim dividend for old shares (yen 2.50 per share or 10 per cent. per annum); and yen 62,500 as interim dividend for new shares (yen 62.5 per share or 10 per cent. per annum); the remainder being carried forward to the next account.

GRAND HOTEL, LD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BRIDGE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—May I be permitted to comment briefly upon the letter of "A much worried Hostess?"

I play Bridge, and for money. In other words I gamble, and to deny it would be useless. I insist upon the value of the point being such that it will prevent players, myself included, making calls that the cards held do not justify. Eliminate this feature, and as far as I am personally concerned, money can be dispensed with. I echo your correspondent's remark "many people are in my position"; but I am confident that for every one person of the class "A much worried Hostess" refers to, there are a dozen of my way of thinking.

There is something to be said for the division of players into groups, but to term these groups Class I, Class II, and so on, would be inferring that the value of the point was a criterion of the quality of the play. I entirely dissent from the statements that the bridge played in one sen games is in any way inferior to that displayed in games where the point has a higher value. There is nothing whatever to warrant such a statement.

A further objection to a division into classes is that it would force one to divulge the state of one's exchequer. No matter how expert a player one may be, there is always the possibility, at 5 sen points, of losing fifty to sixty yen at a reasonably long sitting. X, who is one of the best bridge players in Japan, say, does not feel himself justified in risking such a loss, and consequently joins Class II. Others, who are aware of his skill, mentally, very likely actually, remark "Hard up." X, meantime knows very well that he is being forced to advertise his limited resources.

A fairer nomenclature would be "gamblers" and "bridge players" for five and one sen points respectively, and cards of invitation should bear the words "Bridge (gambling)" or "Bridge (sport)" as the case might be. Those accepting the former invitation would tacitly acknowledge that they were after somebody's money; those accepting the latter would be those who, like myself, did not care a rap about the money, but were anxious to play the game. Your correspondent implies that the value of the point has some bearing upon the quality of the play, when she gives as one reason for not playing to sen points has some bearing upon the quality of the play, when she gives as one reason for not playing to sen points, the fact that she does not play well enough.

May I ask—at what stage is one justified in leaving the 1 sen class for the 5 or 10 sen class? Who is to judge of one's fitness for promotion? Not oneself surely, since there are people whose own opinion of their own play is far higher than that of those they play with. For the same reason others cannot judge one's play. Actually skill has nothing to do with the matter. It is merely a question of how much one has at the bank.

"A much worried Hostess" enlists herself under the banner of the "pothunters," without being aware, I fear, of the light in which they are regarded in athletic circles. She really must excuse me, but I don't believe her a bit when she says she will do nothing unless she gets something at the end. If a man friend told her he had refused a seat in the 'varsity eight, or a place in the cricket team, because there was no cup to be won she would be disgusted with him. One earns no "pot" by breaking the quarter mile record; but fancy being "bored" at attempting it with a good chance of succeeding.

Yours truly,

A GAMBLER BY COMPULSION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Will you allow me a word with regard to Bridge? I am an ardent lover of the game—for itself—and regret exceedingly the opprobrium which has fallen upon it owing to what I believe is its abuse and not its use. I have always steadily set my face against playing for money; and my attitude in this matter is fully understood by my friends. The tendency of the times is so strongly towards gambling, that I feel that all good women cannot set too high a standard in the matter and cannot too unequivocally discourage it. The moral tone of a place depends largely upon its women, who, from the sanctity of their homes, influence their husbands and sons and gentleman friends. A woman who says she cannot give up playing for one or five sen points because it bores her to play without some stake in the game has set up no high standard for herself, and her influence in a community will, unquestionably, not be in the direction of what is noblest and best.

I am Sir, yours truly,

A YOKOHAMA HOSTESS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I have been much interested and amused in reading the correspondence in your paper in reference to Bridge, but why are one and all so anxious to disclaim any desire to add to the contents of their pockets by winning their opponent's money, when we all know, that so long as nature is human, so long will mankind continue to gamble, no matter the game or sport, and I have yet to meet the man or woman whom the pleasure of winning has made other than happy or contented.

Does anyone seriously believe that these delightfully good people who play for love, or nuts, and who vary their afternoons or evenings with such instructive and skilful games as "Hearts," 500, or battledore and shuttlecock play Bridge? Does the fact of winning a box of chocolates at that melancholy entertainment called Progressive Bridge, constitute a Bridge player?

I would undertake to wager that not 5 out of every 6 of these worthy Bridge players know the correct leads, the discards, much less the proper declarations, so don't let the "worried hostesses" continue to worry! I don't think that real Bridge players are likely to cause them any uneasiness if they are not worried in their turn to be present at these functions.

Bridge, we all know, is a popular game, and is essentially one of skill, but until the player has that interest at stake which makes it a point to him, however small, whether he wins or loses, not till then, I say, will he restrain his impulsive calls, learn the leads, remember the cards and regulate his play, and learn what there really is in a game, concerning which so much nonsense is written and opinions give. Your obedient Servant,

Z.

Yokohama, January 23, 1906.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Those players of Bridge who assert that the financial element is only introduced to create an interest, or (as one of your correspondents has stated) to prevent reckless play, are indignant when one suggests that they are gamblers, or that they take any real interest in winning cash. By last mail I received from England the attached newspaper cutting which deals with this point, and which you may consider of sufficient interest to your readers to reproduce.

If Yokohama and Tokio hosts and hostesses adopt a similar method and place boxes for the relief of the famine-sufferers for the receipt of all winnings at their card-tables, I wonder how many people dying of starvation would be saved. (Note:—It takes but five sen to keep an adult comparatively well fed for 24 hours.)

Among other incidents brought to my notice recently, the following stands out prominently.

A young fellow recently "out from home" was invited to spend the evening at a friend's house. The hostess insisted upon him joining one of the bridge tables, (notwithstanding his protests), where the stakes were low, but too high for any fellow drawing less than yen 200 per month. When he left his kind host's house that evening, he had lost more than half a year's income. He explained that he could not possibly pay,—but his fellow players insisted that he must. Perhaps he deserves to be called a "fool,"—if so, the epithet of "knave" seems appropriate for those who take his money.

Tendering an expression of keen appreciation of your article of the 13th inst.

Yours faithfully,

C. G.

[EXTRACT.]

Do people bet at billiards and cards for the sake of the money, or merely to have a little interest in the game?

Mr. Alexander M. Chance, Chairman of the Birmingham Licensing Justices, told the members of the Y.M.C.A. at their annual meeting of an experiment he made to satisfy himself on the point.

He had a billiard table erected at his house in order that his sons and their friends might enjoy a quiet game among themselves. He was told that a little bet on the game, whether the game was billiards or whist gave it an added interest, but the idea that they wished to play for money for the sake of the money was scorned.

"Very well," said Mr. Chance, "you may play for money if you like. You can have shilling, pound or even five-pound note points, if you like; I only make one stipulation. I have here a box for the Children's Hospital, and as you are not playing for the money itself, all the winnings can be dropped in that box. The man who wins will not, of course, begrudge putting the money there, because he is not playing for the money itself, and the man who loses will have the satisfaction of knowing that he has done some good to a deserving institution!"

"What has been the result?" Mr. Chance asked with a triumphant smile. "Why there has not been a single penny put in that box from that source up to this day. That is how I tested the assertion that men do not gamble for the sake of money."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—While all my sympathy goes to "A Gambler by Compulsion," I cannot help thinking the "Yokohama Hostess" must be a very poor player, or at least must know very little about the essence of any game of cards!

Since when can any game of cards be played as "it ought to be" if a certain amount of real interest is not attached to it?

Of all card games Bridge is certainly the least gambling, but since it is played with cards it must, of necessity, contain a certain element of gambling. Let us take a technical example. Suppose the "Yokohama Hostess" playing simply for pleasure, as she says she does; suppose she is "love game" and "love point" when her opponents are "one game in" and say 25 or 26;—she will, in all probability take a much greater risk, (unconsciously perhaps,) to declare "no trumps" than she would if she was playing for 5 sen or 1 sen points! What risk does she run in losing a "big score"? None!! She may reckon on her partner's hand to win the game by declaring "no trumps" anyhow,—and if she loses she loses nothing! Consequently, being a human being, she will, consciously or unconsciously, let herself go to "gamble" on the chance, although there is no money in the game and she destroys entirely the equilibrium of Bridge which is based on the fact that a wrong declaration must not be made, because it might involve the declarer and partner in a great loss,—but if the loss costs nothing but a smile, then what will prevent anybody taking foolish risks because "it is more fun to play 'No trumps,' or because 'It was our only chance, it does not matter if we lost a little quicker,' etc., etc.—It is no more Bridge! The players do not even realize how hands should have been played!"

Therefore let us be honest and admit that Bridge, being played with cards, must contain an element of gambling, and the only means of keeping it to its rules is to have an interest on the game which must compel each player not to follow impulse but to play correct game, for his own sake as well as for his partner; if such interest is withdrawn and no punishment attached to fancy declarations, then it is no longer Bridge but simply a futile and silly pastime.

As to the point played for, there is no difference, except to individuals' pockets, whether it is 10 sen or 1 sen, only it must be for something. I enjoy just as well 20 sen point or 10 sen point or 5 sen point or 1 sen point or ¼ sen points; I love Bridge but I am afraid that such Bridge as advocated by "Yokohama Hostess," whom I am sure is a very good woman, would quickly degenerate into a Nursery childish game! Yours truly,

A TOKYO HOST.

Tokyo, January 23, 1906.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

MONSIEUR F. H.—Je lisais avec plaisir et avec attention votre lettre d'hier, qui me prouve que vous êtes un missionnaire véritable. Je vous écris, en réponse, ces quelques lignes pour vous informer que vous soyez aussi bien malade. Ne doutez pas, mon missionnaire, que je n'ai pas seulement sous les yeux la puissance et l'activité du missionnaire tel qu'il existe en notre siècle; mais on affirme que la doctrine du Christ est facile à concevoir quand il dit: L'enseignement du Christ a un sens métaphysique profond; ce sens est universel, il embrasse toute l'humanité, mais il est aussi clair, simple et pratique, adopté à la vie de chaque homme. Paul, apôtre de Jésus Christ, écrit dans l'épître au Ephésien: "C'est pourquoi prenez toutes les armes de Dieu, afin que vous puissiez résister dans le mauvais jour, et qu'ayant tout surmonté, vous demeuriez fermes. Soyez donc fermes, ayant la vérité pour ceinture. De vos reins, et étant revêtus de la cuirasse de la justice; et ayant pour chaussures les dispositions que donne l'évangile de paix; prenant, par-dessus tout cela, le bouclier de la foi, par le moyen duquel vous puissiez éteindre tous les traits enflammés du malin. Prenez aussi le casque du Salut et l'épée de l'Esprit, qui est la parole de Dieu. Faisant en tout temps par l'Esprit toutes sortes de prière et de supplication; veillant à cela avec persévérance et priant pour tous les saints."

Si vous prenez la grammaire française pour les armes, vous jugez bien, monsieur, que je ne sais pas d'être queris du malade.

Jacques, apôtre de Jésus Christ, dit "quelqu'un est-il malade parmi vous? Qu'il appelle les pasteurs pour lui, et l'oignent d'huile au nom du Seigneur. Et la prière faite avec foi, sauvera le malade." Quelles sont les conditions dans lesquelles vous devez être pour sortir victorieux de la lutte en établissant le royaume de Christ dans le monde? Sans doute, il faut, avant tout, que vous soyez vous-mêmes délivrés du péché.

Qu'est-ce qu'être Chrétien? c'est être comme Christ, me semble-t-il, être son disciple, une imitation de Lui. Croiez-vous que il y a beaucoup de missionnaires en Japon qu'ils soient pratiqué tout ce que bible écrivaint? Si le Christ est revenu, en réalité, que font-ils?

NAILING A FALSEHOOD.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I read this evening, in the report of cables received from Europe, that a daughter of the late Russian General Count Keller is implicated in a plot against the Tsar. I am personally well known to the family of the deceased General and have stayed with them as their guest within the past twelve months. I can assure you the late Count has no daughter living in Russia.

THE "ZIETEN" AFFAIR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—We take the liberty of informing you that we are in receipt of a telegram from the Nordd. Lloyd Head Office in Bremen to the effect that Baron Suematsu authorizes the statement to be given out, that he is now convinced that no discourtesy was intended by the officers of the Zieten towards him, that he is quite satisfied with the arrangements that were provided, and that he does not desire any changes whatever being effected.

We may mention that the wire also contains a paragraph that the Chinese Minister on board the same boat has expressed his full satisfaction with the treatment accorded to him.

Thanking you for inserting the above, we remain,
Yours faithfully,

YOKOHAMA AMATEUR ROWING CLUB.

The following is the thirty-fourth annual report of the Committee of the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club to the meeting to be held on Jan. 26th:

COMMITTEE:—H. C. Lichfield, President; F. J. Hall, Captain; F. H. Abbey, Hon. Treasurer; O. T. Gillon, Hon. Secretary; F. Pollard, O. D. Strone; A. L. Mottu, B. J. Jackson.

In presenting this the 34th annual report your Committee are pleased to be able to say that financially the working of the Club shows a better result than the previous year, but regret that the interest taken by members in Rowing and Swimming has been but small. The entries for the Swimming Races and the Autumn Regatta were so few that the Committee were obliged to abandon these events. Their absence from the usual programme benefited the finances, but was not very creditable to the energy of the younger members. It is to be hoped that a largely increased interest will be taken in the sports of the Club during the coming season.

ACCOUNTS:—These show a credit balance of yen 13,83.02, the profits accruing from the bar amounting to yen 188. To the liberal contributions to the prize fund, the absence of swimming races, aquatic sports, and the Autumn Regatta, may be largely attributed the increase in our credit balance. Your Committee recommend that yen 1,000 be devoted to the redemption of debentures, as they think it advisable to wipe out this debt as soon as possible. A resolution to this effect will be put by the Chairman at the annual meeting.

BAR:—This only shows a profit of yen 188.51 as against about yen 500.00 last year, and is accounted for by the fact that receipts have fallen off from yen 3,800.00 to yen 2,400.00 while working expenses have remained unchanged.

ROWING:—There were a fair number of entries at the Spring Regatta, but the events were not very closely contested. The best thanks of the Club are due to those who so kindly and liberally subscribed to the prize funds. The Interport Regatta was held at Kobe in June. Our representatives won the fours and double sculls, and the K. R. & A. C. the pairs and single sculls. We tender our hearty thanks for the hospitality shown our men.

The Autumn Regatta did not take place for reasons mentioned above, but an unofficial regatta was held and afforded pleasure to the enthusiasts.

BOATS:—These are all in good order, but the four-oared boats will have to have a coat of paint for the next season. It will also be necessary for the incoming Committee to purchase a few sets of four-oar and double scull oars, as at present the Club has no reserve sets. The Pesuit, one of the oldest fours, is in good condition, and will still be very useful especially for the Interport races. The picnic 6-oar boat has not been patronized very much during the season. The Randan has been occasionally used, and there are no repairs to be done to that boat. The skiffs have been well patronized, but Members should handle them more carefully and when taking them to Honmoku and elsewhere should remember that beaching any of the Club boats is against the rules. Repairs largely due to carelessness in this respect have cost a considerable sum.

BATHING BARGE AND LANDING STAGE:—To a large number of Members during the past season the bathing barge has again proved to be a great source of amusement and healthy exercise. The barge has been hauled up for the winter months, and beyond a few repairs and a fresh coat of copper paint the expenses thereon for the coming season will be trifling. The landing stage has been also hauled up for the winter months.

SWIMMING:—Owing to the inclement weather the Swimming Contests had to be abandoned, and to a great extent the weather also damped the enthusiasm we generally see displayed in the polo matches.

HOUSE AND PROPERTY:—During the past year the House has been maintained in good order. It was found necessary to repaint the whole of the exterior, and this work greatly improved the appearance of the building as well as preserving the structure. It is considered there will be no need for any further outlay during the season. A few repairs of an ordinary description may be found necessary on the opening of the season, but these can easily be undertaken by the Club's carpenter. For the protection of members' effects it was thought desirable to fit all lockers with a reliable lock and key, and this work has been completed. It is further thought advisable to charge an annual fee for the rental of lockers.

COMMITTEE:—During the year death claimed a valuable member, Mr. W. Goddard. Mr. Goddard had served the Club actively and efficiently for several years, and always had its best interests at heart.

With the best wishes for the continued prosperity of the Club your Committee tender their resignation.

F. H. ABBEY, Hon. Treasurer.

Examined with Vouchers and found correct.

J. ABBEY, Auditor.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

CHAMBERLAIN RETURNED.

London, January 19.

The returns to the present are: Liberal 171, Labour 27, Unionist 73. Liberal gains 85, Labour 21.

The election for West Birmingham has resulted as follows: J. Chamberlain 7,173, Outhaite (Liberal) 2,094.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

London, January 19.

The Hon. St. John Brodrick (late Secretary for India and during the Boer war, Secretary for War), has been defeated at Guildford. Mr. Henry Chaplin (one of the leading exponents of Protection) has been defeated at Sleaford.

The Liberals have now won 178 seats and the Labour Party 27, while the Unionists have secured 76 seats. The Liberal gains, are 90.

Later.

Lord Stanley, late Postmaster General, has been defeated at West Houghton. Mr. John Morley, Secretary for India, has been elected for the Montrose Burghs.

The returns now stand: Liberals, 205, a gain of 107; Labour Party, 33, a gain of 26; Unionists, 85, a gain of 3; Irish Nationalists, 60.

THE NEW FRENCH PRESIDENT.

The press describe M. de Fallieres as a self-made man of moderate opinions and unassuming habits, and it is generally believed that he will be a second Loubet.

GERMAN SOCIALIST RIOT.

Socialist meetings to protest against the franchise amendment resulted in rioting in Hamburg. The mob assailed the police with bricks. One man was killed and many injured. Barricades were erected, but the rioters were dispersed by sabre charges.

THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR TO JAPAN.

London, January 20.

Governor L. E. Wright, of the Philippines, has been appointed American Ambassador to Japan.

BELGIUM MAKING READY.

The Belgian Chamber of Representatives has passed a bill to fortify Antwerp at immense cost. Belgium is re-arming her artillery with Krupp guns.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

Latest returns are: Liberals 225; Labour Party, 35; Unionists, 94; Nationalists, 70; Liberal gains, 120; Labour gains 26; Nationalist 1.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

London, January 21.

The state of the poll now stands:—

Liberals .....	232, a gain of 127 seats.
Labour Party .....	34, " 27 "
Unionists .....	76, " 4 "
Nationalists .....	72, " 1 "

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

Viscount Hayashi, speaking at Batley, said that Great Britain could perfectly easily assist Japan's progress. The idea that such help would be injurious was contrary to the principles of political economy.

"THE FLOWING TIDE."

Later.

The poll now stands:—

Liberals .....	254 seats, a gain of 139.
Labour Party .....	34 " 27 "
Unionists .....	112 " 7 "
Nationalists .....	79 " 1 "

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

London, January 22.

The result of the British general elections now stands:—

Liberals .....	262 seats.
Labour Party .....	34 "
Unionists .....	114 "
Nationalists .....	79 "

The Liberal have gained 139 seats; the Unionists 9.

GERMAN SOCIALISTS.

The social suffrage demonstrations passed off quietly in Berlin yesterday. Ninety-two meetings were held in various parts of the city.

BRITISH POLITICS.

London, January 23.

Members of the independent Labour Party are pledging themselves to form a distinct group in Parliament, and to abstain strictly from identifying themselves with any section, Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. A. J. Balfour, ex-Premier, now seems unlikely to secure a seat anywhere until after the reassembling of Parliament, and it is expected that Mr. Akers-Douglas will lead the Opposition.

THE "ZIETEN" INCIDENT.

The N. D. L. mail steamer Zieten has arrived at Colombo. In reply to the head office's request for an explanation of the Suyematsu affair, the Captain affirms that all possible courtesy was shown to Baron Suyematsu. It was impossible to assign to the Japanese the first places at table, because those were already occupied. He was unaware beforehand that Baron Suyematsu was to be a passenger.

TERRIBLE NAVAL DISASTER.

London, January 23.

The magazine of the Brazilian ironclad Aquidaban exploded when the vessel was near Rio de Janeiro. The Aquidaban sank within three minutes. The Commander and four Rear-admirals who were accompanying the Minister of Marine (M. de Noronha) on a tour of inspection, perished. It is reported that altogether 300 were drowned.

BRITISH ELECTION RETURNS.

The returns of the British general election now stand:—Liberals, 274 seats; Labour Party, 34; Unionists, 115; Nationalists, 89. There were five Liberal gains yesterday.

RUSSIA'S RED SUNDAY.

London, January 24.

The anniversary of Red Sunday (January 22nd) passed quietly throughout Russia.

MOROCCO.

The Morocco conference has agreed to five clauses dealing with the suppression of the contraband trade in arms.

THE ROKEBY VELASQUEZ.

The purchase for the British nation of the "Rokeby" Velasquez (Venus with a Mirror) has been anonymously guaranteed. The price is said to be forty or forty-five thousand guineas.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

Later.

The Liberals have now secured 286 seats; the Labour Party 35; the Nationalists 79; the Unionists 121.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain, late Chancellor of the Exchequer, has been returned for East Worcester polling 10,129 votes against Morgan 5,763.

THE "AQUIDABAN" DISASTER.

In the Aquidaban disaster 212 perished; 98 were saved.

THE PHILIPPINE RUMOURS.

There are persistent rumours in New York that the new Ambassador to Japan, Mr. Luke Wright, is empowered to discuss in Tokyo the sale of the Philippines. America regrets this costly and burdensome acquisition.

THE TRANSVAAL MEMORIES.

Ex-President Steyn, speaking at Dewetsdorp, on the occasion of the interring of the remains of burghers who fell in the war, urged the avoidance of foreign ways. He appealed to mothers to teach their children the story of the concentration camps. Generals Hartzog and Wessells harangued in the same strain.

A ROYAL ENGAGEMENT.

London, January 25.

The engagement of King Alfonso of Spain and Princess Ena of Battenburg, niece of King Edward VII., will be officially announced shortly.

MR. MOTONO.

Russia has approved the selection of Mr. Motono, Japanese Minister to Paris, as Minister to St. Petersburg.

BRITISH ELECTIONS.

The state of the poll in the British general elections to date is:—Liberals, 294; Labour Party, 36; Unionists, 123. The Liberal gains are 153; Labour, 30; Unionists, 10.

The capacity of the largest floating dock at present in existence does not exceed 17,500 tons.

RAW SILK EXPORT TRADE.

One of the leading raw silk exporters in Yokohama writes us:—

The following very arbitrary enactment is to be brought forward in the present session of Parliament:—

1.—All silk of Japanese origin is to be officially inspected.

2.—The Minister concerned has the power to order all silk intended for export to be officially inspected.

3.—All persons found trying to export silk without such examination to be fined an amount not less than yen 50 and not exceeding yen 1,000.

This law to come into operation on the 1st of April, 1906. The present regulations for the Silk Conditioning House to be cancelled at the same time.

[At present no charges are made for the conditioning of Silk, the regulations being framed for the improvement and welfare of the Silk trade. The object of the new regulations is to prevent inferior goods being exported.]

The Japanese as well as all foreign exporters of raw silk are of opinion that this measure, if passed by the Diet, will be most injurious to the interests of all concerned in the export trade of Raw Silk, and for the following reasons:—

1st.—The Yokohama Raw Silk Conditioning House is at present quite inadequate as to space to enable the whole of the export produce to be conditioned therein, and this being the case the law, if passed and enforced, would cause endless delay in marketing and shipping this, the chief article of Japan's export trade.

2.—Under the existing rules of the Yokohama Silk Market, as in Europe, only a certain proportion of each lot destined for export is conditioned, and this system has adequately met the requirements of both sellers and buyers.

The trade in general, both Japanese and foreign, regards it as a distinct infringement of its rights that an arbitrary fine should be sought to be imposed on yen 50 to yen 1,000 for any infringement of the proposed Act of Parliament.

It would appear to all having cognizance of the trade that the main object of the proposed enactment is to cover the expenses and perhaps the cost of an intended enlargement of the existing conditioning house. But until this enlargement is effected endless inconvenience and delay would be the inevitable result, particularly as it is proposed that the Law shall come into force on the 1st of April next.

The Yokohama (Japanese) Chamber of Commerce met on the 27th January and decided to oppose the proposed new law. It has circulated its opinions among members of both Houses of the Diet, urging (1) that the proposed law will be a hindrance to a trade which has hitherto been carried on smoothly; (2) the law would spoil the reputation of the Japan staple, now so popular in foreign countries; (3) the law would discourage the export of raw silk.

At the meeting on the 29th Jan. of the Special Committee entrusted with the duty of examining and reporting upon the Bill relating to silk conditioning, Mr. Sakawa, Government Delegate, explained that the Silk Association of the United States (Kengyo Kyokai) had addressed to the Authorities a communication urging that silk for export should be subjected at the conditioning houses to most careful examination as to weight, quality and packing, and had declared that if these three points were fully attended to the silk would be treated by American dealers with the utmost confidence. To carry out such a system it was necessary that the methods of inspection should be made closer and a corresponding increase of expenses would be entailed, which, in turn, necessitated the adoption of some means to raise funds. Hence it seemed advisable in the best interests of this important trade that conditioning fees should be charged although they had not hitherto been imposed, and that the Minister concerned should be authorized to make examination compulsory. In answer to questions the Delegate said that no regulations had yet been definitely framed as to the manner of compelling examination, and that the system would naturally be extended to silk imported from abroad. He demed that this measure had been proposed merely because a small section of Japanese sericulturists had practised dishonest methods: the prime object of the change was to enhance the credit of Japanese silk in foreign markets, thus stimulating the trade.

This measure seems to be unpopular among Japanese and foreigners alike. It is urged that the Government has taken an altogether mistaken view of the situation. The present kensa-jo (examination places) are used only when a difference of opinion arises between buyer and seller as to the amount of moisture in a parcel of silk. Application is then made for examination and it is conducted by machinery which gives sure results. But to talk of examinations for the purpose of determining the question of quality of the silk or its manufacture is quite absurd. No one now-a-days manufactures silk in a purposely careless or labour-saving manner with a view to deception. The sericulturist everywhere does his very utmost to produce a good article, for therein lies his hope of profit. It is in the cocoon that the difference lies. Whatever pains the reeler may take he can not get a first-class article from bad cocoons, but it is one of his greatest feats to improve upon his cocoons, and he spares no effort to do so. A slight difference in cocoons will affect the silk. That is inevitable, but it is now a great aim of reelers everywhere to overcome, or at all events to minimize, this initial blemish. The officials at a conditioning house can do nothing in the way of improving methods of manufacture. They can not go beyond the cocoon, and no one wants their judgment upon that point. There are over 50 conditioning houses in the world, yet in no one case is compulsory legislation applied to their operations.

That, in brief, is the view attributed by sericulturists and foreign middlemen by the Shogyo Shimpo.

The Government's proposal to introduce a system of compulsory inspection of silk meets with more and more opposition. It is pointed out, in the first place, that the present method of voluntary inspection without fees was instituted for the express purpose of promoting the trade, and that if the authorities imagine that promotion has been carried far enough and that the trade has reached its full development, they are egregiously mistaken. In the second place, compulsory examination could only have the effect of impairing the reputation of the Japanese staple. The real purpose of a conditioning house is to officiate in case of dispute between seller and buyer. Then the conditioning house, being appealed to, steps in as arbitrator and decides the question. The discharge of such a function must evidently depend upon optional applications from the parties to the dispute. It is extravagant and mischievous to require that men of old experience who know their business well and are already conducting it in a manner perfectly satisfactory to themselves and their clients, should be compelled to submit to tests which are not only useless but also calculated to create false impressions about the quality of Japanese silk and the methods of Japanese sericulturists. Then there is the technical objection already explained in these columns, namely that conditioning, whether compulsory or voluntary, is quite powerless to correct abuses of manufacture which do not exist, the quality of a parcel of silk being chiefly dependent on the cocoons from which it is reeled.

The Jiji Shimpo has a very strong article on this subject. It declares that the provisions of the proposed law are contradictory, inasmuch as the first article gives permission to have silk conditioned and the second empowers the Minister concerned to order its conditioning under heavy penalties in case of disobedience. In this respect, however, our contemporary's line of reasoning does not carry full conviction, for the first Article lays down a general principle whereas the second provides for special circumstances. And in this context it may be well to point out that the Law does not contemplate the introduction of a compulsory system on the normal state of affairs, but merely lays down that the Minister of State may order inspection if he deem it necessary. However, those best qualified to judge evidently think it unnecessary and even mischievous, which ought to settle the question. Our contemporary declares that the measure is in effect, an old-fashioned attempt to impose an export duty on silk, and that so far from promoting the trade, it will impede it.

The following letter has been placed at our disposal:

YOUR EXCELLENCIES,—In view of the recently proposed new Silk Law, of which the purpose is to make examination of Raw Silks to be exported from Japan compulsory, I have herewith the honour of submitting to Your Excellencies various reasons against same on behalf of the Association of Foreign Raw and Waste Silk Merchants of Yokohama, to which Association, I may add, all the Foreign Silk Merchants in this country belong.

I may, to begin with, state that my Association entirely and absolutely endorse the arguments brought forward by Mr. Ono Mitsukage as President of the Yokohama Sanshi Boyekisho against the said Law under date of the 27th inst., and in which he in detail points out the detrimental influence which the proposed Law would have on the sound and healthy development of the Raw Silk trade, which, by the mutual efforts of Japanese and Foreign Merchants alike, has reached such high efficiency.

My Association is of the opinion:

(1). That compulsory Government examination would over-ride individual efforts of merchants by interfering with the first principles of free competitive trade, and consequently to a very great extent damage the present prosperous condition of this country's Export of Raw Silks.

(2). That unfair discrimination could at any time be exerted against individual firms by ordering that their purchases of Raw Silks for export should be examined, thus again hindering free trade.

(3). That as a demand abroad exists for the lowest as well as for the highest grades of Raw Silks it would be impossible for Government Experts to judge whether a certain grade was fit for Export or not, thus making transactions in many Silks practically impossible.

(4). That Government inspection, which would always take time, would make impossible the rapid conclusion of transactions, which is of such very important moment in the present conduct of Raw Silk operations, where prices rise and fall daily.

(5). That the capacity of the Imperial Conditioning House at Yokohama is not able to cope with the volume of the Raw Silk trade as it is now, and would be still more insufficient were examination and inspection to be made compulsory.

(6). That no other country enforces Government interference or control in Raw Silk transaction, whereby the free dealings between sellers and buyers might be hampered.

(7). That the natural consequences of enforced examination would be that the Government would have to "guarantee" the strict qualities of Raw Silks inspected by their Experts, which again would mean that they would have to be responsible for eventual complaints and claims arising from unsatisfactory deliveries abroad.

In submitting these reasons to your Excellencies once more beg to point out that Japanese and Foreign Merchants alike are of but one opinion as to the damage the new Silk Law would cause to the Export Trade of Raw Silks from Japan, should same be passed by Parliament, and I feel confident that the opinion of men, who for so many years have been engaged in this country's Silk trade, will be taken into consideration when Parliament decides about this important matter.

I finally respectfully beg your Excellencies to convey these arguments to the knowledge of Parliament. And have the honour to remain, Your Excellencies' obedient Servant,

(Signed) H. ABEGG,

President, Ass. of F.R. & W.S.M. of Yokohama.
To Their Excellencies,

MATSUOKA KOKI,
Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, Tokyo.

KATO TAKAOKI,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, Tokyo.

VLADIVOSTOCK.

Saturday, January 27.

It will have been observed that, according to a telegram from the United States Consul, another disturbance occurred at Vladivostock on the 23rd instant. Up to this moment of writing no detailed news seems to have been received in Tokyo, but a cablegram to Nagasaki attributes the trouble to a rejected demand made by the ex-prisoners from Japan for their release. This cablegram alleges that 350 soldiers were killed in the riot, but we shall not be surprised to learn that such a figure is a great exaggeration. All the recently arriving stories of massacres in Russia seem to have been freely manipulated by sensation-mongers. It is hard to understand why men who had been held prisoners of war for many months in Japan should not have been granted full liberty on arrival at Vladivostock, but we must assume that they were held under restraint pending some military inquiry.

Monday, January 29.

Telegrams to Nagasaki give a terrible account of the disturbance in Vladivostock on the 25th. It is said to have been a collision between the Cossacks and the prisoners that have reached Vladivostock from Japan. The latter were of course unarmed, and the statement is that 1,500 of them were killed or wounded by the Cossacks. About one-third of the wounded have been put into hospital, but the remainder are said to be lying on the snow.

Another shocking catastrophe is the destruction of a train proceeding from Harbin to Vladivostock. It was blown up by the insurgents and precipitated into a river, 3,000 persons being killed or injured. But this figure is evidently a great exaggeration, and we may hope that the casualties at Vladivostock also have been multiplied by rumour.

Yet another story is that Kuropatkin has disappeared and that public excitement is at its height.

Tuesday, January 30.

Telegrams are beginning to arrive from Europe and America with reference to the recent disturbance at Vladivostock. They add nothing to what has already been published but they indicate that, as we ventured to predict, the first accounts were greatly exaggerated. "Two hundred killed and wounded" is the latest list of casualties, whereas one story, it will be remembered, spoke of 1,500, and added that only a third of the wounded had been taken into hospital, the remainder being left lying in the snow. It may be broadly stated that rumour has taken more than its proverbial liberties with all the news disseminated from Russia during the past twelve months. As for the cause of this last trouble at Vladivostock, it would seem to be easily explicable, namely, inability on the part of the Authorities to transport the troops home by the Siberian railway as fast as the men desire. It would certainly have been more rational and practical to carry away the 70,000 prisoners from Japan by sea rather than by land, and in view of the fact that the latter route was chosen despite its obvious inconveniences, especially at this time of year, one is disposed to credit the allegation that the Russian Government hesitated to repatriate a large body of troops who had been for many months in close contact with literature such as they do not see at home, and in contact with a population enjoying the sweets of constitutional government.

Wednesday, January 31.

Telegrams from Vladivostock dated the 28th instant say that the insurgents have gained possession of the town and that the Cossacks have been obliged to withdraw. We are inclined to doubt the accuracy of this information, inasmuch as private cablegrams received in Tokyo on the 29th spoke of the Authorities as calling for tenders for ships to carry home the ex-prisoners with all possible despatch.

Thursday, February 1.

A message from Vladivostock says that the ice-crusher in use there has become un-serviceable and that entry to the port is consequently impossible. We have always understood that there were two ice-breakers, but this message seems to refer to one only.

Meanwhile the case of the Konoura Maru grows more and more complicated. She put back, as our readers probably remember, from Askold Island to Nagasaki on account of the state of the northern seas, and her passengers, finding themselves thus precluded from getting to Russia, became very clamorous. They have instituted proceedings against the vessel's owners, who, on their side, plead the proverbial "act of God" which counts for so much in navigating the high seas. The master of the Konoura alleges that it would be as much as his life is worth to renew the attempt, and the owners fear that if they send the ship under another master, she will be impounded should she reach Vladivostock. It ought not to be difficult to find an exit from this dilemma. The inference suggested is that the owners are behaving in an arbitrary manner.

THE NIKKWA GAKUSEI-KWAI.

This is a new institution just started in Tokyo, the principal promoter being Mr. Ting, who is one of the oldest of the Chinese students educated in Japan. The opening meeting was held in Tokyo on the 28th instant at 1 p.m. About 1,600 Japanese and Chinese students assembled and among the most distinguished persons present were Count Okuma, Viscount Aoki and Viscount Nagaoka. Count Okuma delivered an eloquent address. He said that the fate of a country depended on whether it moved with the stream of progress or attempted to ride against it. Japan and China had both attempted the latter feat in mediaeval days, but Japan had been stirred by her contact with the West to let go her anchors and sail with the current, so that now she had reached a port of safety. China stood to-day in the position occupied by Japan 40 years ago, and there were happily many indications that China also would go with the stream. Alluding to the question of Chinese youths coming to Japan to study, the Count said that Japan, of course, was not the only place offering itself for such a purpose: there were Europe and America, which, having been themselves Japan's teachers, might naturally seem more inviting in Chinese eyes. But he believed that the acquisition of modern knowledge would be greatly facilitated for the Chinese if they studied in a country cognate with their own, and if they took the digested results of Japan's intercourse with the Occident rather than the raw material obtainable at the fountain head. Japan herself had learned by experience that institutions which had been cut out of the block, so to speak, by an intermediate student, were comparatively easy to comprehend and to assimilate.

Viscount Aoki spoke briefly on the importance of intercourse between the peoples of countries desiring to be really friendly. What officials could do in this direction was necessarily limited. The only really effective plan was for the people themselves to meet and to learn to know each other intimately. He denounced as wholly irrational the idea that any feeling of dislike or suspicion should be entertained against a man merely because he happened to be an alien, and he urged that this meeting should be made the prelude of many smaller reunions where Chinese and Japanese might come together and exchange views.

MARQUIS SAIONJI'S SPEECH.

The tone of the Japanese press is appreciative towards Marquis Saionji's speech in the Diet. It appears to be generally agreed that the Premier said just what he ought to have said in the circumstances. The Kokumin Shinbun, indeed, takes occasion to remark that while the advice as to a united nation comes appropriately from a statesman who, at the moment of recent excitement, adopted a calm and conciliatory tone, nevertheless it can not be forgotten that the Marquis is at the head of a Cabinet which includes members that did anything but promote national union at the time when disruption seriously threatened. On the whole, however, the Premier's remarks are applauded. He is assured that the people have fully made up their minds to the task lying before him, but he is asked not to assume that they have done so in a light-hearted mood, or that the sacrifices demanded of them need not be accompanied by corresponding efforts on the part of officialdom. The Progressist organs show a strong disposition to gird at the Budget. They admit that the new Cabinet had no choice except to take over the financial programme of its predecessor, but they imagine that they detect in the Premier's remarks some disposition to support that programme as well as to adopt it, and they urge that such a course would be unwise. The Ministry have to present the Budget and to give full and impartial interpretation of it but they should refrain from any attempt to force it upon an unwilling House. The Jiji Shimpō admits that the continuance of the war taxes is inevitable, but it repeats its old contention that they should not be continued en bloc without discrimination. They are not all sound taxes from an economic point of view, and though indulgence had to be granted originally when the nation found itself face to face with a vital crisis, much fuller reflection is called for when the permanent imposition of these taxes comes to be considered.

THE WAR EXPENDITURES.

For purposes of reference the Government has placed in the hands of the members of the Diet an interesting document showing the income and expenditures in connexion with the war from October 1903 until the end of September 1905. We proceed to tabulate the figures:—

N.B.—The yen are not shown in this total but they are included in the additions, and consequently there are slight discrepancies.

It will be observed that the total for both services as shown in Table IV., namely, the total of outlays as sanctioned by the Emperor, is 1,173,558,590 yen, whereas the estimated total shown in Table I. (omitting Departmental Expenses) is 1,235,971,035 yen. Thus the estimated total exceeded the imperially sanctioned total by 62,412,445 yen. Yet another table shows the actual monthly expenditures.

1905	926,676,476	153,774,640	1,080,451,117

This table shows that the actual outlays of the two services were 1,080,451,117 yen, which compared with the Imperially sanctioned outlays (1,173,558,590 yen), shows a diminution of 93,107,473 yen; and compared with the estimated total (1,235,971,035 yen) shows a diminution of 155,519,918 yen. It is interesting to observe that the actual outlays were in every case short of the estimates, and it is also interesting to observe that the estimates were within 15 per cent., approximately, of the actual expenditures. That is a remarkably close approximation when dealing in such great amounts.

The above tables deal with outlays only.

Turning to income, we find the following table:—

VI.—EXTRAORDINARY WAR INCOME FROM VARIOUS SOURCES.

	Actual Income.	Estimated Income.
Loans, Treasury Notes and Temporary Accommodations .....	919,230,960	981,971,035
Transferred from the General Accounts .....	168,022,170	189,000,000

Special Income .....	283,562	—
Various Income .....	1,889,334	500,000
Totals .....	1,093,885,840	1,235,971,035

Difference. Yen. 62,740,075

Loans, Treasury Notes and Temporary Accommodations .....	62,740,075
Transferred from the General Accounts .....	80,977,830
Taken from Capital Funds of the Special Accounts .....	1,688,022
Voluntary Contributions .....	719,434
Sales of Government Properties .....	928,402
Special Income .....	283,562
Various Income .....	1,389,334
Total .....	142,085,195

It appears that the estimated total income from all these sources exceeded the income actually obtained by 142,085,195 yen. On the other hand, since the actual expenses of the two services were 1,080,451,117 yen and the income was 1,093,885,840 yen, it would seem that the receipts exceeded the expenditures by 13,434,723 yen. This conclusion, however, requires to be modified. In the first heading of incomes, (namely loans, treasury notes and temporary accommodations) there is an item of 267,502,536 yen obtained by the second and third loans floated in England. But of that sum an amount of 197,046,339 yen was held in London in specie and consequently did not become available for actual war outlays. Subtracting this from the income and noting the surplus of 13,434,720 yen, the final result is a nominal shortage of income to the extent of 183,611,616 yen. We say "nominal" because the shortage was due, not to an actual deficiency of receipts, but to the Government's action in keeping this large sum of specie in London. The following table shows the method adopted to obtain funds in lieu of the specie kept in London:—

This table VII. merely furnishes an indication of transactions from month to month. Totals can not be given because the sums shown in one month were generally repaid in part or wholly in another. We see, however, what methods the Government followed in financing the war.

One other interesting table is furnished.

Secret Service .....	3,220,980,216

It shows the kinds of circulating media employed by the Treasury in defraying the outlays of the two services from October, 1903, to September, 1905, a space of two years:—

VIII.—TABLE SHOWING KINDS OF CIRCULATING MEDIA EMPLOYED FOR PURPOSES OF WAR PAYMENTS.

Convertible Note and Subsidiary	Yen.
Coins .....	877,494,967.139
Gold Coins .....	10,000,000.000
Silver Coins .....	14,620,173.000
Korean Coins .....	91,793.262
Military Notes .....	178,244,183.800
Total .....	1,080,451,117.201

From this it appears that the hard money paid out (gold and silver) totalled only 24,620,173 yen. There is no explanation as to the volume of convertible notes and military notes remaining in circulation but we may assume that considerable fractions of the totals have been already presented for exchange against coin.

PURITY OF ELECTIONS IN JAPAN.

We have often had occasion to refer to the extraordinary disposition shown by some foreign critics of Japan—they are almost invariably critics resident in the ex-settlements—to draw the worst possible inferences from the pettiest facts. An illustration so flagrant as to be quite amusing is furnished in connexion with Count Okuma's recent speech. The Progressist Leader advocated a return to the system of small constituencies and sealed ballots, his line of argument being that corrupt influence can be exercised by officialdom with greater facility in large constituencies than in small. Upon this basis a local contemporary builds the following structure of comment:—

One point which must strike every observer of political conditions in this country is the openness with which the corruption is carried on. For instance, Count Okuma does not find it at all an extraordinary thing to refer to the secret purchase of votes, a statement which in any other country where representative institutions obtain would have raised a storm of protest or denial. Here the statement is taken as a matter of course, a thing generally recognised and not causing any surprise or shame.

One is a little perplexed to decipher whether this is intended for jest or for earnest. "In any other country where representative institutions obtain Count Okuma's statement "would have raised a storm of protest or denial"! Why, such statements are as common in the United States as blackberries are in an English lane. An outsider reading American newspapers would imagine that the political machine possesses scarcely one pure part. As for Count Okuma, he will be much entertained when he reads the above criticism, if he ever does read it. He will recall the vehement commotions that have been raised in this country about official interference in elections and about party corruption, and he will ask whether the critic has any ears or any knowledge. The inference drawn by any fair-minded onlooker from the facts staring him in the face would be that the hot struggle made in former years in Japan to give to the electoral system a form which should secure it against abuses of this nature, constitutes a convincing proof of the value set on political purity by the Japanese. But the Yokohama critic, apparently quite ignorant of the story of the past, opines that in Western countries "means are taken to prevent political corruption," and that because Count Okuma proposes a change in the electoral system, he admits by construction that "the matter is not one which can be dealt with by law." What epithet is to be applied to such inconsequential silliness? One might as well say that when a householder takes the precaution of locking his doors at night he admits the incapacity of the police to protect him against burglars. Law is not omnipotent. England has laws against bribery and corruption, yet if any Englishman could be found to pretend that these abuses have been eradicated by law in the United Kingdom, he would be laughed to scorn. Count Okuma proposes to reinforce the law in Japan by an improvement—as he thinks—of the electoral system, and he is forthwith charged with admitting that bribery and corruption lie outside the purview of Japanese law and that the existence of corrupt practices is "a matter of course" in this country. The wish to read injurious interpretations into a political speech was never more conspicuously displayed.

BILL RELATING TO THE NEW DOMESTIC LOAN.

In addition to the Budget Committee there is now sitting a committee for considering the Bill which authorizes the Treasury to issue a new domestic loan of 430 million yen to meet extraordinary expenditures connected with the war (ryūji jikenhi shiben ni kansuru boritsu-an). The original idea was that this Bill might be dealt with pari passu with the Budget, but the Government has now asked that it be taken as a matter of urgency. The reasons assigned are that payments have to be made within a brief period, and that the time is especially favourable for floating a loan. It is considered that the volume of currency in circulation has become excessive, since the convertible notes issued aggregate 310 million yen. Such a figure was never reached during the war, the Treasury having carefully watched so as to time its loan operations with regard to the money in circulation, but now the tendency is towards undue appreciation of prices and excess of imports, which conditions it is desirable to correct with the least possible delay. In the sum of 430 millions there are included two principal items, namely, 150 millions on account of rewards for distinguished service (ronkō koshū) and 200 millions on account of expenses in connection with the return of the troops. The remaining sum of 81,600,000 yen is reduced to 70 millions by the proceeds of sales of ships and spoils. Out of this 81 millions odd, 20 millions are on account of the new military establishment in Manchuria and Korea, namely, 2 Divisions in each country; 25 millions are for military restorations; 27 millions for naval restorations, and the remainder is for the Residency-General in Korea and the manufacture of medals and decorations. The Committee was divided in opinion as to whether the Bill should be treated as an urgency measure or whether it should be taken simultaneously with the Budget. Finally it was decided to settle the question at another meeting on the 29th instant.

GARDEN PARTY IN TOKYO.

On the 28th instant the Minister of State for War gave a garden party at the Koraku-en in Tokyo. The weather was almost springlike and the park looked beautiful. The entertainment may be said to have consisted of two things, a display of wrestling and a collation. It need scarcely be said that all the magnates of the wrestling ring took part in the performance. The two great champions, Umegatani and Hitachiyama, did not meet. Umegatani encountered Kunimiyama and Hitachiyama was pitted against Taiho, and no one was surprised that the yoko-zuna carried off the palm. Much interest centred upon the match between Koniagatake and Tachiyama, but the former justified his recently won fame by throwing his man handsomely. Their Imperial Highnesses Fushimi, Kanin, Nashimoto, Kuni and Kitashirakawa were present, as were Field Marshal Marquis Oyama, Marquis Ito, Count Okuma, General Kodama, General Nozu, General Kuroki, General Kawamura, General Oku, Admiral Togo, Vice-Admiral Kabayama, Count Katsura, Baron Komura, the Ministers of State and about a thousand officers of both services as well as leading men in business and official circles. At 4 o'clock the whole party repaired to a huge pavilion where a sumptuous cold collation was spread. General Terauchi delivered a brief speech, in which he alluded to the victories won by the country's arms, and said that if they were due primarily to the virtues of the Sovereign, they were due also to the bravery and skill of the Army and Navy and to the unanimous support of the whole nation. General Oku replied in a few words and proposed the health of the Army and Navy which was drunk with the utmost enthusiasm. The Minister of War then called upon the company to drain their glasses to the health of the guests who did not belong to either service. After the collation a display of military dancing was given and the party broke up at 5.20 p.m. Altogether the fete was among the most brilliant ever witnessed in Tokyo.

FLOATING MINES.

The following information is published by the Department of State for Foreign Affairs:—In April of last year the Foreign Corps Diplomatique in Peking pointed out to the Chinese Government that steps ought to be taken with regard to errant mines in the North-China Seas, these constituting a grave danger to merchant vessels. The result was that the Pehyang Superintendent of Trade sent out the war-ship Haishen and others and these obstructions were more or less removed. Many remained, however, and ships suffered in consequence. During October the Municipal Council of Shanghai asked the Consular Body at the port to approach the Chinese Government on the subject, and the request having been forwarded to the Corps Diplomatique in Peking, the Doyen of the latter, in November, again made representations to the Waiwupu pointing out that the measures hitherto adopted by the Chinese Authorities had been inadequate and urging that more efficient means be taken. There was added a suggestion from the Shanghai merchants that if a system of rewards were adopted, the Chinese fishermen would probably make themselves active in searching for mines. On the 28th of December the Chinese Government replied that three war-ships had already been sent out and that they were supplemented by 11 merchant-ships, each carrying one gun and a detachment of gunners to destroy the mines. Further, it had been decided to offer 2,000 taels for every mine discovered and given notice of, and this offer would be proclaimed at Chinwangtau, Tungchow, Chefoo and Yungching.

NATIONALIZATION OF RAILWAYS.

It is now tolerably clear that the Progressists will resolutely oppose the nationalization of the Japanese railways. Count Okuma has spoken in that sense and has been followed by two leading Progressist organs, the Hochi and the Yomiuri. All the arguments advanced in condemnation of the project seem to centre on the alleged unwisdom of saddling the State with a further addition to its debts, but it is plain that such a contention has no practical value if the asset obtained in return for the outlay is amply sufficient to pay interest and appropriations for sinking fund. Something more convincing will probably be put forward by the objectors by and bye. Meanwhile Mr. Hirai, Director of the Railway Bureau, has been speaking on the subject, and we learn from his remarks that the official view is chiefly inspired by solicitude for the development of trade and industry. He says that one of two things is essential, namely, nationalization or combination. Existing conditions are intolerable. They do not permit the application of any principle of State economy. Thus it is impossible to grant rebates in the case either of goods for export—as silk and tea—or of imported material for the uses of Japanese factories. Apart from this there is the fact that with some forty different companies in possession of the lines, some holding only a few miles and all showing no disposition to co-operate earnestly for the convenience of transport or for the lowering of rates, which are unquestionably too high, the railway system of Japan is about as inefficient as possible. Mr. Hirai does not definitely allege that the Ministry has decided to ask for parliamentary authority to nationalize the roads. He suggests, on the contrary, that the official view is undecided between combination and nationalization, but we interpret him as pointing clearly to the latter since the Diet is not in a position to authorize the former on any conceivable basis save that of State purchase. The Shogyo Shimpo, which is the organ of the business world, has discussed the question at considerable length and arrives at the unequivocal conclusion that nationalization is necessary. The total mileage of private lines in the Empire is 3,200. It is not suggested that the whole should be purchased at once. The idea is to deal at the outset with only the five principal lines, namely, the Nippon, the Sanyo, the Kansei, the Kyushu and the Tanko. Concerning these five our contemporary gives the following figures:—

	Cost of Construction.	Rolling Stock.
	Yen.	Yen.
Nippon .....	51,177,851	1,463,163
Sanyo .....	33,902,023	930,498
Kansei .....	27,037,501	173,262
Kyushu .....	49,083,055	1,044,502
Tanko .....	11,006,148	361,642
Totals .....	171,906,878	3,973,067
Other Lines ...	71,021,528	896,542
Grand Totals..	242,928,506	4,869,609
	Other Outlays.	Totals.
	Yen.	Yen.
Nippon .....	1,900,576	54,541,589
Sanyo .....	1,380,792	35,913,313
Kansei .....	131,956	27,342,719
Kyushu .....	701,586	50,829,144
Tanko .....	1,366,382	12,734,472
Totals .....	5,481,292	181,361,237
Other Lines ...	2,837,051	256,116,352
Grand Totals..	8,318,343	74,755,115

These are the returns for the year 1904. The question is, on what terms could the state purchase be effected. Apparently the fairest way would be to take the average price of the shares during the past three years and to purchase them at that figure. This method of assessment would result thus, observing that the face-value of the shares is 50 yen:—

	Average price of shares.	Paid-up Capital.	Total Price of shares on the basis of the average.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
Nippon .....	76.245	48,000,000	73,286,696
Sanyo .....	59.257	29,278,038	34,698,573
Kansei .....	41.590	24,181,800	20,114,411
Kyushu .....	57.276	47,434,753	54,337,458
Tanko .....	75.621	16,700,000	16,185,448
Totals .....		159,654,591	198,622,596

If the other lines be added the total purchase price on this basis of calculation is 280 million yen in round numbers. Another method of assessment is to put the value of the railways at twenty years' purchase of their average allotments to shareholders. On this basis the total purchase price would be 326 millions, or 46 millions more than by the former method. The Shogyo Shimpo observes that as the net earnings of the lines are 20 million yen annually, the Government, did it effect the purchase at 300 millions and did it borrow the money abroad at 4 per cent., would make a clear gain of 8 millions annually. But the Government can not borrow money at 4 per cent. at par. Five per cent. is much nearer the truth, and if we put the purchase price at 350 millions, then the interest payable by the Treasury yearly would be 17½ millions and the gain to the public exchequer would be 2½ millions only. Even that, however, represents a fine investment, and when the saving of expenses in account of economical management is taken into account, a considerably larger profit would probably result.

One interesting point brought out by the Shogyo Shimpo is that although the railways managed to transport Japan's armies during the recent war, it was at the expense of dislocating the ordinary traffic, a trouble which would have been avoided in part if not altogether had the whole of the country's rolling stock been available as it would be were the railways nationalized. Great numbers of locomotives and carriages were comparatively idle on lines outside the routes of main military traffic, while the capacities of the rolling stock on the latter were flagrantly over-taxed. Our contemporary mentions that 3,200 waggons and 70 locomotives were sent to Manchuria and Korea.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK.

The half-yearly general meeting of this Bank was held on the 29th ultimo in Tokyo, Mr. Soyeda, President of the Bank, in the chair. He delivered an interesting speech, the gist of which we translate below. Afterwards the business report and an epitome of the accounts were read and passed unanimously. The following are the main figures:—

	Yen.	Yen.
Net profit for the half year .....		144,498
To Reserve for Meeting Losses .....	20,000
To Reserve for Equalizing Dividends .....	5,000
To First Dividend (5 per cent.) .....	70,400
Bonus to Directors .....	10,000
Second Dividend (2 per cent.) .....	28,200
To next Account .....	10,898
		144,498

Mr. Soyeda said:—"The period covered by the business report is from July 1st to December 31st, a space of 153 days. It was the time when the country passed from the economic conditions of actual war to those of after-war, and nothing special occurred. If in these circumstances due results were attained they are to be attributed to the diligence of all concerned. The total funds invested by the Bank at the close of this period were as follow: 7,808,400 yen in communal debts; 2,524,955 in company debentures; and in various works, 4,488,219 yen, a total of 14,821,574 yen. This aggregate, compared with the figure for the preceding period, showed an increase of 2,058,873 yen. The gross earnings during the term together with the amount carried over from last term were 790,402 yen, and deducting the expenses, there remained a nett profit of 144,498 yen. What has to be specially noted with regard to this period under review is that it witnessed, as a result of our victorious war, the advent of cheap foreign capital to Japan. Thus the Kwansei Railway borrowed a million sterling in London at 4½ per cent., and the Tanko Railway borrowed another million at 5 per cent. Moreover, from the beginning of the war until the end of the period under review, foreigners purchased an aggregate of about 150 million yen in the form of Japanese Treasury Bills, consolidated bonds, war-bonds and five per cent. loan bonds, by which means it must be recognised that another route for the inflow of Western capital was opened. At the commencement of November this Bank concluded a trust agreement with the Hokkaido Tanko Railway, thus giving effect to the "Law of Loans on Security" passed by the Diet last session; and further it concluded arrangements after negotiations with the Kwansei Railway and the Tanko Railway for securing without fail the repayment of the funds borrowed by them. The Bank further exerted itself in various ways for the mutual circulation of foreign and domestic capital, and sought to give practical reality to its function as an instrument of public benefit by utilizing the law of trust and other means. As to the future of the Bank, there is one important matter to which the attention of the shareholders must be called. It relates to a method for consummating the Bank's original object of bringing about the mutual circulation of foreign and native capital. With that end in view advantage was taken of the visit to England of Mr. Takahashi Korekyo, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, and owing to exceptional efforts on his part, an agreement was concluded on the 23rd of October, by which the initiative of communications between the Bank and the strongest foreign capitalists in Europe and America was taken. Thus it became necessary to alter the Law of the Bank and its Articles so as to permit an increase of capital. In due time, probably in the course of February, a general meeting of shareholders will be held and their approval will be sought. Further, having been entrusted by the Finance Department with the duty of continuing investigations into gold and silver mines, and desiring to contrive an increase in the production of the precious metals, the Bank will make loans on the basis of accurate surveys in loco. Concerning enterprises in Manchuria and Korea also, it is felt that not a day should be lost, and accordingly one of the managers, Mr. Inouye, has been sent thither to conduct inquiries. In fine, it is the desire of the Directors to discharge to the full the task devolving on the Bank in the multitudinous economic business of the post-bellum period and to assist the development of all undertakings, in the consummation of which important purpose they earnestly look for the aid of the shareholders."

KOREA.

There has been a disturbance at Masampo. It seems to have had its origin in an attempt on the part of a band of the Il Chin-hoi to convince the local officials that administrative reform was essential. The local officials, declining to be convinced but seeing themselves in somewhat of a strait, secretly summoned a number of tradesmen who apparently sympathized with them, and there resulted a struggle in which one man was wounded. The arrival of some Japanese gendarmes speedily restored quiet. These Il Chin-hoi do not appear to be altogether judicious. They are said to be sincere reformers, but they have their detractors, and it is more than probable that their ranks are not filled with genuine patriots alone. So far as can be seen, however, they are inspired on the whole by an honest desire to correct the flagrant abuses from which their country is suffering, and the best testimony we can find to their character is that they are roundly abused by the daily newspaper published in Seoul in an English garb.

Mr. Megata's creations in Korea, the co-operative warehouse company and the note-issuing guild, seem to be getting on excellently. The figures relating to their business are still small but in that respect they are quickly developing, and Mr. Megata has reason to be proud of his children.

The Kokumin's Seoul correspondent says that the Emperor is anxiously awaiting the arrival of Marquis Ito, and that the Ministers of the Crown are also deferring all measures until that event.

Mr. Chong, the most prominent man among the Confucian Literati of Korea, has committed suicide on account of the political situation. It appears that his original plan was to contrive the overthrow of the present Cabinet by which the Convention with Japan had been concluded, and with that intention he left his house, bidding goodbye to all his people and solemnly announcing his intention of sacrificing his life. His designs having become known to the Japanese police, however, he failed to accomplish anything in Seoul and was finally sent back to his native place, escorted by a Japanese constable. His wife, however, so the story runs, refused to give him admittance. She argued that after the steps he had publicly taken before quitting his residence, he would be eternally disgraced did he tamely abandon his declared purpose. Accordingly, he repaired to a place which is vaguely described as a house belonging to his ancestors, and there swallowed opium, leaving two documents, one a farewell to the people of Korea, the other addressed to his fellow literati. This second testament is said to have contained a declaration that death offered the only recourse for a true patriot at this juncture. Mr. Chong—his second name is so variously rendered by the different telegrams that we refrain from attempting to reproduce it—is said to have possessed very great influence among the educated classes in Korea and it is thought that his death will create much excitement. Doubtless some misguided folk will be found to follow his example.

The suicide of Chyong and the testaments he left have produced much commotion in Korea. A vehemently worded circular has been distributed by a section of the literati, their object being to excite hostility to Japan but it is believed that the event will not lead to any serious consequences. The unfortunate Chyong's act of self-sacrifice is likely to have no result except that his own name will be remembered as that of an earnest though misguided patriot.

General Hasegawa informed the Korean Government on the 31st ultimo that he had been instructed, pending the arrival of Marquis Ito, to discharge the functions of Resident-General; that the Japanese Legation would be closed from February 1st, and that after that date the Japanese Consuls would officiate as Residents and Vice-Residents.

Mr. Tsuruhara, the new Somu chokan, a post corresponding to that of Vice-Resident General, was received in audience by the Emperor on the 31st ultimo, and was present in the evening at a banquet given in the Japanese Legation to celebrate the closing of the latter.

THE SEOUL CONVENTION.

In reproducing from an American paper an extract from a letter written by Mr. D. W. Stevens with reference to the incidents connected with the conclusion of the Seoul Convention, we expressed curiosity to see how this very conclusive evidence would be received by the persistent disseminators of the statement that the Convention was obtained by force, and that, the Koreans having been compelled to sign it under duree, the document possessed no binding value in law. There has not been any occasion to wait long. One of the "disseminators" has now spoken and we have to thank him for his very entertaining disquisition. One of his arguments deserves embalming. It is this:—"Mr. Stevens's name has not before been mentioned in connection with the matter, and although he was undoubtedly in position to obtain the true facts, it does not appear that he was present at the conferences which took place or indeed played any part in them." This is a thoroughly characteristic style of reasoning. If Mr. Stevens was "undoubtedly in position to obtain the true facts," what possible matter can it make whether he was or was not "present at the conferences," or whether he did or did not take part in them? It is quite evident that this particular "disseminator" (the Japan Herald) is definitely determined not to credit any testimony which does not support its own contention as to the use of force. No other hypothesis can account for this most dishonest attempt to discredit Mr. Stevens' evidence by innuendo while admitting in the same breath that he was "undoubtedly in position to obtain the true facts." The Japan Herald has not even sufficient perception to appreciate the double-edged nature of its own disingenuous method, for if not to have been "present at the conferences" and not to have "played any part in them" disqualify a man to give evidence about them, how do things stand with the Japan Herald whose editor was not present nor played any part and whose witnesses are all in the same plight? It is simply an illustration of the old story often commented on in these columns, the story that certain publicists are determined to believe everything bad of the Japanese and determined to spread abroad any rumours injurious to them.

MARQUIS ITO.

On the 30th instant Marquis Ito invited the editors of the principal newspapers in the capital to his official residence at Reinanzaka and made a long and detailed statement of the policy he intends to pursue in Korea. As we are promised a full report of this important speech in the next issues of these journals, we refrain from giving any epitome of it here. After the speech Mr. Shimada Saburo, proprietor of the Nichi Nichi Shinbun, speaking for himself alone, expressed unqualified approval of what the Marquis had explained as his policy, and added a hope that there would be no repetition of an abuse which had been already witnessed in a cognate case, namely, the employment of what might be called "cast-off" persons for official purposes in the new territory. Mr. Shimada evidently alluded to Formosa. It will be remembered that in the early days of Japanese administration there, much difficulty was experienced in getting able men to take service under the insular government, and thus not only did Japan's reputation suffer but also the establishment of good order and prosperity was delayed. It is not peculiar to Japan that when a newly opened territory offers, many who have proved themselves failures at home, the loafer class in fact, flock to the terra incognita. Such men always believe themselves to be victims of circumstances, and imagine that under conditions different from those prevailing in the home-land fortune and fame await them. History tells how much the reputation of Europe and America suffered in the East from the same cause. But England, though she contributes her full quota to the loafer tribe, never finds any difficulty in getting good stuff for service in her colonies, and Japan's opposite experience in Formosa caused some uneasiness among onlookers. We may fairly hope, however, that the Formosan lesson was final, and that, as it found ready learners in the case of that island, there will be no repetition of official inefficiency in Korea. Good men are sure to enlist under Marquis Ito's standard.

After the speeches of the Marquis and Mr. Shimada a cold collation was served, during the course of which Mr. Minoura Katsundo proposed the health of Marquis Ito, and it was enthusiastically drunk.

THE EMBASSIES.

Prince Tsai repaired to the Palace on the 25th January, and after audience with the Emperor, lunched with His Majesty. Among those present were their Imperial Highnesses Higashi-Fushimi and Kanin, Mr. Yang, the Chinese Representative, and Mr. Kato, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Emperor has taken the occasion of Prince Tsai's coming to confer high Orders not only on the Prince and the principal members of his suite, but also upon the Chinese Representative, Mr. Yang. The Prince receives the Grand Order of the Paulownia and Mr. Yang the First Class of the Rising Sun.

Prince Tsai and his companions attended a duck-hunting party at the Shiba Detached Palace on the forenoon of the 28th Jan. and witnessed a performance of dakyu (polo) in the afternoon. They dined at the Chinese Legation on the evening of the 29th, Marquis Ito, Mr. Kato, the Ministers of State, the Foreign Representatives and several members of the Imperial Household being among the guests.

The Korean Embassy visited the Shinjuku Park on the afternoon of the 28th January and were entertained in the evening at the Foreign Office by the Minister for Foreign Affairs. Marquis Ito and Mr. Megata were present.

THE FAMINE-STRIKEN DISTRICTS.

The terrible distress prevailing in the three famine-stricken prefectures of Northern Japan is now exciting profound sympathy in Tokyo. Representatives of the afflicted prefectures in the two Houses of the Diet have formed an association called the Sanken no Kujutsu-ai (Association for Relief in the Three Prefectures) and have opened an office at No. 4, Ichome, Sanjikken-bori, Tokyo. They have appointed to be president of the Association Mr. Tomita Tetsunosuke, formerly Governor of Tokyo. The journals of the capital have all united for the same purpose, and have nominated two of their leading editors—Mr. Yokoi of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun and Mr. Ikebe of the Asahi Shimbun—as members of the Association. It is decided that subscription lists shall be opened by all the papers, and that they shall be free to send the proceeds either to that Association or to some other organization. It is to be hoped that this vigorous action will rouse the public to a commensurate sense of the necessity of giving liberal and speedy aid. There is no doubt that hundreds of persons, including women and children, are perishing from starvation aggravated by bitter cold. The missionaries, whose investigations upon the spot disclosed to them the pitiful state of affairs then in sight, have done everything in their power to make the painful facts generally known, and it must now be a source of keen regret to many charitable people that they did not at once respond to this urgent appeal.

Donations received by the J. W. on behalf of the people suffering from the famine now amount to yen 11,644.85.

The Nippon Railway Company has contributed ten thousand yen to the starving people of Miyagi, Iwate and Fukushima prefectures.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

It being established beyond all doubt that there is terrible distress in the famine-stricken northern prefectures of Miyagi, Iwate and Fukushima, the Executive Committee of the Yokohama and Tokyo Foreign Residents Association for the Relief of Sufferers by the War have agreed (with a view of saving time that would be lost in calling the Community together and electing a new Famine Relief Fund Committee) to take charge of all subscriptions entrusted to their care and look to the proper distribution of the same. This Committee is distinctly International, its members being James Walter, Esq., Chairman.

J. W. Copmann, Esq., Vice-Chairman.
V. A. Caesar Hawkins, Esq., Manager,
Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.
J. Archer, Esq., Agent, Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China.
M. Blumer, Esq.
E. C. Davis, Esq.
Rev. W. P. G. Field, M.A.
B. C. Howard, Esq.
N. W. McIvor, Esq.
L. Motet, Esq.
N. F. Smith, Esq.
A. Bellamy Brown, Esq., Secretary.

It is trusted that this appeal will be responded to heartily and immediately by all Banks, Firms and Private Individuals. Subscriptions may be sent to the Secretary, Famine Relief Fund, care of Japan Mail Office, No. 55.

These Funds will be kept entirely distinct.
JAMES WALTER, Chairman.

The following letter from Rev. J. H. de Forest, dated Sendai, January 25th, speaks for itself and requires no comment.

Thanks for your letter of yesterday. Besides the 2,500 yen each already distributed in Fukushima and Iwate-kens, our Committee last night voted 4,000 yen to Miyagi-ken, and we start out to-morrow to take it to the 16 counties. The Governor has given us the warmest kind of letters to every county-head, and we each are responsible to get the money into the counties as soon as possible. Indeed, we start to-morrow, and though many county seats are off the railway and up in the mountains where the deep snow has already stopped the mails, we shall get that money out in two or three days. More than that we have official access to the worst villages and even to the worst families in these villages. But the trouble is the smallness of our funds. 4,000 yen looks like quite a sum for one province, and indeed for two weeks, but when we think of the tens of thousands among the 360,000 of distressed people in this one province who are in bitterest want, our 4,000 yen makes one almost frantic for its miserable insufficiency.

If there are any people in Yokohama who have been waiting for the supreme moment, now is their time. I do not care how the money gets to the dying people; we will put to speedy use every cent that comes to us, not the least fraction of any gift being taken for the cost of distribution. We of Sendai have raised among ourselves treble of what the whole distribution costs, so we may truly say every cent that comes to us gets to the poor in the most fitting food. There is no cost of transportation. There is an ample stock of coarse rice, potatoes, millet, &c., in the open market, at lowest rates, for the authorities keep speculation out of sight. All that is wanted is money.

Let me say also that there is no necessity of sending money through us. Any one can send direct to any governor in these three provinces but in that case a simple condition might well be appended, to the effect that the money be not spent in public works but be used as soon as possible in food gifts for the famishing people. Of course small sums sent that way would be kept until the sums amounted to enough to make distribution worth while.

You kindly suggest that some one come down to Yokohama to confer with men, who, if they knew the situation, would surely respond in some movement of relief. I shall be glad to come provided there are such individuals who will ask me down for consultation. But I have no heart to leave this work on any uncertainties.

Now is the supreme moment for foreign givers. The Government, central and provincial, will begin public works within ten days. The central authorities are being pressed for gifts amounting to over 4,000,000 yen to save the people from actual starvation during April, May, and June, when all who can must work in the fields for next Fall's crops. Japanese givers are on the move with several tens of thousand yen already contributed. But the foreign money is first in the field, and over two unspeakably bitter months are right before us with the whole region of death open. God bless those who help in this terrible extremity.

Sincerely yours,

J. H. DE FOREST.

A letter has reached us from the Rev. W. E. Lampe. He writes from Shiraisi in Miyagi Prefecture, and the letter is dated January 29th. We make the following extracts:—

For four or five days I have been out in the famine districts and now find a worse state of affairs than even I had expected.

As you read the Japanese papers you no doubt are fairly well posted and you have probably noticed that the Japanese papers have taken up this matter and now intend to push it. The truth of the matter simply is that unless some one helps, there will actually be deaths by starvation. The Kahoku Shimpō said a few days ago: "The number of those who have starved to death and who are now at the point of death because of starvation is not small." * * * To-day a gunshōki told me that in one village in the hills near here there are at least a hundred families who have only one full meal in two days.

The heavy snows of the last ten days have suddenly cut off the supplies of thousands—the acorns have all been eaten and the snow is too deep to get at the roots on which many are now living. Now the acute stage has been reached and I have no doubt that all realize that help must now be forthcoming.

There is no excitement, but it is evident that the heads of counties and the officials under them are anxious concerning those who for one reason or another are unable to work. You know Japan well and possibly would not be surprised, but my breath is almost taken away when I see the machinery now in motion for the relief of the distressed.

As it has value not only because of its bearing upon the famine I am taking the liberty to send you a booklet prepared by the officials of Tamara County, Fukushima-ken. Among the tens of thousands of kyūmin in that county alone, there are several thousand who cannot work and must receive help from somewhere. Last Friday I took yen 325 of the amount contributed by foreigners through our committee to the guncho and this was the first money received this year for those who cannot work.

After the tidal wave ten years ago a few thousand people needed help temporarily, but as far as the north is concerned, this is surely the greatest calamity since the Tempo Famine of seventy years ago.

The intense, almost unprecedented, cold of the past week has greatly augmented the need of relief work in this, as well as all three of the famine-stricken prefectures. Accordingly, after consultation with the provincial authorities, it was decided to put to immediate use the 2,500 yen that had come as Iwate's share of the generous contributions for relief that have been put into the Committee's hands up to date. After carefully canvassing the present situation, it was found that the greatest distress is prevailing in nine of the thirteen counties of the province, and in the city of Morioka. But since the distress in these nine counties is not proportionately the same, the money was divided in the following manner: Nishi Iwai 400.00 yen; Higashi Iwai 400.00 yen; Isawai 250.00 yen; Heinuki 250.00 yen; Waga 250.00 yen; Morioka city 250.00 yen; Esashi 200.00 yen; Shiwa 200.00 yen; Iwate 200.00 yen; Kamibei 100.00 yen. The Governor of this province has very kindly and most gladly put at our disposal the whole splendidly organized relief machinery of the province. As a result of this sympathetic and helpful attitude of the ken officials, not one sen of this money will be spent in administration. The whole will be used in buying food. In no case will money be given. The money goes in the above amount to the heads of the counties. There it is again divided in proportion to the need and sent to the heads of the different towns and villages of the county. They in turn buy food for the amount and give it to the sufferers in daily portions. Moreover as here in the North, even in the best of years, a great majority of the farming and working people do not use Japan-grown rice, but sell it and buy foreign rice, which is much cheaper; or buy millet, which is still cheaper, accordingly the food which is customarily used in that particular locality, is to be bought and given. In this way the money will be made to go as far as possible, will serve as many people as possible, and will reach them just at the time when they need it most. It will also reach them in daily portions of food, so that they will not be able to uselessly or harmfully waste any portion of it. I should also add that because of the smallness of the amount, a few thousand yen where hundreds of thousand yen are actually needed, it was decided that as far as possible the following classes of people should be helped by this money. Old people, sick people, people who for any reason are unable to work, and children who have had to stop school because they have nothing to bring for lunches. We hope to get enough contributions later on so that we shall not be compelled to make these restrictions, for the dire need is not limited to these. If anyone has been led to believe that the relief work undertaken by this committee is uncalled for, I hope they will not fail to read the following item which appeared in the Japan Times, in its issue of January 22nd.

Let them also remember that this information comes from Japanese sources, from Japanese living in the famine-stricken district. It says, "According to a dispatch under date 19th inst., the famine-stricken people in Fukushima-ken are now in a most pitiable plight, in spite of the authorities doing the best they can. The weather is bitterly cold in the north, and many poor people, after enduring the cruel attacks of hunger have been starved to death. School children are driven by the bitter pangs of hunger to steal their miserable lunches from one another, and robbers and thieves are becoming numerous, forced to do something or die. It is only too certain that there will be many more deaths in the next few months." We justify our relief work and our appeal for help, because just the conditions that are described in the above item exist in many places in these three provinces to-day. Where people are actually starving to death and it was evident that distress as dire as this would come, how could we do otherwise than let the cry of humanity be known and give sympathetic hearts an opportunity to reach out a helping hand?

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

Prince Arthur of Connaught is expected to reach Yokohama on the 17th proximo in H.M.S. Diadem. His Royal Highness will proceed at once to Tokyo where, according to the present programme, he will remain a week, the palace of Prince Arisugawa at Kasumigaseki being assigned for his use. On leaving Tokyo he will visit Kagoshima and spend a short time there, lodging in a residence of Prince Shimazu. It is stated that a Japanese naval squadron will go out to meet the Diadem.

CHINA.

A correspondent who was in Shanghai at the time of the Mixed-Court riot and who seems to have investigated the whole matter with exceptional thoroughness, writes that the so-called fraternizing of Japanese subjects with the rioters appears to have had no foundation more solid than the fact that a Japanese photographer was among the crowd taking views. This man had subsequently several interesting pictures for sale, but his presence was purely a matter of business and he evidently took some risk to obtain his negatives. If that be the only ground for the accusation against the Japanese, it is a very singular case of misapprehension and exaggeration.

Mr. Doremus Scudder contributes to the Outlook an interesting essay on "Chinese Citizenship in Hawaii," and in the course of it he makes a striking comment. After speaking of the hearty welcome extended in America to all persons coming from Europe, he goes on to say:—

In the case of the Chinese all is changed. His welcome is jeers and stones. I well recall a scene often enacted before my eyes in San Francisco during the later sixties, when I was a child. Oriental steamers very frequently came on Sunday, and the Chinese immigrants were carted in open express wagons through the very centre of the city to Chinatown. Regardless of the peaceful nature of the day, kept far better than now, knots of boys and young men gathered on the street corners to revile the newcomers with oaths, while they compelled the wagons to run a gauntlet of flying missiles, which prophesied the sort of treatment every Chinese might expect in free America. Only the other day in Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love, a cultured Chinese gentleman, long resident there, informed a lady, who expressed surprise because his wife and daughter remained too closely at home, that he did not dare allow them upon the streets, fearing not only insult but even violence.

It is well that facts like these should be occasionally called to mind. Their narrators are never popular. The average Occidental hates to have it suggested even remotely that while clamouring loudly against every display of rudeness to which foreigners are exposed in China, however paltry it be, the Chinese when they visit or reside in the United States are exposed to rudenesses of a most uncivilized character.

The first resolute attempt of the Chinese to give financial effect to their programme of recovering their rights, as they call the present movement, has been attended with a signal catastrophe. The Viceroy of Liang-Kuang, H. E. Tsen Chun-huan, has been assassinated. He was shot, the telegrams say, while en route to make some New-Year calls. Apparently the proximate cause of his death was the arrest of two leading merchants in connexion with their refusal to promote the Viceroy's plan for raising funds on account of the Yeh-Han Railway. The deceased Viceroy was a son of the late Viceroy Tsen Yü-ying. He had been a prominent official since 1892, when he became sub-Director of Imperial Entertainments. He had served as Governor of Shensi, Shansi and Kuangtung.

The Peking and Tientsin Times of Jan. 10th says:—We are glad to learn that the German and Japanese Generals have effected a most amicable settlement of the late unfortunate fracas, and that perfect harmony has been re-established between the garrisons in Peking, the men being no longer confined to barracks.

All the Chinese newspapers in Hongkong and Canton have suspended publication from Jan. 19th until Jan. 27th, thus enabling their staffs to have a New Year holiday of ten full days. The fiat apparently evoked no protest from the Chinese newspaper reading public, remarked the Hongkong

Daily Press, who submit to the deprivation with a serenity unequalled by any other newspaper reading public in the world. The holiday in previous years, we believe, has not exceeded a week.

The report of the Hongkong Land Reclamation Co., Ltd., for 1905 shows a divisible balance of $555,781. Out of this the managing directors get $55,122, the directors $5,000, and the auditors $100. The sum of $112,500 is distributed in dividend and bonus of 12 per cent, and the balance, $383,059, is carried forward.

A Wuhu dispatch report that with the consent of the gentry and rice merchants of Anhui province H. E. Governor Cheng Hsun, has instructed the officials of the Rice-tax Bureau to levy an extra duty of five tael cents on every picul of rice sold in Wuhu and other cities of Anhui. The money accruing from this tax is to be used as the nucleus of a fund for the construction of railways in the province, until such time as by the development and enrichment of Anhui through its railways and mines there will be no more need for the imposition of this additional tax.

A very interesting paper was read at the last meeting of the Shanghai branch of the Royal Asiatic Society by Mr. T. W. Kingsmill on "Ancient Tibet and its Frontagers," in which many proofs were brought forward to show that it was a Turanian tribe of the Kuru and not Tibetans that competed so fiercely with the Hans for the possession of the Empire of Eastern Asia. This paper is a continuation of the work done by Mr. Kingsmill in a former paper on "The Mantse and the Golden Chersonese" and is a valuable contribution to the Ethnography of Western China.

According to a Peking letter a recent memorial presented by Prince Tsai Chên advocating the abolition of the system of Banner Corps organizations amongst the Manchus has brought upon both himself and his father, Prince Ching, the wrath of the Empress Dowager, who declared that a suggestion like the above was nothing less than revolutionary and subversive of the dynastic prerogatives. Hence as Prince Ching was present at the reading of his son's memorial in the Grand Council Chamber he got the vials of the Imperial wrath full on his devoted head, a catastrophe which Prince Tsai Chên, fortunately for himself, escaped, he not being a Grand Councillor. So serious is the anger of the Empress Dowager against Prince Ching for being the young man's parent, that the old gentleman has thought fit to ask for a few days' sick leave in order to give her Majesty time to cool down a little. As a result of this there is a report that Prince Ching has asked to be permitted to resign his membership in the Grand Council, of which he is the President. Whether his prayer will be allowed is still an open question.

The Laou Kung Mow Cotton Spinning and Weaving Company report that the balance at the credit of Profit and Loss account for 1905 amounts to Tls. 173,685.28, out of which the Board recommend a payment of a dividend of Tls. 8.00 per share, which will absorb Tls. 57,264.00.

It is reported from Canton, says the N.-C. Daily News, that there is considerable friction between the gentry and merchants of Canton on the one side, and the mandarinates of that city on the other, with reference to the question of raising the wherewithal to prosecute the construction of the Canton-Hankow Yueh-Han Railway, now that this line has been taken back from the so-called American-Belgian Syndicate. The mercantile classes, remembering their past experiences, are naturally very suspicious of the intentions of the official classes, and criticise every proposition offered by the latter for the raising of funds, pretending to see in each of these proposals some scheme to saddle the former with all the responsibility with nothing of the corresponding and resultant advantages which should be the outcome of the railway when it has been completed and put into running order. The result of all this is that, despite repeated meetings between the merchants and gentry and officials, nothing tangible has been arrived at as yet, and the situation can only be styled as uncertain, extremists of the two parties being divided into hostile camps, with a body of moderates of both parties in the middle, trying their best to compromise matters. In this connection we learn that Viceroy Tsên has arrested one of the foremost opponents of the official clique in the person of a wealthy merchant of Canton named Li Kuo-lien, who will probably have to spend his New Year holidays in prison unless he proves himself more amenable towards the worthy "fatherly and motherly" gentlemen who rule his native city of Canton. Another thorn in the side of the official classes, a prominent member of the Canton gentry, Liang Ch'ing-chu, who holds the literary grade of Literatus par excellence (Hanlin) and the official rank of a secretary of one of the Great Boards at Peking, has also been placed under the Viceregal surveillance. He cannot be summarily arrested until he is cashiered and reduced to the ranks, for permission to put into effect which Viceroy Tsên telegraphed to Peking, and obtained it with the request that the cashiering process shall be considered only a temporary one and that Mr. Liang's rank and titles be returned him "when he proves amenable." The Imperial Rescript to the telegram read "Permission given."

THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING SOCIETY.

The annual New Year meeting of the Tokyo English Speaking Society was held on Saturday evening, January 27th, at the Fujimi-ken, Fujimicho, Kojimachi. President Baron Kanda occupied the chair and thirty members were present. The guests included Mrs. Hugh Fraser, Miss Caroline Schereschewsky and Dr. Nitobe.

Dr. Nitobé was the first speaker. His eloquent address largely emphasized the power of the English tongue in spreading Anglo-Saxon ideas of justice, liberty, and right. He told how the influences in the Government and the Universities were mostly German, but in society (as opposed to government) and in private colleges they were almost wholly Anglo-Saxon.

The Rev. Prof. Lloyd said in part:—"We all know how hard it is to teach English. It has no grammar, or it is chiefly one of exceptions. The great power of English is its wideness; and Irish-English, American-English, and German-English all have their places, so that the time may come when Japanese-English may become a very good working dialect."

The Rev. L. B. Cholmondeley, Mr. Kaeriyama, and Mr. Sowers were the other speakers.

A business meeting followed the banquet.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The rumours as to the Washington Government's project of offering the Philippines for sale to Japan have acquired a certain amount of insistence, probably because The Times thought them worthy of reproduction. We observe in the Yomiuri a statement that an offer in that sense was made some time ago by the United States but that Japan did not see her way to accept it. One can scarcely conceive any American Government taking such a step. There is undoubtedly in the United States a tolerably strong party which sets its face against imperial expansion and consequently denounces the acquisition of the Philippines as a flagrant departure from the political routes that the United States should unfailingly follow. But we doubt whether even the members of that very party would vote en bloc for the sale of the islands to a foreign Power if the question came up for national decision. The instinct of empire is firmly planted in every Anglo-Saxon. He may hate jingoism in every form, but were he invited to endorse the process of reducing the dimensions of his own country in deference either to humanitarian sentiment or practical expediency, that instinct would immediately assert itself to the discomfiture of his principles and his judgment alike. The last official report conveyed to the Americans about the Philippines was that of Mr. Taft, and it was by no means such a report as would encourage pessimism. Besides, the Americans recognise that they have put their hands to a very difficult plough in the South Seas and their feeling of manhood would render them averse to surrendering the job until, at all events, much stronger evidences of its hopelessness are forthcoming.

It is said to be the intention of the Japanese Authorities to construct the Antung-Mukden line and its branches by means of military labour. There exists at present in Japan a battalion of military railway engineers. A battalion would evidently be far too small a body to undertake such a work with any reasonable hope of concluding it within the period of two years fixed by treaty. There will be a necessity, therefore, to add largely to this branch of the Army's organization if the above programme is to be carried out. Japanese papers do not say what dimensions the force will take but we presume that it will at least be raised to a regimental establishment. The temporary line already connecting Mukden with Antung was built by the Army, but of course the services of large fatigue parties could be commanded so long as the campaign lasted. One lesson very strongly inculcated by this war is the imperative necessity of rapidly constructing military railways and telegraphs. Where the front of the armies engaged extends to a distance of from 50 to 100 miles, a manifest advantage will be with the general who can first provide his troops with means of transport and communication. Such problems were of very secondary importance in the days when an extension of 7 miles, as was the case in Wellington's lines at Torres Vedras, was deemed something extraordinary. But Oyama fought with a front of 90 miles at Mukden.

The three ships forming the Training Squadron, namely, the Matsushima, Hashidate and Isukushima, are to leave Yokosuka on the 25th of February for a cruise lasting until the 15th of August, a space of 190 days. They will visit Korea, the Chinese coast, Hongkong, Manila, Thursday Island, Townsville, Melbourne and Sydney on their outward voyage, and will return by Batavia, Singapore and Formosa. This will be the second visit paid by a Japanese training squadron to Australia.

Mr. Takahira, formerly Japanese Representative in Washington, has been made a member of the House of Peers. Nothing is yet stated as to the time when his successor, the first Japanese Ambassador to the United States, will leave for his post.

There are evidences that the severity of the winter is quite exceptional. Tairen Bay is frozen so as to defy navigation and Soya Strait is in a very dangerous condition. A Japanese steamer, the Konoura Maru, left Nagasaki on the 17th instant with about 80 Russian passengers for Vladivostok. She reached Askold Island on the 23rd but could not get any farther on account of the ice, and as the thermometer was falling rapidly and the air was thick with snow-flakes she decided to put back to Gensan. Even the latter port, however, could not be reached, and finally the ship had to head for Nagasaki which she reached on the 26th. Her Russian passengers are said to be clamorous, many of them being without means to resume the journey. The steamer will probably set out again.

The somewhat confusing titles of Japanese Naval Engineers—confusing because the title itself conveyed no clue to the relative rank of its holder—have been remodelled, so that in future the titles of combative officers will be used with the distinction of the prefix kikuan. Thus we shall have Kikuan Chu-jo (Engineer Lieutenant-General, the highest attainable rank in this branch of the service); Kikuan Shōsho (Engineer Major-General); Kikuan Taisha (Engineer Colonel) and so on.

In our account of the visit of Sir Claude and Lady Macdonald to the Toyama Hospital we stated that they were accompanied by the Rev. J. Ballagh. We find that this was a mistake and that it was Miss Ballard who accompanied them. Miss Ballard has been in the habit of visiting Toyama Hospital and has arranged several entertainments for the soldiers there. Lady Macdonald wishing to do something to give pleasure to the patients asked Miss Ballard to arrange an entertainment on her behalf, which was accordingly held on the 20th. Two hundred and fifty patients were invited to the recreation room where they immensely enjoyed stories by Teisui, the well known "Koshakushi." After a distribution of tea and cakes Sir Claude and Lady Macdonald visited the wards. The soldiers much appreciated a visit of sympathy paid at a time when people are so much taken up with the return of the troops. The soldiers were particularly interested when Sir Claude spoke a few words to them and told them that he had served in the British Army for twenty years.

The Jiji Shimpō says that the newly concluded treaty with Canada will go into force from March, and that the customs duties are largely reduced in the case of each of the contracting parties. It seems unlikely that a treaty which has not yet been promulgated will be put into operation within a few weeks.

During the war the Army Department constantly employed 20 steamers for the transport of sick and wounded. Thirteen of these are now to be released and seven only retained.

General Baron Nogi and General Baron Kawamura have been appointed members of the High Military Council.

In the Jiji Shimpō we find another mysterious paragraph, which says that a person associated with an English liberal journal is about to start an anti-Japanese propaganda and that his preparations have already begun on a large scale in Japan and China. The object is supposed to be partly to restore England to her old place of "splendid isolation" by bringing about the abolition of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and partly to place obstacles in the way of the employment of Japanese labour. These motives are of course matters of conjecture, more or less. The venture, if it be really contemplated, may be inspired by a genuine conviction that the Japanese are a world-menace. Our contemporary, estimating the source of the enterprise, declines to lay the responsibility on the Liberal Party which has a high reputation for fairness and justice and which has declared itself frankly favourable to the alliance with Japan. Possibly a third Power may be the instigator. To what third Power the Jiji alludes we do not clearly gather, but of course either Germany or Russia is indicated, for no other country could be supposed to interest itself in such an essay. The thing is altogether very perplexing and very difficult to credit. As to the idea that Germany would take this route, there are many reasons to doubt it. We regard it rather as Germany's misfortune than her fault, and certainly not as her design, that of four journals published by Germans or in German interests in Shanghai and Yokohama, three show a distinctly anti-Japanese tendency. That is an accident. The facts might just as well be diametrically different. At all events we can not for a moment persuade ourselves to suppose that any influential body of Germans would conceive this newspaper project, and as for Russian inception, that is scarcely less incredible. The Jiji writes with such confidence that some belief must be placed in the story, but until more conclusive evidences are forthcoming we are at liberty to suppose that rumour is playing its proverbial tricks.

It appears that the recently published news as to complete cessation of ship-communication with Saghalien, was somewhat exaggerated. The repairs of the ice-crushing steamer Tairei were completed on the 24th and she set out for the island. Tokyo papers doubt, however, whether she can accomplish much.

It has been settled that the 10th of March every year shall be celebrated as the anniversary of the War. That is the day on which the Battle of Mukden was finally decided.

The Beer Trust has become an accomplished fact. A final meeting was held by representatives of the three companies—the Sapporo, the Asahi and the Ebisu—on the 29th instant and it was decided to call the new company the Dai Nippon Bakusku Kaisha. There is to be as little change as possible in the methods hitherto pursued. Each company is to preserve its own label. Strenuous efforts will be made, however, to foster export, and agents are to be sent abroad for the purpose. Other companies applying for admission will be welcomed.

The Italian Government has given formal notice, it is said, of an intention to raise its Legation in Tokyo to an Embassy, and Japan will respond in the case of hers in Rome. Thus the Japanese Embassies in the West now amount to five. We give them with the names of the Ambassadors:—

London .....	Viscount Hayashi.
Paris .....	Mr. Kurino.
Washington .....	Viscount Aoki.
Berlin .....	Mr. K. Inouye.
Rome .....	Not yet appointed.

Russia has not yet made any intimation but there can be little doubt that she too will have an Embassy in Tokyo.

On the 31st ultimo His Majesty conferred the rank of Field-Marshal on General Count Nozu, and the corresponding rank of Admiral of the Fleet upon Admiral Viscount Ito. In Japanese nomenclature both ranks, military and naval, are termed Gensui.

The ice at Tairen seems to be exceptionally thick. A southerly wind broke it up partially on the 29th ultimo, and masses of it drifted into the Bay. Crushing operations are proceeding vigorously.

FIRES.

Fire broke out in an up-stair room of Messrs. Winckler and Co., No. 256, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, on Monday morning. This room was occupied by Mr. F. Fachtmann. Warning was at once given by the police-box near Hanazono Bridge to the Kaga-cho Station, and the usual measures were carried out by the Fire Brigade. So efficiently did they work that only a small part of the ceiling and the inner side of the wall were slightly damaged. A defect in the stovepipe seems to have been the cause of the outbreak.

On Sunday evening, fire broke out in Nakamachi, Fukagawa, Tokyo, destroying three houses and damaging six.

About 10 a.m. on Tuesday, fire broke out in one of the up-stair rooms of the Beresford Hotel, No. 88, Yokohama. The flames were immediately put out, and the damage was limited to a stove-chimney in which the fire originated.

On the night of January 28th, fire broke out in the Nagano Tax Bureau, destroying the building.

Fire broke at 11.40 p.m. on Jan. 29th at Kawasaki destroying a dwelling and a shed. An old woman, Haru Ishiwata, was found dead among the debris. At the examination by the Shinagawa police it was found that the old lady had been strangled with a cord and there is suspicion that after her death fire was set to the house. Ishiwata, her second son, was arrested the following day in Yokohama on suspicion and was removed to the Tokyo District Court.

The Wakayama Chamber of Commerce was burned down on the night of Jan. 29.

At 4.40 a.m. on Thursday, Feb. 1st, fire broke out in the offices of Messrs. Durand, Cobb & Co., carriage builders and saddlers, No. 83, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, destroying the building. It seems that the saddlers were engaged working late on a rush-order and had only knocked off their labours about an hour before the fire was discovered. Mr. L. Morean, the manager, was sleeping in one of the up-stair rooms when he noticed a smell of smoke beside hearing an unusual crackling sound coming from downstairs. Rising hastily he proceeded to the stair-head and found that the rooms below were blazing furiously and that the fire was breaking through the ceiling. Mr. Morean at once effected an escape and reached the yard safely. It is believed that a stove which had been set up only a few days before in the centre of the front office, caused the fire. The police consider that sparks left in the stove after the workmen retired were carried up the pipe and lodging in the elbow-joint set fire to some inflammable materials near the stove. Fortunately there was no injury to human life or to the valuable stud of horses in the adjoining stables.

The building belonged to Messrs. Helm Bros. and was insured in the Netherland Fire Insurance Co. (whose Yokohama agents are Messrs. Raspe and Co.) for eight thousand yen.

A fire occurred early on the morning of Jan. 31st in Asakusa, Tokyo. Owing to a strong wind, the flames extended through to Sanyamachi, Tamahime-machi, etc. destroying 439 and damaging 31 houses. About ten persons were severely injured. The loss sustained by the Tokyo Fire Insurance Co., is estimated at twenty thousand.

CUSTOMS PROTEST.

Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama Customs, gave a decision on Jan. 31st, in a protest brought by Messrs L. J. Healing & Co., No. 22, Yamashita-cho. Messrs Healing & Co. imported ebonite on which the appraisers imposed specific duty at the rate of yen 17.905 per 100 kin in accordance with No. 412 of the tariff. The importers contended that the goods should be dealt with under No. 1 of the Conventional Tariff between Japan and Great Britain and the duty should be ad valorem 10 per cent. The protest was sustained on the ground that the articles are a kind of manufactured caoutchouc.

STATE PURCHASE OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS.

THE question of the nationalization of all the Railways in Japan seems to have entered the field of practical politics. There was talk of introducing a bill in that sense when the KATSURA Cabinet was in power prior to the war and the talk is now renewed in a very positive form. As to the pros and cons of the matter from a general point of view, exhaustive arguments may be perused by any one specially interested. On the one hand we have the basic objection that official management is seldom cheap or thoroughly efficient; on the other, the unanswerable contention that if telegraphs lie properly within the domain of official control, then the same must be true of railways. Both are essential instruments of public communications and both from their nature are essentially monopolies. A great deal may be justly urged against state monopolies where they have the effect of paralyzing private enterprise, but in cases where private enterprise must itself take the shape of a monopoly, it seems unquestionable that official control should be preferred. The query which must present itself to every practical man in this context is, "will the nation gain anything by the proposed change of ownership," and upon the answer to that query our final judgment must be founded. There is not, we think, any room to doubt that the energies of Japanese statesmen should be devoted to the commercial and industrial development of their country. It is in that direction that Japan's future lies. As a producer and exporter of raw materials no specially prosperous career unfolds itself, but as a manufacturer she has great prospects. Evidently one of the most effective ways of promoting industrial and commercial growth is to provide cheap and convenient means of transport; in other words, to cover the country with a network of railways operated at the lowest possible charges. If, in proposing to nationalize the railways, the Japanese Government have in view the lowering of rates and the extension of the service, their purpose can not be too strongly applauded. But if the object be merely to acquire another income-producing asset and to exploit it to the top of its capacity, there can be no hesitation in condemning the scheme. It is true that the former aim can not be achieved without some difficulty, for the private railways, as a rule, are so prosperous that the Treasury would have to pay for their acquisition a price not leaving much margin for cheapening rates. Nevertheless there would be some margin, especially as the cost of administration could not fail to be lowered by bringing the whole system under one control. Then there is another and a highly important consideration, namely, that by the amalgamation of all the lines facilities of transport would be immensely improved. Owing to the existing division into a number of companies several of which think only of their own dividends and fail to recognise either their duty to the public or their true duty to their shareholders, great obstacles are offered to the conveyance of goods from one part of the country to another. Within the district tapped by a particular line and its branches freight is handled with tolerable satisfaction to its owners, but only tolerable. No sooner, however, has connection to be made with the lines of other companies than embarrassments more or less serious arise, and for years past we have been hearing complaints of the existence of a state of affairs which is very far from conducing to the development of the country's commerce and industry. This is a phase of the question which deserves the most careful consideration. In its context, arguments as to whether practical experience discredits the ability of Japanese officialdom for purposes of railway management, or whether some particular private company has not won the crown of efficient operation, sink into total significance. We have seen what Japanese officialdom can do in the matter of organization and direction on a stage of colossal dimensions. We have seen object lessons so striking that they destroy all ground for scepticism. Anything within the range of private competence so far as railways are concerned must be within the range of official competence also. At all events that is quite a secondary question. The point of real interest and importance is that by placing the whole railway system under one control and bringing its various parts into effective coöperation, and combination, the country can be supplied with mechanism of transportation such as seems to be quite unattainable under divided management. A few years ago this argument used to present itself forcibly under another form, the strategical form. Japanese Generals considered that the transport of troops could not be conveniently and efficaciously contrived unless all the lines were in official hands. But the experiences of the recent war dispelled this apprehension, and proved that the powers vested in the Government in time of emergency enable it to command all necessary facilities. Thus we come back to the problem of commercial and industrial convenience only, and we have not the least hesitation in saying that if the Government's programme of nationalization is dictated by a genuine desire to solve that problem satisfactorily, the Diet should have no hesitation in passing the Bill.

GERMANY IN THE FAR EAST.

IN the January number of the Outlook there is an interesting essay written by "a Berlin Diplomat" and entitled "Emperor WILLIAM." The essayist is a sincere admirer of the KAISER, whom he describes as "a man of exceptional personal attainments and of encyclopædic knowledge," but he attributes to His Majesty two aims which are not conspicuously compatible, namely, "the elevation of Germany to the position of supreme political power in the world" and the maintenance of peace. As to the former purpose, Emperor WILLIAM, we are told, is swayed by a religious conviction that the Germans have been really marked out by divine selection as "the instruments of God's will on earth," and as to the latter, he is fully persuaded that the prosperity of the German empire is based, not on the strength of armaments, but on the development of industry and commerce. It is then by trade that he hopes to see his country realize the great hopes he entertains for her, and if he keeps a huge army and strives to develop an immense navy, it is because he believes these preparations to be essential as means for averting war. It is not to be denied that all His Majesty's actions may easily be referred to the motives read into them by this "Berlin Diplomat," who indeed seems to speak with unassailable authority. However, what interests us especially in his essay is the arenas said to have been chosen by the Emperor for the growth of German commerce and the reasons attributed to him for the choice. The arenas are South America and Asia Minor, and they have been selected by a process of exhaustion. "German economists," we read, "anticipate that a number of huge international combinations will compete for the trade supremacy of the world within a measurable future. The British Empire is expected to form one customs and commercial union; the Russian Empire, extending from the Eastern border of Germany to the Pacific Ocean, together with the regions of Central Asia, forms another commercial unit; America is a third; and Japan, which will inevitably carry out the commercial conquest of China within the next decade, will perhaps become the most formidable of these groups." Japan is not brought into this analysis as a mere incident. The "Berlin Diplomat" evidently regards her with very serious eyes. Elsewhere he tells us:—"It is now recognised that China, whose commercial spoils Germany hoped to share, is probably destined to become little more than a dependency of Japan, and the KAISER has declared in a semi-public manner that he fully expects Japan to close the open door in China." Moreover:—"Probably both the Balkan States and the two countries of the Scandinavian peninsula will continuously feel the effects of the crushing defeat which Russia has sustained in Asia, more especially as the terms of the new alliance between England and Japan practically exclude all possibility of Russian expansion on the Asiatic Continent during the next half century." It is possible that these views may be exaggerated, especially in so far as concerns the closing of the open door in China, for we can not at present conceive any combination of circumstances calculated to drive Japan from the position which forms the very foundation of her alliance with England. Be that as it may, however, the KAISER's resolve to abandon his expansive policy in East Asia is very clearly declared, and the fact, if it be a fact, has most vital interest for China and Japan. Of course the "Berlin Diplomat" is not infallible. He may be mistaken in his estimate of the KAISER's resolves. But it is certain that he only echoes a conviction which has forced itself upon the attention of observers in this part of the world, and which was expressed in these columns some time ago. The importance of the matter lies, not so much in German potentialities, for these are not very formidable in the Far East, as in the possible nature of her efforts. Her best friends have to admit that she obtained Kiaochow in a manner scarcely consistent with any recognised method of respectable international procedure, and the incident suddenly projected her figure in alarming proportions upon the horizon of East Asia. Thenceforth no one could estimate what line of conduct to attribute to her in any given contingency, and thus an abiding sense of insecurity was created. That is now at an end so far as the KAISER's initiative is concerned. On the South-American Continent and in the region between the Bosphorus and the Persian Gulf, there should not be much opportunity for Kiaochow tactics, and it is permissible to hope that whatever developments the genius of the KAISER may there obtain for his country's commerce will not parody the divine inspiration by which he believes himself to be guided. Still if these are his own chosen spheres, and if it be true, as a "Berlin Diplomat" assures us, that, failing the success of peaceful methods, HIS MAJESTY "would fight for the success of a cause which he believes to be righteous," other Western States can not be censured if, in the presence of such fanatical ambition, they fail to feel tranquilly confident. East Asia, however, may probably dismiss the German bugbear from its imagination.

BUSINESS MEN IN JAPAN.

READING recently of the Emperor of GERMANY we came across the following passages:—

The Emperor's personal intercourse with the great merchant princes of Germany has naturally strengthened and extended his belief in the supreme importance of commerce. The late Herr Krupp, the owner of the most colossal industrial undertaking in the world, was the Kaiser's most intimate friend.

Herr Ballin, the Managing Director of the Hamburg-American Steamship Company; Herr Wiegand, the Managing Director of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company; Herr Bleichroeder, the great banker; Herr James Simon, the great merchant, and other leading manufacturers and men of business, are now included in the circle of the Kaiser's intercourse. The German Emperor has acquired a sound knowledge of the fundamental requirements of all branches of industry and commerce.

He is acquainted with the details of import and export trade, of mining and manufactures, of ship building and Stock Exchange transactions. The acquisition of this knowledge has persuaded the Kaiser that the world-supremacy of Germany must be based primarily on the world-supremacy of German commerce. He is convinced that the development of German trade and the creation of new markets for German products will do more to build up the power of Germany than the acquisition of new territories and the extension of the boundaries of the Empire.

Statements of this nature must sound strangely in the ears of Japanese business-men who are excluded from the Court of their country to-day nearly if not altogether as strictly as they were in pre-Meiji days. A European or an American man of affairs, if he visits Japan, can easily obtain through his Representative at the MIKADO's court the privilege of being invited to Palace fêtes and even the privilege of an audience. Only the other day Mr. HARRIMAN, an American railway magnate, was received by the SOVEREIGN of this Empire and was treated on the whole as though he had been some great statesman. Apparently it did not occur to the officials of the Kunaisho that Mr. HARRIMAN is just a tradesman and nothing more, and that in according to him treatment which they would not think of extending to one of their own countrymen in a corresponding position, they were setting up a most invidious distinction between foreigner and Japanese. We do not suggest for a moment that men like Mr. HARRIMAN should not be honoured. On the contrary, our point is that in his case the Japanese court officials did the right thing—perhaps a little over-punctuated but still, broadly speaking, the right thing—and that they do essentially the wrong thing when they close the Imperial portals in the face of their own merchants and manufacturers. Need we say that we do not write in a spirit of impertinent intrusion. It is much easier for pure outsiders like ourselves to discuss these matters than it is for those who suffer directly by the discrimination referred to. Moreover, the time is eminently appropriate, since the Japanese nation must now be fully alive to the fact that, failing the patriotic spirit shown by its business-men, the war which raised this empire to a leading place among the world's Great Powers could never have been successfully waged. Has that point been borne in upon the intelligence of the officials of the Imperial Household Department, or do they still adhere to the mediæval formula which puts the "merchant at the lowest point in the social scale? Japan is just now wrestling with a tough financial problem. What exit does she see? One only; namely the development of her trade and industry so that to the fine valour and loyalty of her people there shall be added that without which victorious war is impossible, wealth. Could anything be more irrational or short sighted than to show want of due consideration at such a juncture to the very men who are to act the part of the country's saviours? The pending arrival of Prince ARTHUR of CONNAUGHT seems to offer a good occasion for a wholesome change. Great Britain can not, unless she is singularly inconsistent, lend her countenance to any programme depriving the mercantile and manufacturing classes in Japan of the honour, which is their just due and which they would receive in London, Berlin, Paris or Washington. It is a delicate question, as we fully recognise, but possibly the British Ambassador may see his way to accord to Japanese business-men the consideration that is extended to their British confreres in England, thus setting an example which is perhaps alone needed to prise things out of their obsolete and unnatural groove.

THE CHINESE DANGER.

THERE is an evident sense of apprehension among Europeans and Americans as to the possibilities of the near future in China, but in all the hitherto published estimates of the factors of unrest the mood of the Chinese themselves seems to be alone considered. We miss any reference to a factor which appears by no means unimportant, the mood of the foreigners residing in China. This omission is forcibly called to mind by an article which recently appeared in the columns of the North-China Daily News. It was headed "Anti-foreign Action" and its opening sentences ran thus:—

It is definitely stated that the Viceroy, H. E. Chou Fu, has decided to build a gaol for the custody of the prisoners sentenced at the Mixed Court, who are now mostly taken to the Municipal Gaol, at a cost of half-a-million taels. This is a translation into action of the anti-foreign feeling that the local officials from the Viceroy down have been lately displaying. There is absolutely no necessity for the erection of any such prison, the new Municipal gaol amply serving the purpose. It is simply a piece of ill-feeling and ill-temper on the part of the Viceroy.

The paper from which we quote is the leading foreign journal published in China, and must therefore be read as representing the sentiments of the most respectable foreign residents. At all events it is so read by the Chinese, and on perusing the above article they will naturally ask themselves whether the action of the VICEROY really deserves the interpretation there given to it. Is His EXCELLENCY fairly chargeable with translating into action the anti-foreign feeling said to exist among his nationals, and can his procedure be justly designated "a piece of ill-feeling and ill temper." The question at issue is simply this: shall Chinese subjects, tried and sentenced by a Chinese tribunal, undergo their punishment in a Chinese prison or in a foreign? Such a question sounds almost absurd, so obvious is the answer. It is, in truth, on the foreign side that ordinary observers would be disposed to find evidence of "ill-feeling" and "ill-temper" when such a problem evokes such expressions from the leading foreign journal. We understand very well the sentiment animating our Shanghai contemporary. It regards this action of the VICEROY as the beginning of an attempt to circumscribe the autonomy enjoyed by the foreign municipality in Shanghai. But surely the occasion does not justify that construction. No exercise of its autonomy should be less significant or more anomalous in the eyes of the Municipality than the custody of Chinese criminals undergoing punishment ordered by a Chinese tribunal. On the other hand, from the VICEROY's point of view it is a glaring violation of his country's sovereignty that her subjects who have committed crimes against her laws within her own territories and who have been tried and sentenced by her own law-courts, should undergo their punishment in the custody of foreign jailers. A short time ago when the mixed-court trouble was acute, the VICEROY was assured by this same journal that the only motive swaying foreigners was one of humanity, and that they objected to surrender a Chinese woman to Chinese wardens because she was likely to be subjected to uncivilized treatment. The VICEROY answers that objection by spending half a million yen on the construction of a prison so built and so equipped as to defy the reproach of inhumanity. His act ought to be welcomed, one would imagine, as a substantial reform, especially by those who recently attached clamorous importance to the imperfections of the present jail. Yet, so far from being welcomed, it is denounced as a piece of ill-feeling and ill-temper, and so far from any note being taken of the VICEROY's natural and proper desire to preserve his country's sovereignty, he is charged with translating anti-foreign sentiment into action. If this incident fairly illustrates the mood of the foreign community of Shanghai, it is distinctly a dangerous mood, and allowance must be made for it in estimating the situation.

CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. CHESTER HOLCOMBE has contributed to the Outlook a very notable article on the subject of "Chinese Exclusion and the Boycott." Happily for him he has the advantage of addressing an audience large enough to rise superior to local prejudices, and though his words will call down execrations on his head from the Pacific slope, they will appeal forcibly to thoughtful Americans. He has the courage to frame a powerful indictment against the action of the United States towards China, and to show that the Chinese have right on their side when they resent such action. At the root of the whole trouble lie flagrant violations of treaty. In 1880 a convention was formed between Washington and Peking which remains to this day in nominal operation. It endues the United States with power to "regulate, limit or suspend the immigration of Chinese labourers but not to prohibit it altogether," and it also provides that "Chinese labourers already in the United States shall be free to remain and to travel to and fro at will; that all other classes of Chinese shall be at liberty to enter and reside within the country and pursue their avocations without molestation; and that Chinese of every class, while within the United States, shall be granted all the rights, privileges and immunities of citizens or subjects of the most favoured nation." This treaty, as Mr. CHESTER HOLCOMBE says and as we all know, was not a bargain. The Chinese received no quid pro quo. They did not understand the motive of America's proposal or appreciate the necessity for restricting labour immigration, but they courteously did as they were asked to do, and they fully trusted the United States Government and people to carry out the other conditions of the treaty in such a manner as to avert any vexatious consequences. Unfortunately that trust has not been justified. American legislators have paid little attention to the treaty. Their first act was to pass, in 1882—the very year after the promulgation of the treaty—a law suspending all Chinese immigration for a term of twenty years. This President ARTHUR vetoed, on the ground that suspension for such a period amounted to prohibition. He did not consider it necessary to point out that to suspend all Chinese immigration even for one year would be in direct violation of a treaty which limited such action to labourers. Congress was not to be deterred. In May of the same year it passed another law suspending Chinese labour immigration for 10 years and forbade the naturalization of Chinese. The President did not veto this, although it distinctly violated the treaty by ignoring the most-favoured-nation stipulation and depriving the Chinese of the privilege of naturalization. The law did not stop here. America was bound by the treaty not to take any action under it except such as should be "reasonable in character." How she interpreted action "reasonable in character" and in accordance with most-favoured-nation treatment, this law offered curious evidence. It ruled that no Chinese labourer who had revisited his native land might return unless he possessed in America a living wife, parent or child, or real estate worth a thousand dollars. Five years later (1888) another law did away wholly with the privilege of returning, forbade the issue of certificates granting that privilege, and declared invalid those already granted, so that many Chinese found themselves forced to sacrifice their property in America and to remain in China. "Subsequently," says Mr. HOLCOMBE, "other acts and amendments were passed, each, if possible more degrading to the Chinese and outrageous upon our part than its predecessors. Any Chinaman found in the country without warrant to be here was to be punished by a year's imprisonment, with hard labor; any ship captain who landed such a Chinese in any port was subject to fine, imprisonment, and the confiscation of his vessel; under pretext that our officials could not discriminate one Chinaman from another, each was required to provide two or more photographs of himself, one copy of which should always be carried with him for purposes of identification. This is only a fraction of the scandalous legislation adopted and aimed against offensive Chinese, whose only crime was a desire to seek a livelihood in this land, to which great masses of less desirable immigrants from other countries were flocking without restraint or hindrance. And the regulations under these various acts, taken with the spirit of abuse and brutality in which they were enforced, form a fitting climax to the shameful record." It is very useful that these facts should be brought clearly before the United States' public, for probably ninety-nine persons out of every hundred have not devoted the least attention to the question, and have hastily jumped to the conclusion that the Chinese, when they resent such treatment, are merely obeying a blind anti-foreign impulse. The Chinese have showed themselves greatly deficient in political perspicacity since they have failed to apprehend the necessity of swimming with the stream of progress. But they have never shown themselves deficient in patience and long suffering. It may fairly be doubted whether any other Power would have endured to be the unresisting victim of such breaches of treaty as China has experienced at America's hands. Were the positions reversed, were China to attempt any similar illegality towards United States' citizens, no reader of modern history can be uncertain as to what would have resulted. All appearances go to indicate that China's slow pulses have begun to beat more rapidly, and that complications not easily dealt with are not unlikely to arise. It is well to remember where the prime responsibility lies.

FERRIS SEMINARY ALUMNAE MEETING.

The Tokyo branch of the Ferris Seminary alumnae held a very pleasant and enjoyable meeting at Mukyokutei, Uyeno, on 30th January, more than thirty former pupils and graduates being present. Among the guests were Mrs. E. R. Miller, the founder of the school; Rev. K. Hoshino, for several years the Japanese Head Master; the Principal, the Rev. E. S. Booth and Mrs. Booth; Miss A. de F. Thompson and Miss Kuyper, the latest addition to the faculty.

Miss Takenouchi gave an interesting report for the retiring committee and read several letters of regret from some of the members who were unable to be present. After a brief address by Mr. Booth, which was interpreted by Miss H. Hirano, of the Joshi Dai Gakko, the new committee was elected, Miss Toyo Inagaki being chosen president.

A bountiful luncheon was served to which all did ample justice amid a hum of voices which bespoke the eagerness with which reminiscences of school days were recounted. The company then retired to the grounds of Benten to be photographed. Upon returning to the tea house the game of Fukubiki was heartily entered into, bringing forth repeated peals of laughter as the pertinent puns dawned upon the comprehension and the appropriateness of the prizes was revealed. An eloquent address from Mr. Hoshino, who has just returned from an eighteen months trip abroad, in which he urged the members of the association to bear the fruits of a Christian life in the home and society, brought the third meeting of the Association to a successful close.

THE PLAGUE.

On Sun. 26th, a fresh case of plague was reported in Osaka. The patient is a female worker, Kane Nameda (20), of the Nippon Cotton Spinning Co., Kami-Fukushima-cho, North division. The factory was segregated together with a thousand male and female workers.

A Shimonoeki telegram says that Dr. Z. Yosuda, who was attending plague patients, was attacked by the disease on Jan. 27th and died the same evening.

A new case of bubonic plague was reported in Kobe on Jan. 28th.

IMPERIAL DIET.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27TH.

The House of Peers met at 10.07 a.m. and having granted some applications for leave of absence, proceeded at once to the Order of the Day. The following Bills were favourably reported by special committees and passed through their second and third readings unanimously:—(1) Bill for amending the Law of the Industrial Bank (as explained in the Japan Mail of 26th inst.); Bill for amending the Law of the Bank of Formosa (vide Japan Mail 26th inst.); and the Bill for amending Law 39 of 1902 (vide Japan Mail 26th inst., noting that "29" is a mistake for "39").

The House rose at 10.35 a.m.

The House of Representatives did not meet, its members being engaged in committee work.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.05 p.m. on the 1st instant.

Mr. Nakanishi presented a Question with regard to the sale of 12,300 tsubo of building land together with some productive upland farming ground at Otaru by the Chief of the Hokkaido Administration to Mr. Tokunaga Yei, who, however, represented Mr. Bando Kangoro, a member of the House of Representatives. The latter, according to the presenter of the Question, was an ardent advocate of the Rumay Railway, as also was the chief of the Administration, and some ugly rumours were in circulation with reference to the matter. The questioner asked for information and for the punishment of the Administrative Chief.

The House then, after some explanations by Government Delegates, handed to special Committees the following Bills sent down from the Peers:—

Bill for amending the Law of the Industrial Bank.

Bill for amending the Law of the Formosa Bank.

Bill for amending the Law No. 29 of 1902.

The Bill for abolishing Law No. 3 of 1901 was passed through all its readings.

Thereafter, the report of the Special Committee appointed to examine the Bill authorizing a domestic loan of 360 million yen, was taken, and the Bill was voted without opposition.

The House rose at 2.16 p.m.

THE BUDGET COMMITTEE.

At a general meeting of the Budget Committee held on the 26th instant Marquis Saionji stated that the Cabinet had been obliged to adopt the Budget of its predecessor, but that there had not been time to make any provision for the post-bellum enterprises which would have to be ultimately undertaken. Careful investigations were needed, and these the Government hopes to have concluded before the Diet assembles for its 23rd session.

Mr. Sakatani also spoke as follows:—"The total sum covered by the Budget is 1,030 million yen, of which 88 millions have been already paid as a matter of urgency, without waiting for the Diet's consent. This was done under Imperial authority in December, and the expenditures were entered in the accounts as extra-budgetary. The remaining sum, over 900 millions, has to receive the Diet's sanction. Out of the grand total over 800 millions represent outlays relating to the war, and the ordinary expenditures stand at 230 millions. It is of course impossible to meet such a large outlay by means of ordinary revenue only, especially as the expenditures in connection with the situation are of the same nature as though the war had been continued. Consequently there is no recourse but to meet the greater part of these outlays by the aid of loans. Some of the outlays are of a continuing nature, and will have to be incurred next year also. These total some 172 millions and a regular source of income must be provided to meet them. The programme is to apply to this purpose the war taxes, which yield 160 million yen annually, and to obtain the remaining 13 millions from the ordinary revenue, thus adding, in effect, 173 millions to the ordinary expenditures. With regard to the sources from which the special outlays are to be defrayed there is, first, the surplus from last year lying in the Treasury; secondly the funds obtained by selling superfluous properties of the Army and Navy as well as captured ships; thirdly, 140 millions are provided by the loan of 30 millions sterling of last July, and some 430 millions will be found by new loans. As to the causes of this outlay of some 800 million yen, one is that owing to the development of the campaign the extraordinary expenditures authorized by the Diet last session had to be increased; another that the costs of bringing back the troops from Manchuria and of rewards to officers, and men have to be met; and yet another that interest on loans, as well as pensions and annuities call for a considerable appropriation. Every item has been made the object of careful examination and consultation with the Department concerned and the utmost economy has been practised. In the ordinary expenditures provisions have been made for purposes which the development of the country's fortunes dictates; as the establishing of connexions between land and sea transportation at Kobe and the extension of the Iron Foundry. These according to the normal plan should be defrayed from the proceeds of taxation but they are to be met according to the present programme by means of loans. Concerning the 430 millions of loans which are to be floated the Government will exercise every care. One hundred and fifty millions are for rewards in connexion with the war. The Deposits Bureau of the Finance Department will take over these bonds, paying out the small amounts in ready money, and in order to maintain the market price of the bonds as well as to effect their gradual redemption on profitable occasions, a special account will be formed for the purposes of this debt."

Mr. Oishi Masami, Progressist leader, asked several questions. The first related to the increase of the Army and Navy. He said that the Anglo-Japanese alliance largely contributed to the preservation of peace in the East and that the defeat Russia had suffered in the recent war must incapacitate her alike in a military and in a pecuniary sense from drawing the sword again in Eastern Asia. Why then did the Government see any reason for increasing the Army and the Navy?

In reply to this question General Terauchi explained that the war had not so greatly impaired Russia's strength as to render her by any means insignificant, and that there were no signs of her abandoning her undertakings in Manchuria. The Anglo-Japanese alliance was undoubtedly a most valuable instrument for preserving peace but at the same time it imposed responsibilities from which Japan must not shrink. There would undoubtedly be a necessity to increase the two services, but inasmuch as the Government's plans for the defences of the Empire were not yet fixed, it had been impossible to include this matter in the estimates now submitted to the House. (It will have been observed that the Prime Minister, in his speech to the two Houses, spoke merely of maintaining the efficiency of the two services—riku-kai-gun no jizitsu wo haka-u.—Ed. J.M.) The General alluded to the great development of the national prestige that the war had brought to Japan, and argued that she must live up to her status.

Mr. Oishi asked whether with only one port in East Asia Russia could possibly maintain here a squadron of 500,000 tons of war-ships, and whether with a single line of railway across Asia she could place in the Far-Eastern field an army of several hundreds of thousands of men. If these questions could not be answered in the affirmative, what reason was there to assume that Japan's present army and navy would not suffice for the occasion?

Admiral Saito, Minister of the Navy, declined to answer this question precisely. He said that he was not yet in a position to submit the policy of the Government for the Committee's consideration as further time was needed for investigations.

Mr. Oishi asked whether a connexion did not exist between armaments and foreign policy.

Mr. Kato, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, said that the Anglo-Japanese alliance was what the Prime Minister had described it to be, namely, a powerful guarantee of peace. As for the connexion between diplomacy and armaments, he had only to say that although Japan's relations with foreign Powers were of a multifarious and complicated character, they were at present eminently pacific. It was not within his capacity, of course, to predict how long that happy state of affairs would last, but he could give assurances that so long as he remained Minister of Foreign Affairs no effort should be spared to preserve peace.

Mr. Oishi asked whether Japan, having now a debt of some 2,000 millions yen, could hope to borrow more in case of a new occasion. He further observed that it was proposed to continue the extraordinary war taxes which in their nature ought to be temporary. In that case it was a moral duty of the statesmen in power to reduce or lighten those taxes as far as possible. Were any steps contemplated in that sense?

Mr. Sakatani said that to place the finances on a sound basis it was essential that these extraordinary taxes should be made permanent. The Government was considering the expediency of revising other correlated taxes, but he was not in a position yet to make any definite statement on that point. In answer to a further question he said that no intention existed of pursuing the pernicious policy of paying off debts with debts, and that conversions should not be confounded with the contraction of ordinary debts.

Mr. Oishi asked what views the Ministry entertained on the subject of administrative reform. It appeared him that men who, when out of office advocated a certain reform, should not when in office, turn their backs upon their own professions. He did not condemn change as change, but he failed to see the justification for that kind of change.

The Prime Minister, while welcoming Mr. Oishi's remarks, noted that they partook partly of the nature of advice, partly of the nature of censure, and partly of the nature of query. As to the question of increasing the Army and Navy he begged to point out that the Government had not proposed any scheme of increase. It was inevitable, however, that in the sequel of a great war, the services should be found to have assumed dimensions which they did not have before the war. As for administrative reform, it had to be noted that the administrative functions devolving on the Government after a great war such as the country had now been engaged in were very different from its functions prior to the war. The volume of business to be transacted had immensely increased, and he considered that the time had come to shelve this problem of administrative reform. (This very emphatic answer seemed to astonish Mr. Oishi and caused much laughter among the Committee.)

In answer to Mr. Kato Masanosuke the Minister of Finance explained that if Japan had to send hard money abroad in payment of interest it was because she had received the principal in hard money. There was nothing to regret or to apprehend in that. As to expenses connected with Korea, undoubtedly there would be heavy outlays but it was not proposed that Japan alone should shoulder this burden: Korea would presently bear her share.

The Minister of War said that it was intended to quarter the Division of troops intended for Korea at Wiju and two other places, and that a part of the appropriation asked for was to be applied to purposes of fortification.

Several other questions were asked and answered.

The Committee met again on the 27th instant. In answer to Mr. Nemoto it was stated by the Government delegates that the capital fund on account of Education (10 million yen) had been expended for warlike purposes and that no date or method was yet fixed for restoring it. An appropriation of 250,000 yen which appeared in the Budget for next year was not interest on that fund, but was a separate amount specially allowed in consideration of the fact that the primary school would be much inconvenienced if they were suddenly deprived of the whole interest on the capital fund.

Asked as to the school-readers and other matters the Minister of Education explained that the readers had been prepared with great haste and consequently some errors had crept into them, but there would be remedied as quickly as possible. The agencies for the sale of these readers had been reduced to ten, owing to the necessity of correcting abuses. He denied that the measure taken by the University Professors and teachers last year on the occasion of a change of President had been of the nature of a strike. As to the proposal to make the Imperial University independent, it had to be considered from two points of view; that of finance and that of the position of the professors. Where the matter was one of finance only the independence of the University might be soon achieved, but the position of the Professors was another matter, calling for careful and well-considered handling. Referring to the long-discussed problem of the uniformity of the educational system, much investigation had been made and certain conclusions had been reached, but the Government was not yet in a position to formulate any definite scheme. With regard to the question of the Chinese students, the Educational Authorities had been guided chiefly by a desire to promote the interests and facilitate the studies of the students themselves. It had become a habit with the students to change from one school to another so frequently as to seriously impede their own studies and to cause much inconvenience to the schools. A regulation had therefore been adopted in the sense that such changes must be sanctioned by the Chinese Minister or by some one having his authorization. The Authorities regarded this as a reasonable and perfectly feasible restriction and they had no intention of changing it.

Mr. Morimoto Shuon observed that 25 million yen were shown in the Budget for restorations in the Army and Navy, but such restorations must be of a continuing nature. He asked, therefore, what total sum was contemplated and for how many years such appropriations would be necessary since the Budget contained no information on that point.

General Terauchi explained that in the term "restorations" were included the replacement of arms and accoutrements and the duty of dealing with sick or wounded. It was estimated that a total sum of 60 millions would be required, and the idea was to spread this outlay over a period of 6 years, 25 millions being set apart in this year's budget, and the remainder allotted in the following 5 years. Human sagacity could not foresee the occurrence of wars and it was essential to be always ready. As to the question whether the Treasury was a consenting party to this six years' arrangement, the General said that he had privately consulted the Minister of Finance but had not yet made any public proposal.

Mr. Morimoto then asked about the Navy. There appeared under that heading also a sum of 25 million yen for "restorations, &c." Was this part of a continuing outlay? If so, what was the estimated total and had it been discussed and agreed to by the Minister of Finance? Again, what was to be understood by the "et cetera"? Did this include supplementing as well as restoring? And what had become of the Third Period scheme of Naval Increment? Was it to be continued or abandoned? He also asked whether, although the Capital Fund for Naval Maintenance was not to be replaced in the next fiscal year, there was an intention of replacing it subsequently.

Admiral Saito said that the appropriation of 25 millions was made up of two items; namely, 11,300,000 yen for restorations and 13,700,000 yen for supplementing (hosoku). It was of course a continuing expenditure. There were some ships which had not yet even reached port since the termination of the war, and it was therefore quite impossible to estimate the exact outlay that would be required. Roughly speaking he put it at 113 million yen, a part of which, however, had already been paid out. As to the Third-Period of Naval Increment, it was in process of being carried out without the slightest change from the original programme.

Mr. Morimoto asked whether the outlays on account of railways, telegraphs, telephones and the Iron Foundry were to be met by loan in the 40th year as well as in the 39th (1906-7), and whether it was intended to abolish the Three Capital Funds altogether or to restore them at some future date.

Mr. Sakatani replied that it was wholly impossible to arrive yet at absolutely finite estimates. The matters that had to be dealt with had not yet assumed clear proportions. There were still many items that could not be immediately calculated. Thus the revenues accruing from Liaotung and Saghalien were things for future calculation, and the same was true of the Fushun Mines and the East Chinese Railway, assets which, even though transferred to private hands, would yield large sums. They must therefore consider the revenue as possessing considerable qualities of elasticity. Assuming, however, that things remained as they are, then certainly it would be necessary to rely on loans for the purposes of the public works alluded to, which, however, it must be remembered were themselves paying investments. It had not been determined to abolish the three Funds, but the problem of restoring them could not be taken up in this Budget.

Mr. Asaba Sei asked whether there was any intention of establishing an infirmary for maimed soldiers (Naihi-in) and also inquired about the procedure adopted with regard to the coastwise fisheries in Russian seas.

General Terauchi replied that a bill for establishing such an infirmary would be introduced and that rules were in preparation for the distribution of ample funds by way of pensions.

Mr. Chinda, replying to the second question, said that the steps for giving practical effect to the privileges conventionally obtained in the matter of coastwise fisheries were receiving most careful attention and a draft of proposals had already been made. But the Russo-Japanese diplomatic machinery had not yet been fully restored and Russia herself had not yet completely restored order within her dominions. It was impossible therefore to make any definite statement, nor would it be expedient to do so at this stage. As to another question whether it was likely that the necessary conferences and arrangements would be completed by the beginning of the fishing season in April, the Vice-Minister was equally unable to make any prediction.

The Committee rose at 2.20 p.m. Another general meeting will be held on the 29th, after which the sections of the Budget will be handed over to the sectional committees.

The Budget Committee held its last general meeting on the 29th instant at 11 a.m., and thereafter handed the various sections of the Budget to the sub-committees.

Mr. Ogino remarked that the import of iron amounted to 20 million yen annually and would doubtless increase after the war. Under these circumstances it was not desirable that, in order to prevent the exodus of specie, the Iron Foundry should be still further developed? Mr. Nakamura, Director of the Iron Foundry, said that the objects of establishing the Foundry had been to make Japan self-supplying in the matter of military and naval necessities and to put an end to imports of iron. The former object had now been attained. He had brought with him samples of the work done at the Foundry in the shape of plates for war vessels (battle-ships, and cruisers alike), and material for manufacturing shot and shell for both services. Concerning the prevention of imports and the consequent avoidance of an outflow of specie, that object was of prime importance from the point of view of national economy. The original programme of the Foundry had been based on a supposed import of 180,000 tons of iron yearly, and the idea had been that at the conclusion of its first period the Foundry would be in a position to supply one-half of that amount, and at the conclusion of its second period, the whole. The estimates now submitted to the House were intended to raise the productive capacity of the Foundry to 90,000 tons annually, but still further extensions would be required to bring its capacity to 180,000 tons. Meanwhile the import of iron had risen to 230,- 000 tons on the average for the past three years—and in order to meet that demand still further extensions would be needed, and the workmen must undergo additional training so that, on the whole, the desired purpose could not be finally attained for 5 or 6 years hence.

Mr. Ogino asked whether the Authorities contemplated extending the Foundry to the full capacity demanded by the country's needs and, if so, what would be the capital invested. Mr. Nakamura replied that according to his estimates it would be necessary to make two further extensions, in addition to those for which funds were now asked. The first extensions would cost about 15 million yen and the second about 10 millions. Thus, including the sum of 17 millions already spent or asked for in the Budget, the total outlay would be 42 millions. Even then the Foundry would not be in a position to completely satisfy the country's wants. Such special manufactures as sheet-iron, umbrella ribs and so forth would remain on the list of imports.

In reply to questions by Mr. Ono, the Vice-Minister of Finance said that the large appropriation made an account of interest and sinking fund of the national debt seemed in the Government's eyes necessary for maintaining the country's credit. As to the war taxes and the prospect of relieving them in part by substitutions, His Excellency explained that three resources were in immediate contemplation; namely tariff revision, reassessment of building lands and an increase of the tax on soy. The matter of tariff revision had great importance, and the projected measure would be submitted to the Diet in a few days.

On the afternoon of the same day the Special Committee on the Bill relating to the adjustment of the National Debts (Kaku-Sei-in) held a meeting. Mr. Oishi Masami asked several questions about the Adjustment Fund, the manner of its employment, the history of its genesis, and whether, as rumor alleged, a promise to form such a fund had been given at the time of raising the foreign loans.

The Minister of Finance quoted the figures already given by him as showing that the total outlays on account of the war would ultimately aggregate 1,800 million yen, and in view of that cardinal fact that Government had deemed it essential that full provision should be made to meet this large responsibility. Therefore the programme had been evolved of setting aside a sum of 110 millions yearly so as to meet not only interest, but also to provide for the re-payment of 20 millions annually of principal, thus clearing off the whole debt in about 30 years. Some publicists urged that instead of setting aside this amount for the re-payment of principal, it would be expedient to abandon such a heroic programme and thus reduce the total of the contemplated domestic loans. But the Committee had to remember that a debt of such magnitude demanded exceptional treatment. All holders of Japanese bonds, especially those in foreign countries—and these were in possession, of more than one half of the total—would look for some fixed and definite policy of re-payment, and unless such a policy were adopted, the market value of all Japanese securities would be injuriously affected. The Government were firmly convinced that any less comprehensive measure would be greatly opposed to the country's best interests, and were further persuaded that in the face of a debt of 1,800 millions, no lesser sum than 20 millions annually could be redeemed with any show of propriety or sufficiency.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE FUND FOR ADJUSTING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

This committee met on the 31st ultimo. The bill before it is that which provides for the annual appropriation of a sum of 110 million yen, to be applied to the payment of interest and principal in connexion with Japan's foreign debts.

In answer to questions by Mr. Oishi Masami, General Terauchi, Minister for War, explained that, according to the official estimates the total cost of restorations in the Army as a result of the two years' war would be 164 million yen. Against this total they had to set a sum of 98 millions originally set aside on the supposition that the war would continue. Consequently the sum actually required was estimated at 66 millions, and this the Government proposed to pay by installments spread over a period of six years, the installment for the first year amounting to 25 millions. The installment system was necessary because the arms required time for manufacture. With respect to the appropriation of 20 millions yen on account of the 4 Divisions which are to be posted in Manchuria and Korea and the preparations for the reception of the troops, there, his Excellency said that although the amount might be hereafter diminished, it would not be increased, he believed.

Admiral Saito, Minister of the Navy, said it was difficult yet to speak with assurance as to the cost of restorations in the Navy. But according to present estimates, the necessary restorations, including the completion of ships which had been already commenced, would occupy until the year 1913 or 1914, supposing that a sum of 25 millions annually were devoted to the purpose.

Having received this answer, Mr. Oishi Masami turned to the Minister of Finance and pointed out they were confronted with heavy continuing outlays on account of the Army and the Navy. What provision, if any, had been made for these outlays, and was it sound finance in the face of such facts to set aside a great amount yearly by way of sinking fund for the foreign debts?

The Minister of Finance was about to reply when Mr. Mochizuki interposed with a question whether any other large appropriations on account of the two services were to be apprehended in the near future.

General Terauchi replied that things were not yet in a condition to warrant any definite answer, but circumstances would probably require a further increase of the national armaments.

Mr. Sakatani wished the Committee to distinctly understand the Government's policy in this matter. The country had incurred a debt of 1,800 millions on account of the war and they must all recognise the onerous character of such an obligation from the point of view of the national resources. To deal with this debt and to provide for its redemption seemed to the Ministry the most important and pressing duty devolving on the nation. The matter had been discussed in the fullest manner and every effort had been made to secure economy but nevertheless they had been compelled to introduce a budget of expenditures totalling 1,030 millions. Many of the outlays were of an extraordinary nature such as need not be anticipated in next year's Budget, but they had to remember that whatever importance might be attached to post-bellum undertakings in China and Korea, it would be impossible for the Treasury to meet demands on those accounts unless the debts already contracted were fully secured, and unless the country's finances were on a sound basis. Therefore the Government considered that no duty was of so pressing a nature as this of providing for the amortization of the foreign debt.

Mr. Yokota asked whether it was to be understood that the Government had unavoidably succeeded to the financial heritage of the previous Cabinet or whether they approved of that policy. Further, he pointed out that experience showed the occurrences of great changes in a decade of history. Could a financial programme extending over a period of 30 years be regarded with any confidence? Finally, many foreigners held large investments in Japanese domestic securities. Would not this be a source of specie exodus?

The Minister of Finance said that the Government accepted full responsibility for any measures submitted by it to the Diet. As to the second question, it would certainly be very desirable to shorten the redemption period but they did not see their way immediately to accomplish that. Meanwhile Japan's creditors would rest assured if the sums lent by them were guaranteed by law even though a somewhat lengthy term of years was involved. Probably by conversions and purchases in the open market they could shorten the period. Concerning the third question, it was true that foreigners had purchased considerable quantities of Japan's fourth and fifth domestic-high interest loans, but as those were to be repaid immediately with money already borrowed in Europe, that matter was disposed of. Finally, if Japanese subjects borrowed funds abroad for the purpose of developing trade and industry, such undertaking meant a corresponding growth of the country's resources and would not entail any inconvenience in the matter of an outflow of specie. They had to remember, too, that the better the country's credit—in other words, the more resolute its measures for dealing with its obligations—the greater would be the disposition abroad to hold its bonds, and therefore the less would be the tendency to present them for redemption.

After some other vexatious questions from Mr. Oishi, the meeting proceeded to examine this section of the Budget item by item.

It is convenient to supplement the above by saying that in the sub-committee entrusted with the Army Section of the Budget, General Terauchi stated that the Army as now constituted would not suffice for Japan's future needs, but the discussion of that point was premature seeing that the troops had not even returned from their over-sea campaign. Asked about the two years' system instead of the three-years' which is now in operation, the Minister said that the chief advantage of such a change would be to pass a greater number of men through the ranks. There would be no difference in respect of outlay. Nevertheless from the former point of view, it seemed essential that the change should be applied in the case of the infantry.

In the sub-committee on the Finance Department section, it was explained that the Government's scheme for improving the breed of horses covered a space of 30 years, divided into two periods, the first of 18 years, the second of 12. During the first period efforts would be directed chiefly to laying the foundations of the system, by establishing a number (15) of stud farms throughout the country and seeking to improve the horses in the hands of the people. The total outlay was estimated at 29 million yen, but only 721,102 yen was asked for during next year.

The Tokyo newspapers are somewhat exercised about the suggestion advanced in some quarters, namely, that the Cabinet's redemption scheme is based on a pledge given to the country's foreign creditors. Mr. Sakatani has denied that any such pledge exists, but his denial did not receive sufficient prominence in the reports of the Budget Committee's proceedings, and thus the doubt has not been fully dispelled. The Asahi Shimbun, however, undertakes to declare that there is not the smallest foundation for such an idea.

The Shogyo Shimpo strongly supports the Government's programme in this matter.

The Asahi Shimbun alleges that if the Redemption Scheme be rejected by the House, the Minister of Finance will resign.

THE SUMITOMO HOUSE AND FOREIGNERS.

The fifth of the annual banquets given by the public-spirited head of the great House of Sumitomo to representatives of the Japanese and foreign communities of Kobe took place on Friday, Jan 26th. The occasion was attended by all the generous hospitality that characterized its predecessors. In addition to the host, Mr. Sumitomo Kichizaemon, Governor Hattori, Messrs. Bonar and Udden and Dr. Müller, respectively British and Swedish Consuls and German Vice-Consul, there was a large company of foreigners and Japanese. In welcoming his guests Mr. Sumitomo said they would rejoice that peace had been restored and that the new year opened with every bright and happy prospect. While the war continued, Japan had been obliged to regard Russia as her deadly enemy, but now all enmity had been put away and it would be their pleasure to cultivate the best neighbourly relations with that country. He had hoped that he might have the honour that evening of welcoming a Russian Consul and some Russian commercial representatives among his guests. Unfortunately, no Russian Consul or business firms had as yet returned to Kobe, but he hoped that they would be able to greet them here before long as messengers of peace (applause). As a result of the war, the status of Japan had been greatly advanced (cheers) and she had been admitted to the council of the Great Powers. What had been obtained by force of arms must now be maintained by peaceful means, and he thought that one of the best ways of securing that end was by promoting friendly intercourse between the Japanese and the foreign community. Among those who spoke in connexion with the toasts were Governor Hattori, Mr. Bonar, Mr. Minakami (Mayor of Kobe), Mr. A. Woolley (Chairman of the Foreign Chamber of Commerce), Mr. K. Kawakami, formerly General Manager of the Sumitomo Bank, Mr. E. H. Hunter, Mr. H. Lucas and Mr. A. H. Groom, the latter of whom called attention to the question of erecting in Kobe a great public hall as a memorial to Japan's successes in the war. He suggested that the proposed building should comprise a hall capable of seating a thousand persons, for public meetings, dances, entertainments, touring companies, etc., assembly rooms where commercial men from Kobe and Osaka would come together for the transaction of business and other purposes, thus providing the facilities of an exchange, and possibly rooms where foreign and Japanese food could be procured. He believed that a suitable building could be erected for yen 200,000 or yen 300,000, and he was confident it would supply a great want. If Mr. Sumitomo would lend his name to such a scheme he believed that there would be little difficulty in carrying it out. The Kobe Herald adds that Mr. Sumitomo expressed his entire approval of the idea and said that the matter would have his early attention.

SALVATION ARMY NEW RESCUE HOME OPENED IN TOKYO.

Among the varied activities of this organization, Rescue Work occupies a prominent place and throughout the world they have a larger number of institutions for the purpose of assisting the particular class this work is intended to help than all other Societies combined who are working with a similar object.

It was the inauguration by the Army of this work in Japan and the opening of a Rescue Home in Tokyo that resulted in the "Free Cessation" agitation of 1900. Since that time the Army have been doing an unostentatious but successful and helpful work in assisting those inmates of the licensed quarters who desired to abandon this form of life.

During this period the work has been carried on in a house in front of the Tsukiji Honganji Temple. A more suitable and commodious house has however now been secured in Azabu, Tokyo, and the opening exercises of this Home were conducted yesterday afternoon.

Commander Railton, who is now visiting Japan as an International Travelling Commander, and Colonel Bullard, the leader, of the Army in Japan conducted the proceedings. Mr. Soroku Ebara, M.P. and Mr. Tokio Yokoi, M.P., Chief of the Tokyo Nichi Nichi, both delivered interesting addresses and eulogised the work of the Army.

There was a large attendance, including Bishop Awdry and a number of foreign missionaries, Mr. Yajima, Mr. Fujisawa, Prison Governor, Miss Noguchi and others.

THE GRAND HOTEL LTD.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Hotel, Ltd., was called for four o'clock on Monday afternoon. There were present Dr. C. H. Hall (Chairman of the Board of Directors), Messrs. R. Howie and A. M. Knapp (shareholders), and E. W. Neils (Secretary).

At half-past four Dr. Hall announced that as the attendance was not sufficient to form a quorum for the transaction of business, the meeting would in accordance with the Articles of Association be adjourned until Monday next.

RIVALRY BETWEEN BREMEN AND HAMBURG.

(TRANSLATED FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL" FROM THE "FRANKFURTER ZEITUNG.")

In view of the differences which have sprung up between the two largest German steamship companies, the North German Lloyd of Bremen, and the Hamburg-American of Hamburg, it is not without interest to make a comparison between the two cities and these companies. The rivalry and jealousy between our two leading commercial centres dates back to ancient times. Owing to its magnificent hinterland, Hamburg, in its fight for supremacy, won the prize. With regard to the number of its population, the scope of its trade and the shipping business it is four times larger than Bremen. But notwithstanding this, Hamburg has not ceased to be jealous, and endeavours, in every possible way, to crush Bremen and damage her trade. We will mention here only Hamburg's opposition to the Midland Canal, because it would benefit Bremen far more than Hamburg. Further the support which the Hamburg-American line is giving to the seaport of Emden, because this is the only German port, west of Bremen, which is in a position to limit the sphere of interest of the old Hanseatic town. It is astonishing how this much smaller Bremen, with its miserable little Weser river, has succeeded, comparatively well, in retaining its position against Hamburg. It owes this chiefly to the Norddeutscher Lloyd. For what would Bremen be to-day without the Lloyd? Hamburg has taken the petroleum trade from her sister town; she is now successfully capturing Bremen's tobacco trade, while the coffee and sugar trade no longer count in Bremen. Many more articles might be enumerated in which Bremen formerly stood in the lead, but which in the course of several decades have been drawn to Hamburg. Only cotton, a certain kind of white rice, tobacco, &c., are still factors in the trade of Bremen. That Bremen will fall back more and more in the course of time, in spite of her giant efforts and the expenditure of money, is not alone owing to her unfavourable geographical position, over against Hamburg (even the Midland canal will not materially change this), but the need of new life-blood in the business firms and men whose vitality is well nigh gone. The number of firms on the Bremer Bourse has scarcely changed for years, and the few which had been established—and for which there was no demand—for the purpose of developing trade artificially, soon disappeared—to reappear, renewed, in Hamburg. The young business man of Bremen, who goes abroad, if not bound to his father's business, usually returns to Hamburg to establish himself there. Bremen suffers from too many old firms. The business goes from father to son, and it is very seldom that an outsider is admitted as partner to an important position in one of the larger houses. The consequence is that the older firms continue to plod along in their old traditions, which they revere above all else, and will have nothing to do with "new things," and the head of the house, who has grown up in wealth, regards it as his chief duty to keep his capital close together. He risks nothing, though the saying especially applies to the business man that he who does not risk does not win.

The greatest misfortune of an old firm is to have a senior chief who is rich and who, without risking anything, rests comfortably on his money-bags. Such a chief will soon paralyze the spirit of enterprise in his younger partners. When the old chief dies the vast capital usually goes to the son who is perhaps the youngest associate, and the old story is repeated. The importance of Bremen's commerce stands and falls with the Lloyd, and as its sister city has long ago recognized this she has for a long time endeavoured to reduce the field of the Lloyd's activity. In the first place it became the task of the Hamburg-American line to perform this work, and it has honestly endeavoured to place difficulties in the Lloyd's way wherever possible. The animosity between these two lines and its general directors is far greater than is generally supposed. In this the greatest blame rests with the Hamburg company. The Lloyd did not intrude into the sphere of the Hamburg—as is now asserted—just the opposite, wherever the Lloyd started a new line the Hamburg was quick to force itself in. Among the numerous instances in this respect we will here only mention the East-Asiatic line, and the one along the Chinese coast. In the general competition the Lloyd has often been defeated. It is said that the Lloyd is the finer company but the other pays better dividends to its stock-holders. Among the passengers, and no doubt among the shippers also, the Lloyd has the better reputation and affords better facilities, but Hamburg pays better dividends. The big Hamburg enterprise is evidently better managed than the Lloyd. In the directorate in Hamburg there are more well educated business men than in Bremen with the Lloyd. And in the absence of the general director in Hamburg there are always well-informed gentlemen present to give advice, which is not the case in Bremen.

FOOTBALL.

BORN IN JAPAN V. THE REST.

The return match of this now time-honoured and classical contest took place on Saturday last, and at length the Rest bore off the laurels by the narrow margin of a dropped goal.

It will be remembered that in the first game the "Born in Japan" got over the line just before time and snatched a victory and again on Saturday the game was close and exciting. The ground was very slippery and there were several instances of bad fielding but on the whole the play was good. Not more than half an hour after the advertised time for the kick off the game was started by Whites (the Rest) and the ball was returned by Moss. Owing to the ground the forwards had most of the game, but about a quarter of an hour after the start the ball was passed along to Mason, who scored a good try near the touch line. At the difficult angle the try was not converted, and the Rest renewed the game with increased vigour. Hayward, who was playing outside three-quarter instead of half, made a brilliant run and nearly scored, and in the ensuing "scrum" he obtained the ball and successfully scored. This was also unconverted, and the teams crossed over with the score at a try each. In the second half W. B. White, who had been playing full back, changed into the forward rank, taking the place of W. Ross, and it was noticed that the Rest were of decidedly larger stature than "Born in Japan." In the second half the Rest were mostly the aggressors, and after several attempts to increase their score, Dixon obtained possession and dropped a neat goal. With an adverse balance of four points, the native born team played with more energy, and once appeared to be within an ace of scoring, but the whistle sounded with the score at a dropped goal and a try (7 points) to a try (3 points) in favour of the Rest. It is unfortunate that a deciding game cannot be played but as the interport match takes place on the 10th, and the Association team also have to get in some practice before going to Kobe, it is feared that there will not be an opportunity of again playing. The following were the teams:—

"THE REST."—W. B. White, H. E. Hayward, J. S. Cartwright, J. T. Dixon, S. R. Clarke, G. K. Totton and B. C. Lambert, W. E. Detmold, R. C. Bowden, W. Ross, A. Hills, N. MacDougall, A. R. W. Landon, J. E. Drummond and D. Drummond.

"BORN IN JAPAN."—C. W. Atkinson, D. Weed, H. W. Kilby, W. B. Mason, L. Stornebrink, J. E. Moss, T. W. Kilby, W. J. White, W. S. Moss, O. Strome, E. J. Moss, A. W. S. Austen, A. W. Talbot, W. H. Worden, A. Kingdon.

A match between Interport Probables and Possibles was played at the Recreation Grounds on Tuesday.

The line up was as follows:—

"Probables." (Colours.)		Possibles. (Whites.)
Momban	Goal	Holmes
Kingdon	Backs	Cooper
W. B. Mason		D. Drummond
Worden		A. W. S. Austen
Ross		H. W. Kilby
E. B. N. Lambert	½ backs	Graham
B. C. Lambert		Bagnall
J. E. Moss		Stornebrink
O. Strome		V. Hearne
J. M. Mollison	Forwards	H. Y. Irwine
		Joe Drummond

The play was fairly good but a bit ragged at times and resulted in Probables scoring 4 to Possibles 2.

The Boys' Brigade football team played an eleven of Japanese from the Tokyo Higher Normal School yesterday afternoon. The play of both teams was not of a very high order, but the visitors' centre-forward, backs and goal stood out from amongst their colleagues, whilst for the local team Neville, Gray and Bagnall played well and he two Gormans showed up occasionally.

A heavy wind prevailed, and the visitors winning the toss elected to play with the wind and sun behind them. No score was made in the first half, and towards the end of the second A. Gorman and V. Worden rushed the ball through their opponents' goal, and notched the only point of the game, the Boys' Brigade being thus victorious by one goal to nil.

This is the third match played by the Boys' Brigade, the other two, both against the St. Joseph's Institute, resulting in one defeat and one drawn game.

The following was the local team: Goal:—N. Worden. Backs:—G. Neville and W. R. Bagnall. Half-backs:—E. Eagling, K. Tresize (Capt.) and J. Tresize. Forwards:—A. Gorman, C. Hornstein, R. Holmes, P. Gorman and W. Gray.

YOKOHAMA AMATEUR ROWING CLUB.

The thirty-fourth annual meeting of members of the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club, was held on Friday at the Masonic Rooms, No. 78. Among those present were Messrs F. H. Abbey, A. L. Mottu, O. D. Strome, J. Neill, A. Caro, J. Herlihy, G. Russell, C. L. Temm, L. Wilson, F. J. Hall, G. Russell, B. J. Jackson, O. Kendall, E. Eagling, N. Fearon, H. E. Hayward, etc.

Mr. H. C. LITCHFIELD (President) took the chair and read the report and accounts, which have already appeared in these columns. He said some would regard the decrease in the profits from the bar as a healthy sign. Probably it was so. The bar was started for the convenience and comfort of the members and it was not anticipated to be a source of great income to the club. Of course it must be made to pay expenses. But when they found a large decrease in the consumption of liquors that might be looked upon as a healthy sign and good for the interests of the club. It would be specially so if they found at the same time that more interest was taken by the active members of the club is the sports for which the club was founded and which they hoped members would always consider to be its chief and leading feature. He moved the passing of the report and accounts.

Mr. KENDALL seconded and the motion was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN said he had real pleasure in proposing, in accordance with the statement in the report, that the incoming committee be empowered to apply the sum of yen 1,000 in redeeming part of the debentures for which the club was now indebted. It was advisable to reduce the debentures and if they agreed with him the reduction would be a material one. The debentures had to be drawn by lot but his resolution only concerned the empowering of the committee to apply the sum mentioned.

Mr. HALL seconded and the proposal was adopted.

The officers were then elected as follows: President, H. C. Litchfield; Captain, F. J. Hall; Hon. Treasurer, F. H. Abbey; Hon. Secretary, O. T. Gillon. The following were electd the Committee: Messrs. F. Pollard, A. L. Mottu, O. D. Strome, and B. J. Jackson (all, both Officers and Committee, being re-elected.)

This was all the business and the Chairman having expressed a wish for the continued prosperity of that grand old institution, the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club, declared the meeting closed. A vote of thanks on the motion of Mr. Herlihy was accorded to the President, other Officers and Committee.

CHRIST CHURCH, YOKOHAMA.

The annual meeting of seatholders of Christ Church, Yokohama, was held at the Masonic Rooms at five o'clock on Friday afternoon. Mr. Jas. Walter presided, there being also present Messrs. S. E. Unite (hon. treasurer), E. J. Moss, R. M. Varnum, Montagu Beart, P. S. Bent, L. J. Healing, Dr. Tripler, Messrs. H. W. Kilby, E. W. Frazar and E. J. Moss, junr.

The minutes of the last annual meeting having been taken as read, the annual report and accounts were adopted on the motion of Mr. Bent, seconded by Mr. Frazar.

The CHAIRMAN, addressing the meeting, said the seatholders were to be congratulated upon a prosperous year in regard to Church matters. The year had closed with a credit balance of yen 713.62, which would go to meet the cost of the installation of the electric light, which was a great improvement on the former method of lighting, and which, thanks to Mr. Healing, one of the Trustees, had been done at the lowest possible cost. He particularly wished to call attention, as referred to in the Hon. Treasurer's report, to the time and attention given by the Rev. Mr. Field (the incumbent) to the designing of the screen work, which added much to the beauty of the church, all of which in the main body of the building was Mr. Field's personal gift. The screen-work over the choir was presented by Mrs. Winfield and another lady who had given anonymously; the screen in front of the organ was presented by three ladies—Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Sale, and Mrs. Walter. Through an oversight Mrs. Horne's name was not mentioned in the Hon. Treasurer's report. The Sunday School in connection with the Church had been well attended, but he would like to take the opportunity of calling the attention of members of the Church to the fact that certain funds were required for this work, the general funds of the Church not being drawn upon for this purpose. It would be gratifying, therefore, if contributions were sent during the year to the incumbent by those interested.

Referring to the Church offertories, the Chairman said it would be noticed that a considerable sum had been given through this channel for charitable purposes, which, being for specific objects, the Committee had only to distribute as requested.

On the question of Church sittings, the CHAIRMAN pointed out that a plan of the Church was in the hands of the Hon. Treasurer. This plan showed the seats that were now available, and could be consulted by all who desired sittings. If those sittings allotted were considered undesirable, applicants should place their names on the list kept by the Hon. Treasurer, and these applicants, according to priority, would be given other sittings as vacancies occurred. Members of the Congregation leaving were not entitled to transfer the sittings to their personal friends, the sittings reverting to the Committee. Some misunderstanding on this matter had given rise to considerable trouble in the past. The heartiest thanks of the Congregation were due to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Unite, for not only keeping the accounts, but for the thought and time he had given to the most difficult problem of apportioning the sittings.

The next business was the election of Church Committee.

Mr. FRAZAR proposed, and Dr. Tripler seconded, the re-election en bloc of the retiring members of the Committee, a proposition which was carried unanimously. The Committee therefore stands as follows:—Messrs. F. S. James, James Walter, E. J. Moss, L. J. Healing, P. S. Bent, C. V. Sale, Montague Beart, R. M. Varnum, and Stan E. Unite.

On the motion of Dr. Tripler, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded the Committee for the way they had conducted the affairs of the Church during the past year.

Mr. WALTER, in acknowledging the vote, said his colleagues and himself appreciated the kindness conveyed in the motion, and added that they were always ready to do their best for the interests of Church and the seatholders.

Mr. E. J. Moss proposed a vote of thanks to the Masonic fraternity for the use of the room for the annual meetings and also for meetings of the Church Committee.

The proposition, seconded by Mr. Varnum, was supported by the Chairman and unanimously adopted.

There being no other business before the meeting the proceedings terminated.

REPORT.

In presenting the Statement of Accounts for the Year ending 31st December, 1905, the fact may be recorded with satisfaction to everybody that the Church is out of debt. With regard to the Funds in hand, some Yen 713.62, this amount will stand to meet the bill for installing the Electric Light. It will be noticed that for the year ending 31st December, 1904, the total revenue of the Church amounted to Yen 10,238.30, while the total of receipts for the Year just closed only amounted to Yen 9,153.91, but it will also be remembered that during 1904 special efforts were made to reduce the debt of the Church, while during 1905, beyond a request for subscriptions to defray the cost of installing the electric light in the Church, and in consideration of the many expenses which the residents of Japan have had to meet in consequence of the late war, the Committee have refrained from making any special appeal to the members of the Church and Congregation for funds. The amount received for Pew Rents during 1905 shows an increase of Yen 350, against the receipts for Pew Rents in 1904. The accounts show another item of Yen 20.00, which amount was passed through the collections, for the decoration of the Chancel, at the Parson's discretion, which has been placed to the credit of a Chancel Fund account.

During the course of the year sums have been subscribed to the following Institutions and objects, through the Agency of Christ Church:—Dr. Barnardo's Homes for Waifs and Strays. Church Homes for Waifs and Strays. St. Andrew's Mission, Hinode-cho, Yokohama. Also for the Relief of Sufferers by the War. Relief of Sufferers by the Famine.

Since rendering the last report, some very handsome and useful gifts have been presented to the Church, and on behalf of the Members of the Church and Congregation the Committee have thanked the Donors for their liberality and kindness. Amongst these presentations may be included a very beautiful brass reading desk for the pulpit, presented by Capt. and Mrs. Bent; a Silver Flagon for use at the Holy Communion Service, presented by Mr. Edward Kilby, who has now left Yokohama and is resident in Amoy; and also the screen work, or mountings for the Electric Light, none of which was paid for from the Church Funds, but was presented in various sections by the Rev. Walter P. G. Field, Mrs. Winfield, Mrs. Sale, Mrs. Walter, and two other friends of the Church, and this opportunity is also taken to thank Mr. Field, who spent much time and attention in designing the screen work, and in attending to other details connected with the electric lighting of the Church.

Immediately following the accounts will be found a short statement with reference to the Sunday School Expenses, and from which it will be seen that the funds of the Church have in no way been drawn upon to meet the small expenses incurred with reference to the Sunday School. It will readily be admitted that it is not only good and proper but it is quite a necessity that there should be a Sunday School in connection with Christ Church, and to render this more efficient and effective it would be gratifying if the Sunday School were heartily supported not only by funds and subscriptions, but also by parents seeing that their children are more regular in their attendance on Sunday afternoons.

The Church Accounts have been audited by Mr. F. O. Stuart and the Committee tender their best thanks to him for his services.

Once again, it must be recorded that Mrs. Field has presided at the organ during the past year, and the Committee desire to express their appreciation of her kind services, and also to thank the members of the choir and those ladies who have occasionally assisted, as well as those who meet from time to time and assist in keeping the brass work, ornaments, and other parts of the Church clean and beautiful.

There are various matters of repairs which will need the prompt attention of the incoming Committee, and should finances permit there are a number of suggestions which have been brought forward with a view to further beautifying and increasing the usefulness of our Church, among which may be mentioned the further decoration of the Chancel, a Church Clock, a Peal of Bells, &c., &c.

The Honorary Treasurer in Account with Christ Church, Yokohama, for the year ending 31st December, 1905.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION
ARMY DEPARTMENT.

The following are extracts from a letter by Mr. Geo. Gleason, dated January 19, 1906.

"One of the Japanese Secretaries and I have called on all but one or two of the higher officers who have been through here. As a result we have had some most interesting talks with many of Japan's famous warriors; we have come to know them better and they to know us, and with the exception of General Kuroki, who passed through before our new Association was open, and Field-Marshal Oyama, who did not go out much, all the great Generals have been to our new Association at Dalny, and expressed in person to the secretary in charge their gratitude for our services to the Army. In other words all the great men, except Kuroki, have passed through the Association or met the Secretaries on their way home to Japan. The conversations with some generals, often turning to religious subjects, have been most interesting.

A short time before the New Year, largely as a result of the bringing the Christians together by the Association secretaries, a church was organized at Dalny on the Presbyterian basis. The membership numbers about forty-five and the sum pledged for the support is nearly $50 per month. The Sunday preaching service has forty or fifty attendants, and the Bible Class for Christians and enquirers often numbers nearly fifty. The nightly prayer-meetings during the Week of Prayer in January were splendidly attended. Three times I have been called upon to preach at this church.

HELPING RETURNING SOLDIERS IN MANCHURIA.—Our chief efforts are for the returning soldiers. During the fifty minutes they have for lunch at Mukden and Liaoyang, our men are playing the gramophone, giving a word of greeting, and with the assistance of other soldiers are every day giving out to each man as he sits at his meal a pretty souvenir postal card and the material for one letter. Also, at the trains, religious tracts and newspapers, and other reading matter is given out. Notices are also made that at Dalny and Liuchuton, the two ports of embarkation, there are special Associations to welcome them. Twenty-four hours later when the soldiers arrive at Dalny, or Liuchuton, near Dalny, they find two of the most interesting Associations in the world. I doubt if there ever was an Association that entertained as many men in as short a time as the Army branch at Dalny entertained in December. Some days we were so over-run by visits from the 10,000 or 15,000 men who were waiting for their steamers at Dalny that we hardly knew what to do. At least 130,000 and possibly 150,000 entered that one building during the month. Many of course came in twice or more. It is safe to say that of the 600,000 soldiers in Manchuria when the movement of troops began, nearly all will have received some benefit from the Association before they reach home. The result of the distribution of the 100,000 special souvenir pamphlets, or of the 60,000 postals, or the 90,000 Scripture portions, who can tell?

At Yingkow we had planned to close the work, but as the committee of citizens, who had helped the work since its opening in December, 1904, agreed to bear all the expenses of the branch until its close, probably early in March, it was decided to continue. This action on the part of the Committee, which up to this time has raised more than $1,800 for us, showed that the work has stood the test of time.

Port Arthur continues without much change, except that it looks as if before long a church organisation might be effected to work along with the Army Branch. About twenty Christians came to the Association, and two weeks ago five men, Navy and Army men and citizens, were baptized.

THE LATE KING OF DENMARK.

By the death of King Christian IX. of Denmark the oldest reigning sovereign is removed from the world's stage. Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary has worn his crown longer but he is a much younger man than the Royal Dane whose offspring sit on some of the chief thrones of Europe. The greatly loved Queen of the British dominions, the but lately elected King of Norway, the King of Greece, the mother of the present Tsar, these are all direct descendants of the Danish House. We take the following sketch of His Majesty's life from Men and Women of the Time:

CHRISTIAN IX., KING OF DENMARK, fourth son of the late Duke William of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg Glücksburg, was born April 8, 1818. Before his accession to the crown he was Inspector-General and Commander-in-Chief of the Danish Cavalry. The succession was vested in him by the protocol of London, May 8, 1852, and he ascended the throne on the death of Frederic VII., Nov. 15, 1863. On his accession the position of affairs with respect to Schleswig-Holstein was completely changed. The son of the Duke of Augustenborg immediately laid claim to the sovereignty of the duchies, although his father had for a compensation resigned all his rights in 1852. The independence of Holstein more especially, and a portion of Schleswig, was warmly espoused by the German Diet, which forthwith ordered the advance of a Federal army to occupy the debatable territory, for the purpose of enforcing its enfranchisement from Danish rule. Before matters had proceeded far, Austria and Prussia determined to interfere, and by a combined armed occupation of the disputed territory to bring the question to an issue independently of the Diet, and in opposition to the wishes of that body. They accordingly invaded the duchies, which, after a hotly contested campaign, they succeeded in wresting from Denmark, also taking temporary possession of Jutland. Christian IX., disappointed in not obtaining assistance from some European power, after the failure of the conference convened in London in 1864—which failure was in some measure attributable to the Danish Government—entered into negotiations for peace with Prussia and Austria, and a treaty was signed at Vienna, Oct. 30, 1864. The King of Denmark renounced all his rights to Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg, and in 1866 the two German powers quarrelled over the spoil. Since then his Majesty has sought to develop the interior resources and popular institutions of his country. A new constitution was inaugurated in November 1866, when the King opened the first Rigsdag, the members of which were elected in accordance with the new electoral law. The army and navy have also been thoroughly reorganised, agriculture and commerce have received a great stimulus, and several railways have been constructed. Christian IX. and the late Queen Louise visited the Princess of Wales at Marlborough House, London, in March 1867. The marriage of the Crown Prince of Denmark with the Princess Louisa, daughter of the King of Sweden, at Stockholm, on July 28, 1869, was hailed as a pledge of union between the two countries. His Majesty granted a new constitution to Iceland, which came into operation in August, 1874, that being the thousandth year of Iceland's existence as a nation. He went to Reikiavik on the occasion of the anniversary being celebrated, and on his return paid a flying visit to Leith and Edinburgh, Aug. 18, 1874. He visited the Emperor William II. of Germany at Berlin in August 1888, and in the autumn of 1879 was visited by the Emperor of Russia and his family. In 1842 King Christian married the Princess Louise, daughter of the Landgrave William of Hesse-Cassel, by whom he has had six children, and among them the Crown Prince Frederick, the King of Greece, Her Majesty Queen Alexandra of Great Britain, and the Princess Dagmar, married to the late Tsar Alexander III. of Russia. On July 22, 1896, the second son of the Crown Prince of Denmark, Prince Charles, married Princess Maud of Wales, and this year he became King of Norway. On May 26, 1892, the King and Queen of Denmark celebrated their golden wedding amid many demonstrations of loyalty and popular rejoicing. They were present at the marriage of the Duke of York and Princess May of Teck in July 1893. The Queen of Denmark died, greatly lamented, in the autumn of 1898.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Posthumous honours have been conferred by the Emperor through Viscount Ogi, President of the Board of Decorations, on I. Kawase, soldier, an elder brother of Yamaguchi, employed in the office of the Japan Mail. The dead man has received the Seventh Class of the Golden Kite and the Eighth Class of the White Paulownia, which carries a pension of a hundred yen. Kawase was killed on August 20th, 1904, in the neighbourhood of Swishiyung, Port Arthur, on the occasion of the first general attack upon the fortress.

The anniversary of the birth of His Majesty the German Emperor was celebrated in Yokohama on Saturday. The various German business houses were decorated with flags, and the German residents were received by Mr. von Syburg at the German Consulate-General. Owing to the absence of an German man-of-war no salute was fired at noon.

Manila papers report that the British squadron, which arrived at Manila on Thursday forenoon, Jan. 11th, was largely entertained by the American squadron. The Hogue, Diatem and Sutlej arrived at Subig Bay on Wednesday evening and entered Manila Bay on the following day. In the evening of their arrival the British officers were given a banquet on the American flagship Ohio, and a ball followed, over a thousand guests being present at a most brilliant affair. On Friday the petty officers of the British ships were banquetted on shore by those of the American vessels. On Saturday a general review of the troops at Fort MacKinley was held in honour of Admiral Sir Gerard Noel.

The Ladies Auxiliary of Union Church, Yokohama, held a most successful and enjoyable social gathering at Van Schaick Hall on the Bluff on Friday evening, the 26th inst. The Hall was very prettily decorated with greenery and bunting and a large number of guests assembled and had a pleasant time. During the evening a song was charmingly sung by Miss E. Bunting, a recitation given by Mr. F. S. Booth, and Miss H. Page rendered two selections on the violin in her usual artistic and finished style. Two other items of a musical character had been arranged for but owing to the prevalence of colds and coughs, now so general, had to be dispensed with. High tea was served in the side room after the musical programme had been concluded and after an hour or so more of social intercourse the pleasant meeting broke up.

Simultaneously with the death of Mr. William Sharp, one of the most successful literary mystifications of our time has been cleared up. We have now the authorised statement that Mr. Sharp was the writer of the novels that appeared under the name of "Fiona Macleod." This was long ago suspected, but never brought home. A sort of crisis arose six years ago, when a letter purporting to be from "Fiona Macleod" to her publishers, Messrs. Constable, was communicated to the public. "I give you authority to say that 'Fiona Macleod' is not any of those with whom she has been identified. . . . and that all she asks is the courtesy of good breeding and common-sense—a courtesy which is the right of all, and surely imperatively of a woman acting by and for herself." This stilled the paragraphists, but a number of people remained convinced of the theory which has now been proved correct. There were some amusing mistakes and false scents. Mr. W. B. Yeats was among the writers who were saddled with Fiona Macleod's work. By other critics Fiona Macleod was split up into "a syndicate of young Celtic writers." One enthusiast is said to have taken a census of the inhabitants of Iona in order to discover her originals, and a literary Sherlock Holmes watched a house in Edinburgh where Fiona Macleod was believed to be staying. It is all a little bewildering. One thing is certain: Mr. Sharp did his best work under this pseudonym, and under this assumption of the opposite sex. Yet under them he protested against that "pseudo-nationalism" with which Celticism is so mixed up, holding that the Celtic spirit could be usefully revived only as an influence in the general literature of these islands "There is for us all only English literature; all else is only provincial or dialectic."

AMERICAN TOPICS.

The death is announced of President W. R. Harper of the University of Chicago.

The engagement of Miss Lurline Spreckels, daughter of Mr. John D. Spreckels, of the Oceanic Steamship Co., of San Francisco, and Mr. Spencer G. Eddy, Secretary to the American embassy at St. Petersburg, has been announced.

A Manila cable to the Japan Advertiser says that Colonel W. D. Mann, the editor of the notorious Town Topics, has failed in his action against the proprietors of Collier's Weekly. The trial is said to have proved that Colonel Mann's publications were really blackmailing schemes.

Charles Sweeney, the Spokane capitalist, has presented Bishop O'Dea with a check for $20,000 to be used in the construction of the Catholic cathedral now being built in Seattle. Sweeney has contributed nearly $500,000 to Catholic churches and institutions in Spokane.

Interviewed in New York on January 2nd Mr. Channcey M. Depew said:—"My 72d birthday comes on April 23. Before that time I hope to have resigned from all the 79 companies in which I am a director. As soon as I am out of the numerous companies with which I am connected I shall be able to do my real work in the senate."

The great hospital provided for in the will of the late Charles T. Yerkes, will be built at once. It will be located in the Borough of the Bronx. This announcement was made by Dr. J. E. Janvrin, speaking for Mrs. Yerkes. Dr. Janvrin said a beginning would be made just as soon as the estate of Mr. Yerkes is settled, instead of waiting until after Mrs. Yerkes' death, as provided in the will. He said that the projected hospital was entirely Mrs. Yerkes' idea, and that Yerkes, in making provision for the hospital in his will, was only carrying out Mrs. Yerkes' idea and desire.

Chancellor S. B. McCormick of the Western University of Pennsylvania believes that eventually the women will outdistance the men in all walks of life. "It is my prediction," he says, "that in fifty years from now the women of this country will outclass the men, both in business and in the public affairs of the country." I base my assertion on the fact that at present in the high schools throughout the United States the girls outnumber the boys four to one. A number of universities have placed a limit on the number of young women they will receive."

The year 1905 has been a fortunate one for fire insurance companies doing business in the United States. There have been no serious conflagrations, as in previous years, and as a result a large crop of new companies have been organized throughout the country. The following figures have been compiled from reports of the New York Commercial's correspondents throughout the United States, from Feb. 1st to Dec. 28th: There have been 20,534 fires, with a total loss of $172,709,300. New York city has burned to the extent of $7,576,000; Brooklyn lost $2,943,300; Buffalo, $860,500; Chicago, $4,940,100; Jersey City, $721,000; Boston, $5,776,000; Baltimore, $802,900, and Birmingham, Ala., $943,000.

According to the Tacoma Ledger, the mines on the American side of the line in the Klondike are for the first time producing much larger quantities of gold than are being found in British territory. The yield for 1905 at Nome and in the surrounding district is estimated at approximately $10,000,000, and the Tanana valley has cleaned up $7,000,000. In 1904 gold production for all Alaska was $9,050,000 or nearly $1,000,000 less than this year's clean-up at Nome alone, where the principal increase took place during the last summer. It is safe to assume that the entire Alaskan gold output will not be far short of $20,000,000. On the other hand, the Klondike output for 1904, which was $10,829,000 will not be much exceeded by its total for 1905.

SHIPPING DISASTER.

The steamer Jingi Maru (1,269 gross tons) carrying 1,600 koku of rice and 1,080 tons of coal went ashore at 4 p.m. on Jan. 25th in the neighbourhood of the district of Muekata, Chikuzen province, on her way from Mitsukado, Hiogo province, to Yokohama. She sank in a few minutes. The Captain and fourteen of the crew, which consisted of forty in all, are missing. The ship belonged to Mr. K. Shige, a forwarding agent of Kobe. The hull was insured with the Nippon Marine Insurance Co. for ninety thousand yen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"TOKYO PUCK."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Your remarks on Puck are just and may do some good. While I was chuckling over them I was struck between wind and water by seeing something from my own pen in the Evangelist somewhat twisted.

Being a Methodist I tried to write "swing" but it came out in type "sewing."

This mistake was without doubt due to my haste in writing and not from any fault of either the intelligent compositor or of the more intelligent proof-reader. The worthy Editor was, of course, blameless. Perhaps there was, after all, a more sure word of prophecy in the very mistake. Our mission to the Chinese students in the Metropolis will commence to succeed when the women take it seriously to heart, and if they bring their sewing along, so much the better.

The Dorcas society is the very salvation of many a congregation: would that we had one in our mission. In fact it is a general principle of Christian Missions that when three women and a priest stand by the cross we may look for the conversion of sinners. It is one of the crying needs of Oriental Missions that there are not enough women. Hoping that this may meet the eye of some who will volunteer to help in our daily classes I am as ever

Yours,

H. S. JEFFERY.

NEW ZEALAND AND THE FAMINE-STRICKEN IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I have just received a letter from New Zealand expressing great sympathy for Japan and especially for the famine-stricken ones, and my correspondent says, "When the news was first received, subscription lists were started and were rapidly filling up, every one wishing to do what they could to show how all sympathized with the Japanese people and that as allies and friends they were willing to help all they could. Telegrams were received that help was not needed and that the famine was not severe; the lists were accordingly closed and the amounts collected returned."

Surely a sad mistake was made by someone in authority in face of the urgent appeal made to-day, which is so strongly supported by the evidence of both foreigners and natives who have lately visited the famine-stricken districts. I hear a London subscription list was closed in a similar manner. Perhaps something more might be done by the Local Press to confirm the pressing need for aid? I am told the idea in sending out the official denial was, if the Japanese appealed for charity it might damage their prospects in floating the loan that was then being placed on the market. Surely the two are distinct matters?

Yours, etc.,

E. J. MOSS.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

MONSIEUR LE RÉDACTEUR,—C'est peut-être punir trop sévèrement M. Oyama que de publier sa prose. En fait il veut défendre M. le baron Suyematsu, ce qui est un sentiment louable. J'ajouterai que personnellement j'admire le courage du baron Suyematsu dans toute cette campagne. Toujours sur la brèche, il n'a pas voulu laisser passer sans réponse une seule attaque dans la presse européenne contre son pays; ce qui est d'un grand patriote. Malheureusement quand il s'est agi des déplorables incendies qu'il ne pouvait prévoir, contre la presse hostile il n'avait aucune arme. Les télégrammes étaient là, laconiques, forcément incomplets. Patriote, il a voulu répondre quand même, donner une explication plausible. C'est cette explication que j'ai attaquée. Je suis persuadé que baron Suyematsu déplore plus que personne ces stupides excès; et je ne veux pas faire à M. Oyama l'injure de croire qu'il les approuve, car du coup il défendrait trop mal la cause du baron et serait certainement désavoué par lui.

F. H.

Si Monsieur Oyama veut continuer par lettre la discussion, je vous autorise Monsieur le Rédacteur à lui donner mon adresse.

POST BELLUM MEASURES AND THE CLAIMS OF LITERATURE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." Everybody knows this saying, but it is not everybody who respects the truth which it teaches. Play, recess, recreation, or in other words, pleasure in some form or other is quite essential to our well-being, whether a child or an adult. No pleasure means no life. But even in death we seek nothing but pleasure. A martyr expiring on a burning pile or a bankrupt hanging himself in his cellar, both seek pleasure or happiness in their own way. It is not, however, at all to be wondered at if we know that man's ultimate aim is to have pleasure and avoid pain, and every desire and every act of his is prompted by this fundamental law of his inmost heart.

If man must have pleasure in order to live it is the duty of every good government that reflects the wishes of the governed to accede to this necessity, and adopt the best means of pleasing the people. If nothing can be gained without loss, it is the duty of every statesman and politician no less than that of patriots and philanthropists, to find the best means of producing the greatest pleasure or happiness at the least possible cost. But this is a subtle question to handle or rather a difficult problem to solve, because there are more alchemists in the world than we generally suppose, who spend their precious lives in vain attempts to get riches by luck and happiness by chance; in other words, they wish to secure the greatest pleasure at little or no cost. But I dare say, if there is a philosopher's stone that really works for our good, the name of that stone is literature!

It was with literature that Addison found a palace in the attic of a rickety, old house, while its magic powers in his master hand remodelled English society, and made it attain to its highest perfection. His "good old knight" accompanied with other excellent characters travelling throughout Europe performed miracles in every circle. Sir Walter Scott, once reduced to his flannels, paid off his big debts and retrieved his fortune, while his "Lady of the Lake" threw her charms over the sterile hills and plains of Scotland causing the price of the land to rise enormously. Mark Twain, as you know, became deeply involved in debt, owing to the bankruptcy of his publisher. His friends and admirers proposed to furnish him with money to pay off his debts, but he politely declined all their offers, because he knew he had another friend, literature, and that was quite enough for him. His debts have been paid, and now the world stands indebted to him more than ever. "Man drinks another's health and ruins his own." Pleasures of the senses, such as drinking or feasting, are quite expensive, and if indulged in they cannot but ruin us, but the pleasures of intellect such as singing with the muse and drinking of the Pierian spring cost almost nothing and seldom injure us under any circumstances. The pleasures of intellect increase in degree as they continue. The former may turn a gentleman into a brute, while the latter make a gentleman of a brute. Murder, robbery, and suicide, not to say theft and perjury, are the result of sensual pleasures and human vanities, while refinement, patriotism, and other virtues which make man noble, great, and good, are mostly the fruits of intellectual pleasures, the soul of which is found in literature. Though redeemed by the accounts of patriotism, humanity and other virtues, our daily papers are full of bad news, the outcomes of sensual pleasures or vanities, that turn the blood into water. Is it high time for us to encourage the study of belles-lettres? "Like can be cured by like": higher pleasures are the only specific for curing the abnormal desires for lower pleasures. Besides man's higher nature can not be satisfied with only sensual pleasures. Rasselas in the Happy Valley was a most unhappy man. Seen in this light, Adam and Eve are to be sympathized with when they took "the fruit of that forbidden tree." Their garden of Eden no doubt furnished them with all the pleasures of the senses, but in their giddy haste to become wise, i.e. to get intellectual pleasures, they fell to sin. Would that they could have listened to the music of the spheres and read poems in towering pines and murmuring streams! "The spirit is truly ready, but the flesh is weak." Unless his higher nature is continually strengthened and nurtured by all means his lower nature becomes the master, and even his craving after intellectual pleasures and his aspirations for things wise, if left unguided, may end in his own destruction.

Since pleasure man must have to live, why should we not cultivate the right taste for literature, which can give us the greatest and best kind of pleasure at the least possible cost or sacrifice? Have we literature enough that we need no more encouragement? Is the current literature of the very best kind that it needs neither restraint nor correction? Let us see. When Admiral Noel and his men visited Tokio I was in the city. When Admiral Togo made his triumphal entry I was still there; the whole metropolis of twelve miles wide was one blaze of bunting, flowers, arches, electric lights, with rockets shooting up into the sky and exploding, bands playing, and people cheering, while the "flower cars" ran through the streets inspiring bliss and enlivening the whole scene to a heavenly splendour. Everywhere toasts were proposed, and healths drunk with joy. Joy smiled at every door. Smiles sat on every lip. Every lip reverberated with the joyous sound of that weird shout of banzai. But there was not a single poem of note or even one decent essay among the people to welcome them! True that the journals said all their say in editorials, but what of that? They are not literary productions in the sense that we understand. In short, the city expressed sensual joy in great abundance for these distinguished personages, but little, if any, intellectual joy. Is not Tokio the capital of the Japanese empire, old in its history and new in its strength? Is it not the intellectual centre of this old land of belles-lettres and chivalry, and of a new Britain of the East? Yet all the joy that it can manifest must consist of mere bunting and banzai! Fortunately, we have got a Nelson, but where shall we look for a Scott, a Campbell, or a Byron? With what nymphs or Pierides do our Coleridges or Wordsworths sing? The "Eight Scenes of Omi" charming as they are, can boast of no poetic muse, while the ripples of Biwa sigh all in vain for the Lake Poets. The golden age of England that saw the Spanish Armada annihilated was graced by Jonson and Shakspeare. Should the "enlightened reign" of our Mikado, which sees the Russian Armada annihilated, be suffered to pass, graced by no muse, and buried unsung?

I have often heard lately such phrases as post bellum economies, or post bellum measures; but not one man out of the fifty millions raised, as yet, even a feeble voice for the advancement of post bellum literature. If there is any person who spoke of literature, he spoke of it on the negative side. I refer to the Romaji-kai and other advocates of the gembun-itchi system, a dream never thoroughly realized in the annals of man. This word is bookish; that phrase is poetic; the third, archaic; and the fourth, colloquial; while the fifth gives all the varieties of cant, slang, provincialism, etc.—these show that even the world language, English, is not thoroughly gembun-itchi. Impossible as their attempt is, if their aim lies in the improvement of the literature or language, I shall simply hold my tongue. But when I learn their sole object is to economise time, and that even at the cost of grace, strength, and perspicuity, I cannot help disagreeing with them and say that they are mistaken. Be that as it may, post bellum measures should have so wide a signification as to include the encouragement of literature, philosophy and history. They ought, at least, to establish a literary college or department in the Kioto University. Now, let me ask the Japanese public, are the two universities more than enough for a nation aspiring to be a first rank power, and consisting of fifty million souls with an annual addition of half a million that one of the only two respected institutions must be left incomplete? Your answer is no. I dare say, your answer is no.

But why this indifference? Ought we to grumble about a little sum of money when a great good could be done with it? Let us never forget that Cæsar, despite his riches, was conquered by Cyrus, and all the wealth and resources of Carthage were naught before the growing power of Rome. Even the mighty Hannibal could not save her from destruction. The proper study of mankind is man, and we ought to know ourselves before we try to know anything else. The department of literature is the only branch in our university that can adequately fulfill this august mission. Literature, history, and philosophy! They are the sacred trinity of wisdom in which yamato-damashi lives, moves, and has its being, and without which it ceases to exist. But why this coolness? Surely they afford us pleasures which are at once delightful and salutary to our well-being. While other pleasures often lead us to shame and dishonor, they always edify us, making our lives sublime and dignified. They are no doubt the "Milk of Paradise" or the nectar which Jupiter sips: the more we taste them, the sweeter they prove. A thing of the greatest value has, as a rule, no value, and literature or philosophy generally entertains us gratis. Yet Count Okuma says, literature is of little value, as Greece with all its literature (and philosophy) could not save herself from her fall. But the Count forgets that she at last regained her independence. Surely they, the sacred trinity, helped us not a little, in the late war to beat a most formidable power of Europe in every battle. Surely they are of some value. Surely they have power to make every one happier and better. Surely we don't have enough of them, have we?

There can be no excuse on the part of the Mombusho, if in its fervour of encouraging the art of earning money, it ever forgets its higher callings. But we know it never forgets its duty, and the only reason why some things are left undone is simply want of money. If the coming Diet hesitates to furnish the Department of Education with an adequate sum (which is but a trifle comparatively, though liquid in nature) to complete the Kioto University, does it act wisely even from the economical point of view? To begin with, we must not suppose we have less money than we need. On the contrary I am afraid we may have more money than we can use to good advantage. In other words, Japan's credit stands high in the foreign markets and capital is apt to flow into the country but too rapidly, when any business or enterprise that pays is found. A college of literature at Kioto does, in the end, pay well. It could not do much directly, how great must be its indirect benefits. A King's taste for a small waist caused the court ladies of Sô to starve themselves in vain emulation. A slight accident to a princess, now the Queen of England, made the "Alexandra limp" a favourite gesture among fashionable ladies of Great Britain. Such is the power of influence. Now, Kioto being a very quiet, elegant town is especially fitted for high abstract studies as philosophy and literature. If wisely managed, the influence of a new college over the whole empire in checking bad taste, bad logic, and consequently both bad manners and bad morality, as well as in encouraging pure, sweet thoughts, exalted ideas, sound reasoning, self-respect and broad viewed patriotism, must be, to say the least, something great. If the similar college in the Tokio Imperial University were not a success and fall below the ideal, that of Kioto should surely succeed and surpass all expectations. In a little while, the money now spent on liquor and debauchery will be used in buying books and the surplus will go to multiply investments in the post office and other banks. See Scotland, there each yeoman and shop-keeper has a little library of his own, and saving something day by day for his coming years enjoys his life temperately, morally, happily, and wisely. Thus each new generation being free from the burden of feeding and clothing the elder generation, can exert all its powers for the advancement of individuals and the community at large. Thus they succeed in making their sterile plains blossom like Eden, and here every Jack finds his fill of an exalted type, such as would make our first parents blush and envy. Such is the influence of that elixir vite, literature, or literature and philosophy combined. Should we not take a lesson from these Scots to value literature and by means of it to improve ourselves? Now to return from the digression: within a few years, the surplus remaining from the decrease of the expenditure on gaols, police institutions, and law courts would more than cover the expense of not only one department but of the whole university. English literature, which would form but a small part of the department, if properly taught may in a comparatively short time be the means of making a little fortune, which would more than cover all the expenses of the department. England owes her greatness to the pens of Addison and Shakspeare as much as to the swords of Nelson and Wellington. Now, the best means of introducing Japan to the peoples of the world in detail must be found through the instrumentality of the knowledge of English literature among ourselves. At least, such is the easiest way. And he who undertakes the trouble will be rewarded abundantly. Mark, if you please, what I say, O my countrymen! nowadays, one good English scholar could easily make enough money to help to found a third imperial university.

They say commerce is the herald of peace, as it unites nations in mutual interest and profit. But as the principle of gain here reigns supreme and predominant if there exist prospects of more profit in going to war, none would hesitate to begin bloodshed and butchery. But literature and philosophy are the flowers of peace, and peace is the fruit of literature and philosophy. Here reigns neither greediness for wealth nor ambition for power. Fulfilling a need higher than these, they each teach erring men how foolish it is to cut each other's throats for gain either in the form of riches or of power. Nobody knows but what the present differences between the Mombusho and the University may have their origin in the overflow of legal and political ideas, and in the paucity of poetical and philosophical thoughts. Nobody can doubt that the late war had its origin in the Slavonic dearth of sublime and exalted ideas—the ideas which can come only from poetry and philosophy, both religious and secular. In fine, it is the taste for belles-lettres, and not the thirst after gain; it is the love of philosophy together with the reflections on past events, and not the lust of filthy lucre or of inordinate desires that can ensure the peace of a nation in this world. But you say a treaty of peace, whatever may have been its cause or its true motive, can preserve peace. True that it may do so temporarily, but only temporarily, and it is often followed with disastrous reactions. Who builds his peace upon treaties, builds his house on sand. When rainy days come he is turned out into the damp, cold atmosphere, helpless and wretched. It is quite right that Japan should have the strongest army and navy in the East and that she should have wealth enough to support them. Still the so-called post bellum measures should not consist of mere attempts at increasing the country's resources and fighting capacities. To proclaim peace abroad and simultaneously prepare a mighty armament at home and that at the expense of education, was what the great Tsar did—and with no good effects. If we are the lovers of peace, why, we ought to prove it by the arts of peace and refinement rather than by the number of regiments or the tons of fighting vessels. We are not hypocrites, and we ought to show to the world at large that we are not hypocrites. And as one of the first steps toward it, the Kioto Imperial University should be completed.

But if the Diet and the Mombusho believe that they cannot get round to it yet, then a college of literature had better be started, at once, by contributions of private individuals. Mitsui and Iwasaki gave a welcome dinner to the triumphant sailors. It is meet that they should as they have good reasons to thank them. But the same open hands should be applied to investments which are more durable in nature and more efficacious in deciding the future destiny of the Japanese empire. And who knows the foreign grandees well interested in our developments may not make some handsome donations?

Let every Jack, I dare say, have his play, as well as his work, for without pleasure the world comes to an end; but ought we not to try to furnish him with the best kind of play?

HOTEL-KEEPING IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Occidental travellers to this part of the world have ever and anon made remarks on the deficiencies of our hotel accommodation.

The other day I met two young ladies fresh from America who put up at a certain hotel in Tokyo which is wholly under Japanese management. When I first saw them in a room sitting on a pile of cushions, I could not but feel sympathy for them, thinking how hard it must have been for them to sit in this unwonted fashion. One of these keen, observing ladies referred to several points in which the hotel was lacking. One of the remarks she made is very interesting.

"For some reason or other," said she, "I got up this morning with a racking headache. I didn't feel a bit like sight-seeing, so my companion left me to sleep it off while she took a preliminary look around the town. After she had gone out I concluded that one thing I needed to make me better was a good hot bath, so I called a servant boy and asked him if he couldn't bring me a tub of some kind and two or three pailfuls of warm water. This of course he could, and did; he also brought some extra towels. He was very polite and solicitous to know if he could bring anything more. I thanked him and dismissed him, telling him that I needed nothing else.

"Well, I fixed my bath, and had just stepped into it when the door opened, and the boy walked in and marched right up to me, and held out his hand with a cake of soap.

"I sharply ordered him out of the room. I fear the tone of voice in that case was anything but soft and ladylike. But he was not abashed a bit. Then the boy took his leave, bowing politely.

"I caught him later in the day and admonished him by all the gods and devils in his heathen world never again to step into my room without first knocking at the door for permission.

"But it didn't do any good. The next afternoon we were more or less in deshabille when the same fellow marched in and handed me a letter. I gave a scream and said, "Did I not tell you never again to come into this room without first knocking at the door?"

"It's all right," answered the servant. "You must pardon poor boy; I looked first before coming in to see if you were dressed. It's all right."

This remark goes to show that while our country has in recent years made remarkable advances in many of the arts and sciences of the West, hotel keeping is by no means one of those things in which we have fully become adept.

Until very recent years our people regarded it as a rather disreputable calling, but our views are changing, and several young men are now giving serious study to hotel management in Europe and America with a view to adapting their knowledge and experiences to the practical use at home. From the days of the feudal system down to about forty years ago our people esteemed military power above all things. (I think this thought is still prevalent even in the present days). The highest class of people was naturally the Samurai, then the farmers, and lastly the merchant class. Among merchants, hotel managers, or more properly, inn-keepers, were at the very bottom of the social ladder, because they were, for the most part, shiftless, lazy fellows, who having either failed in business or ruined themselves by an extravagant life, turned to that occupation as the last resort. In fact no respectable people ever gave any serious attention to the hotel business. It was thought a despised calling any way, and there is ample reason for this.

In those days, travel was very limited in our country as compared with what it is to-day. Certainly travelling was one of the hardships at that time, so much so that if the children wanted to leave home, they were rather encouraged to go out and endure the difficulties of travel, and learn thereby. Perhaps all of you remember our popular proverb Kawau ni tabi (travel) wo saseyo. Of course this proverb would not go to-day so far as all the means of communication are perfected. At any rate, there was no thought of effort to improve hotel conditions, nor to make travel easy and comfortable.

Our hotels to-day, have of late made marked improvements in various respects, yet there remains still ample room for further improvement, food and rooms, for instance, being the main points. In our inns, one room is used for all purposes; a sitting room, a dining room in the day time, a bed chamber at night, or whatever a guest chooses.

About food there are also difficulties. (I mean not less inconveniences). For example, we Japanese are very fond of sashimi—sliced fish, which is taken with shoyu or sauce. Of course, it tastes to us very delicious, and we hope themistress of our boarding house will supply us with it at every meal. But foreigners call us barbarians because we eat raw fish. They, on the contrary, relish frog's legs and think them a delicacy. We can hardly account for that. Perhaps, all of us say, "Ugh! frog's legs, nasty, not fit to eat." Well, that is the comparison; it is just as hard for us to eat frog's legs as for foreigners to taste of our sashimi. So we must entertain foreigners with frog's leg's instead of sashimi.

There are as yet in our country few hotels entirely European except the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo and a few others in Yokohama and Kobe. Kioto and Nikko have several good hotels owned and managed by Japanese; The Fujiya Hotel in Hakone is, perhaps, the best in Japan. It is entirely run by Japanese, but is managed exclusively for foreigners, I remember. But that is about all, and the rest are very poor.

Thus, there is a big field for new and old hotels in our country, and great necessity for them. Foreigners will now come to this country more than ever before, and how shall we entertain them properly without having plenty of hotels with first class accommodation? We must have them.

Some people think that Japan should have the biggest Navy in the world. I am rather anxious to have the best hotel system in the world with perfect accommodation, and to have men among us who can run a hotel in a masterly manner as Admiral Togo did our glorious Navy.

TREATMENT OF CHINESE IN AMERICA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—No doubt when Dr. Scudder was a boy some stones were thrown at Chinamen entering San Francisco, but the burning question of the hour is how are they treated just now? During the Land Lots agitation the stained glass windows of Trinity Church, Post and Powell streets, were stoned by the hoodlums to show that the Dennis Kearney crowd would prefer that the Chinese services held in the S. S. rooms every Sunday evening should cease, but the plutocratic vestry stood firm, and some of the helles of the creme de la creme in the society of the Golden Gate gathered there to waste their sweetness on coolies, who patiently spelled out the same old lessons week by week. Just one block to the west was Dr. Stone's big brick congregational meeting house where a good woman from Gloria Dei (Old Swedes') Niceno, Philadelphia, was doing the same sort of work. In my day every Easter the Chinese sent up to the altar a big cross of yellow chrysanthemums and an offering of gold for the sanctuary.

The Chinese deacon asked me to be God-father to his first born son. I have neglected my duty shamefully but the Rev. Dr. Spaulding (R.I.P.) put him through Trinity School where he won medals. His teacher of mathematics at Berkeley told me that he was the best in his class. He has just finished a post-graduate at Columbia and may now be addressed at the Christian College, Canton. Write to Samuel Young and ask him to tell the whole truth about this question without fear or favour. Another good man to write to would be Mr. Andrew Kan, Portland, Oregon. He was formerly of the Trinity Church Chinese Congregation. I am told that he supports a native missionary and has American citizens as his servant.

Even the American devil is not as black as he is painted.

Yours,

H. S. JEFFERYS.

THE JAPAN BREWERY COMPANY, LIMITED.

Report and Accounts for the Year ended 31st December, 1905, for presentation at the Eighth Ordinary General Meeting of Shareholders to be held at the Company's Office at the Brewery, Yamate-cho, Yokohama, at 4 p.m. on Monday, 5th February, 1906:—

Your Directors have now the pleasure to present herewith the Audited Accounts for the Year ended 31st December, 1905.

Contrary to expectations, the prosperity of the Company, as compared with 1904, has materially increased and deliveries have been the largest on record. This is accounted for by Peace having been declared and a greater demand for beer consequent on the return of the Victorious Army and Navy.

The Net Profit for the Year amounts to Yen 123,920.41 which with Yen 4,781.87 brought forward from 1904, makes the sum at Credit of Profit & Loss Account Yen 128,702.28.

The demand for "Kirin" was so great during the summer months that the Brewery was unable to fill orders to their fullest extent.

With the object of enlarging the cellaring accommodation a piece of land in the rear of the old cellars was purchased and a contract entered into for the building of new ones. These are expected to be ready for use in March and will enable an increase of output of about 25 per cent. on present capacity.

The land in the Brewery Compound used for the storage of bottles, etc., being wholly inadequate, and a favorable opportunity arising, a piece of ground measuring about 1,250 tsubo was purchased; and a house and ground next to the Brewery, being in the market, was also secured.

The cost of these purchases and extensions, when everything is paid, will amount to about Yen 100,000.

Should deliveries during the coming year go on increasing, it may be necessary to enlarge the Fermentation Cellars, Packing Rooms, etc., in which case either new Debentures or Capital will have to be issued.

Nothing will be done without careful consideration and, should further extensions not be required, the present additions will be paid for out of current account.

For these reasons your Directors are anxious to add to the Reserve as much as possible, and they therefore recommend that Yen 30,000 be placed to that Fund, bringing it up to Yen 200,000; a Dividend for the Year of 20 per cent. which will absorb Yen 90,000; and to carry forward the balance, Yen 8,702.28.

The Buildings, Brewing Plant, Machinery, etc., have been well kept up and everything is in first-class working order.

Stocks of Beer, Stores, and Sundries appear in the Balance Sheet at actual cost.

DIRECTORS.—Mr. W. R. Bennett resigned his seat at the Board in September on his departure for England.

The present Directors of the Company are as follows:—Messrs. F. S. James (Chairman and Managing Director), T. B. Glover, C. B. Bernard, R. Fachtmann, and L. J. Healing.

Under the Articles of Association two of these gentlemen, viz.: Messrs. T. B. Glover and R. Fachtmann retire, but being eligible offer themselves for re-election.

The Auditors of the Company are Messrs. F. J. Hall and J. F. Cox-Edwards who resign in accordance with the Articles of Association, but offer themselves for re-election at the recommendation of the Directors.

F. S. JAMES, Chairman and Managing Director
C. B. BERNARD, Director.

J. H. DINSDALE, Secretary.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

London, January 25.
King Edward, accompanied by Queen Alexandra, will open Parliament on February 19th.

FRANCE AND VENEZUELA.

It has been formally announced in Paris that France has decided to take action against Venezuela, but is choosing her own time and method of procedure, and is not allowing Venezuela to force her hand.

It is believed that the French Government is anxious not to become involved anywhere, pending the outcome of the Morocco Conference.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

Later.

The British election results now stand :—

Liberals.....	315
Labour Party .....	38
Nationalists .....	81
Unionists .....	135

REGENERATION OF CHINA.

Mr. Elihu Root, the U.S. Secretary of State, has received the Chinese travelling commissioners at Washington, and said that the hearty welcome which had been given to them was an expression of America's true sentiments towards China.

Mr. Wang Tah Seh, the new Chinese Minister in London, has been interviewed by Reuter's representative. He said China would undoubtedly follow Japan's example, and do her best to become a modern nation. A new army would probably be formed in South China, on Western models, similar to those now existing in Hupeh and North China. He ridiculed the "Yellow Peril" scare, and said that an alliance between China and Japan did not seem practicable at present; but he hoped that by peaceful development it would be possible to make China's relations closer with England, America and Japan, until a formal alliance would prove unnecessary. Regarding the Anglo-Tibetan treaty, China desired that Tibet should be administered similarly to other provinces of China, China giving it an effective administration. England would then have no cause to apprehend any hostile movements in that direction. For these reasons, China looked for some modification of the Tibetan treaty before she could adhere to it.

BRITISH ELECTIONS.

London, January 26.

The poll now stands:—Liberals, 341; Labour Party, 41; Nationalists, 139. The Liberals have gained 174 seats.

Sir Edward Grey has been re-elected for Northumberland.

Mr. Gibbs has resigned his seat in favour of Mr. A. J. Balfour.

THE CHINESE TRAVELLING COMMISSION.

President Roosevelt has cordially welcomed the Chinese travelling Commissioners.

THE SIMPLON TUNNEL.

The first passenger train has traversed the Simplon tunnel in 37 minutes.

BRITISH TAXATION.

London, January 27.

The Rt. Hon. Herbert Henry Asquith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, addressing his constituents in East Fife, said that no large remissions of taxation could be made immediately. Steps must be taken for the reduction of expenditure and provision made for the reduction of the National Debt. All these measures must precede or accompany any remission of taxation. He was not a Socialist but it was infinitely better that Socialists should be represented in the House of Commons than that they should be driven to adopt indirect methods.

ELECTION RETURNS.

Later.

The poll now stands :—

Liberals .....	362 seats.
Labour Party .....	41
Nationalists .....	82
Unionists .....	146

NEW GOVERNMENT PROGRAMME.

It is understood that the chief measures which the new British Cabinet will introduce to Parliament relate to the amendment of the Education Act; the Unemployed Act, Trades unions; and legislation imposing a load line on foreign vessels using British ports.

P. & O. ENTERPRISE.

London, January 28.

German newspapers announce that the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. will start on Feb. 3rd a fortnightly service from Hamburg to India at considerably reduced rates. The new service is regarded as opening a rate war between the P. & O. and the Hansa Company.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

Later.

The results of the elections so far are: 382 Liberals, 42 Labour candidates, 153 Unionists and 84 Nationalists. Mr. Long has been elected for South Dublin, which is a Unionist gain. Mr. William Keswick, of Jardine, Matheson & Co., has been elected for Epsom, by a majority of 1095. Mr. R. B. Haldane, Secretary of State for War, Mr. H. H. Asquith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson have been elected. Mr. Balfour will not be opposed in the City of London.

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

London, January 29.

Prince Arthur of Connaught has arrived at Colombo.

THE TRANSVAAL.

A crowded meeting of Progressives has been held at Pretoria, when there were present delegates representing 40,000 people. The speakers dwelt upon the gravity of the issues between the Transvaal and the Imperial Government, especially relative to the impending grant of responsible government.

THE QUESTION OF MOROCCO.

Later.

On the occasion of the Kaiser's birthday a banquet was given by the German colony in Paris. Prince Radolin, the German Ambassador, toasting MM. Loubet and Fallieres, said he was convinced the conference at Algieras would result in a solution of the Morocco question satisfactory to all. A Franco-German rapprochement would be the surest guarantee of peace, which none desired more than the German Emperor.

At a banquet of members of the Reichstag in Berlin Herr Ballestrom, who presided, said the Kaiser's famous landing at Tangier diverted the question of Morocco into a course favourable to Germany. But to ensure peace they must be able to knock on the head any one attempting to disturb it. The Reichstag must therefore support the Emperor's policy and vote for means to inspire respect. Prince Radolin's speech has made an excellent impression at Algieras; Ballestrom's has been received with amazement and irritation in view of the cordiality and confidence prevailing there.

VISCOUNT HAYASHI.

Viscount Hayashi sails on March 3rd.

THE KING OF DENMARK DEAD.

London, January 30.

The King of Denmark is dead. He gave his usual audience in the morning and retired to repose, after which he lunched. The Dowager Empress of Russia visited him about three in the afternoon and, finding him ill, summoned the family. He expired at 40 minutes past three.

THE DEATH OF THE KING OF DENMARK.

London, January 31.

King Christian was not sufficiently indisposed to be compelled to retire to bed till Jan. 30. Only the Empress Dowager of Russia and Prince Hans were present at the end. Other members of the family arrived too late.

The official announcement of the death says that the symptoms pointed to heart failure.

The accession of Crown Prince Frederik, who ascends the throne as Frederik the VIII., has been proclaimed.

Later.

The Kaiser goes to Copenhagen. Queen Alexandra also goes, but whether King Edward will be present depends upon the date of the funeral.

The King will open Parliament with a modified ceremonial.

London, February 1.

The British Court will go into mourning for six weeks. The Kings of Greece, Norway and Sweden, will attend the Royal funeral.

THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

The Times and Morning Post publish tables showing the complexion of the opposition to be mainly Chamberlainite.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

RUSSIA.

London, January 26.

The St. Petersburg Government considers that the starting of public works will pacify the starving peasants, and this policy will be adopted at Pavel, Riga and Kherson.

MOROCCO.

The feeling at Tangiers is that the Moors are indifferent regarding the proposals of the international conference as the country is glutted with contraband weapons.

ARREST OF NUNS AT TSARSKOE SELO.

London, January 29.

A telegram from St. Petersburg says that two nuns carrying bombs have been arrested at Tsarskoe Selo.

MOROCCO'S DELEGATES OBSTINATE.

The Morocco delegates at the Algieras Conference are becoming obstinate. They argue that Morocco is unable to carry out the taxation reforms.

THE DEATH OF KING CHRISTIAN.

London, January 30.

The death of King Christian of Denmark was most sudden and unexpected. His Majesty was in his usual health this morning. He took a walk and smoked as usual. After luncheon he was suddenly attacked by illness. The Empress Dowager of Russia was the only person present at the time of his death. Prince Frederik, who will succeed to the Throne, is to proceed to Copenhagen immediately. He has the reputation of gentleness of character and has spent many years in historical studies.

REVOLUTIONARIES BANISHED.

Two hundred of the revolutionary party in Moscow have been banished to Siberia.

RUSSIA'S FINANCIAL STRAITS.

Washington, January 30.

The German bankers have refused to take up the Russian loan. It is stated that Russia is on the verge of abandoning hard money payments.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")
DENMARK.

London, January 30.

The Crown Prince of Denmark to-day ascended the throne.

The King and Queen of Great Britain will probably be present at the funeral of the late King of Denmark.

All the newspapers of Europe lament the sudden death of King Christian.

SPAIN.

The arrangements for the wedding of the King of Spain are cordially welcomed by the newspapers of that country. The Voz de Galicia says that the excellent spirit of Great Britain will be adopted by Spain and as the result the bitter distress of Spanish social life will be ameliorated.

MOROCCO.

At the Morocco Conference, Germany refuses to disclose her attitude on a question with regard to policing. The matter is creating anxiety.

JAPANESE BONDS.

London, January 30.

Japanese bonds which recently fell owing to some pessimistic reports from Japan have advanced again, these rumours having been declared quite baseless.

THE LATE NAVAL BATTLES.

Sir William White, former Chief Designer for the British Admiralty, in a speech said that in the naval battles between Japan and Russia, no particular lesson was taught as to construction or management of warships. However, the battles taught the sailors that the training, organization, adoption of precautions, and the valour and presence of mind of the commander are most important essentials of victory.

There is a great retrenchment in the new Army Estimates.

DEATH OF A FAMOUS REFORMER.

Mr. George Jacob Holyoake is dead, aged 89 years.

[The late Mr. Holyoake was a remarkably gifted philosopher, lecturer and author, and perhaps the greatest man British journalism can boast of. He was the founder of Secularism (the utilitarianism of Mr. Bradlaugh, expressed as the substitution of the pigty of usefulness for the usefulness of piety; the religion of this life only; seeking morality in nature, and happiness in duty), a socialist reformer and agitator, in favour of co-operation, free thought—not atheism—and the complete emancipation and education of the masses. Stuart Mill said he was chiefly instrumental in securing the passage of the Affirmation Act of 1869. ("Who's Who" gives that as the date, but it is probably a misprint for the 1859 amendment). Like many other reformers in those intemperate days, he was made to suffer for his convictions; but, unlike many, has lived long enough to see most of his dreams come true. He gave his favourite recreation as "reading novels."]

(FROM THE "N.C. DAILY NEWS.")
DISCONTENT OF RUSSIA.

Peking, January 22.

The Russian Minister has protested against the China-Japan Treaty, on the ground that China's proclamation of the opening of Harbin to foreign trade is a menace to Russia's commercial interests.

Mr. Pokotiloff also protests that China's intention to cancel the concession given to the Russo-Chinese Corporation undertaking the lumber business in Kirin and Heilungkiang provinces, on the plea that the term has expired, is unjust, in view of the fact that China has allowed Japan to cut timber in the forests along the Yalu as a joint enterprise of China and Japan.

Mr. Pokotiloff insists that China must allow Russia to build a branch railway to Heilungkiang, since China has given Japan the right to build a branch line to Antunghsien.

RUSSIA'S DESIGNS ON MONGOLIA.

Peking, January 23.

The Chief Engineer of the Chinese Eastern Railway has come to Peking on railway and mining business. It is reported that one of his objects is to demand a Concession for a railway in Mongolia, and the Diplomatic Body is accordingly closely watching his movements.

SOCIALISTS.

London, January 23.

All the Socialist meetings throughout Germany resolutions have been unanimously passed, expressing sympathy with the Russian revolution, and demanding a reform of the miserably inadequate franchise in Prussia.

All these meetings have been most orderly, and this is due to the excellence of the party organization.

A NEW SEA LORD.

The Daily Telegraph has a report that Rear-Admiral H.S.H. Prince Louis of Battenberg, G.C.B., G.C.V.O., K.C.M.G., commanding the Second Cruiser Squadron, will shortly be appointed Second Sea Lord of the Admiralty.

TRAGEDY AT CHANGSHA.

Changsha, January 24.

Mr. Kelly, chief of the Changsha police, was shot on Tuesday by two Greeks, whom he was arresting, and died on Wednesday.

THE GARTER MISSION TO JAPAN.

Hongkong, January 24.

The programme for the reception of Prince Arthur of Connaught includes the presentation of addresses of welcome from the British, Chinese, and Japanese.

H.R.H. is to dine on the 10th of February with Chinese at the Koshing Theatre, and is invited to attend the races on the 12th and 13th.

There is to be an international ball on the 12th. It is believed that the Prince is unlikely to visit Canton.

DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

London, January 24.

The French Government has been defeated on the estimates of the Ministry of the Interior by 300 to 219 votes.

(FROM THE "SHANGHAI MERCURY.")

CHINESE DRILLING NEAR HONGKONG.

Hongkong, January 24.

Chinese instructors who have been trained in Japan are regularly drilling Chinese men and boys at Yaumati, the principal village on the mainland in Kowloon District, Hongkong (British territory). It is suggested that in the case of the men the British Government should interfere.

THE UNREST AT CANTON.

Owing to the trouble between the Viceroy and the Guilds in reference to that taxation proposed to be imposed to defray the cost of the construction of the Hankow Canton Railway, there is still considerable uneasiness at Canton, and it is feared that disturbances may occur there.

Madras (Dry Leaf), Medium to best ...	—

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

A moderate business has been done at a further decline and buyers are demanding yet lower prices. Holders are making a show of strength but will probably have to give way yet further in some classes because of the heavy stock and late period of the season.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10TH, 1906.

BIRTH.

On Thursday, the Feb. 1st, at Mito, the wife of Rev. JAMES CHAPPELL, of a Son.

DEATH.

On Saturday, the 3rd February, E. M. NEALE, aged 84 years, for many years resident of Yokohama. The remains will be cremated and sent to the United States for interment.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DURING January the export of coal from Moji totalled 196,821 tons.

TYPHUS is prevalent in the barracks of the 34th regiment at Shidzuoka.

CAVALRY Lieut-Colonel S. Inagaki has been ordered to duty in British India.

COMMANDER Prince S. Ichijo has been appointed an attaché to the Embassy in Paris.

MR. MOTONO, Minister to St. Petersburg, will leave Paris on Feb. 3rd for his new post.

MR. M. Inagaki, Minister to Bangkok, who is now in Tokyo, has tendered his resignation.

MARQUIS ITO left Tokyo on Feb. 7th by the 2.10 p.m. train for Oiso on his way to Korea.

On the evening of Feb. 5th, a torpedo boat collided with a junk while entering Kure harbour. The latter sank at once. One of the five persons on the junk was drowned and two were injured.

MAJOR-GENERAL Tojo has been appointed Commander of the thirtieth regiment of the garrison in Korea.

THE Seoul-Fusan Railway Company has decided to establish an iron foundry and a ship building yard at Fusan.

VISCOUNT Hayashi, Japanese Ambassador in London, has decided to leave on March 10th for home on leave of absence.

A FEW prominent merchants of Osaka have decided to lay an electric railway in Dairen with a capital of yen 1,500,000.

AT 5.10 a.m. on Feb. 5th, a slight shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama, the duration being two minutes and nine seconds.

THE 61st regiment, under Lieut-Col. Mikami, left Ujina on Feb. 5th for Manchuria. This is a portion of the garrison to be stationed there.

VICE-ADMIRAL MISU, who was recently appointed Commander of the Port Arthur Naval Station, left Ujina on Feb. 6th for his new post.

THE citizens of Sapporo, Hokkaido, intend to set up bronze statues of Admiral Togo and Field Marshal Marquis Oyama in the Onuma public garden.

THE Asahi has a telegram from Vladivostok via Nagasaki to the effect that M. Pokotiloff, now Russian Minister in Peking, will probably be transferred to Japan.

OWING to the death of the King of Denmark, the proposed ceremonies to welcome Prince Arthur of Connaught by the citizens of Hongkong have been abandoned.

ON the night of February 5th, a ferry-boat capsized in the lake of Kasumigaura, Ibaraki prefecture. Fourteen persons, including three soldiers, were drowned.

YOKOHAMA experienced a cold snap on Monday afternoon and night. It was seen on Tuesday morning that ice had formed in the Creek. On Friday snow fell all day.

THE net income of the Hokkaido Colliery and Railway Co for the last half year 1905 was yen 1914,109.43 and the interim dividend was at the rate of 15 per cent per annum.

A CASE of diphtheria is reported in Yokohama. The patient is a Chinaman residing at No. 128, Yamashita-cho. The usual sanitary measures were carried out on February 5th.

SENATOR Chauncey M. Depew has retired from the directorate of the Equitable Life Insurance Society of New York. This is in pursuance of his resolve made in December last.

A STEAM launch was capsized on the evening of Feb. 2nd off Mitsugama, near Matsuyama, on her way to Nagajima. Seven persons were drowned. Seven bays containing postal matter were lost.

THE arrival in Japan of Mr. Luke E. Wright, new American Ambassador to this country, which was arranged to take place in March, is now reported by the fiji to have been postponed till the beginning of May.

LADY Grey, whose death is announced in the telegrams, was married to Sir Edward Grey, the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in 1885. She was the daughter of Mr. S. F. Widdrington, Newton Hall, Northumberland. Lady Grey sustained severe injuries the other day by being thrown from a trap.

MR. K. Sasaki, a teacher in the Tokyo High Normal School, has been engaged by an institute in Buda-Pest, Hungary, as instructor of jijitsu. He will shortly leave for his post. The term of engagement is four months.

THE Japanese warship Tsushima, which was sent to Shanghai in connexion with the late trouble there left on Feb. 5th for home. The commander entertained the leading Japanese on board the ship previous to her departure.

THE sailing vessel Kaho Maru (123 tons) collided on the night of Jan. 31st, with a German steamer off Hakozaki, Sanuki province. The Japanese vessel sank at once but her crew were all saved by the German ship and brought to Moji on Feb. 2nd.

A BERLIN telegram says that Count Arco-Valley, German Minister, when he leaves Tokyo, will be appointed to Athens. He has received for his distinguished services the second class of the Order of the Prussian Red Eagle with oak leaves and royal crown.

ABOUT a hundred and fifty of the workmen employed at the Ishikawajima Shipbuilding Yard, Tokyo, threatened to strike for an increase of wages on Feb. 5th. Mr. Takeda, a police inspector of the Kyobashi Office, proceeded there with thirty police and pacified the workmen.

SIR Charles Dilke issued a novel address to his constituents of the Forest of Dean division of Gloucestershire, which he has represented in the House of Commons as an Advanced Radical since July, 1892. It consisted of a single sentence, as follows: "I solicit a renewal of your trust."

SUB-SERGEANT Harada and other prisoners who recently returned from the front have been tried by Court-martial at Hiroshima. They were all acquitted on the ground that they were captured by the enemy while incapacitated from severe wounds and consequently their captivity should not injure their reputation.

MRS. Yajima and 890 members of the Nippon Christian Women's Temperance Society have presented a petition to the Diet through Mr. S. Shimada. The society asks that strict control should be exercised over loose women abroad and that revisions should be made in a portion of the Civil and Penal Codes—for the punishment of immoral offences.

Two gamblers, T. Yoshida and K. Morita, quarrelled on Feb. 4th in a restaurant at Uraga and the latter inflicted severe injuries on the former with a knife. The victim died on the following day and the offender gave himself up to the Yokosuka Police. Preliminary Examination Judge Hasegawa and Public Procurator Kobayashi, of the Yokohama District Court, have proceeded to the place.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL A. R. Chaffee has been retired as Chief of Staff, U. S. A., and is succeeded by Major General John C. Bates, whose retirement for age is scheduled for August 26. General Corbin has just sailed for home, his post as commander of the Philippine forces devolving on Major General Leonard Wood. Wood is but 45 years old and has many years of service before him under the age regulations governing retirement. The three other commanders named are each 63.

AN ERROR OF TRANSMISSION.

Some excitement seems to have been caused in London by a Reuter's telegram announcing that at a meeting of one of the Budget Sub-Committees on the 31st ultimo the Minister of State for War, replying to a question propounded by Mr. Oishi Masami, had stated that Japan had asked or would ask England to increase or reform her Army. Without the full text of the message sent to London by Reuter's agent it would be obviously unjust to condemn him, but as to the impression produced in London by his message, there appears to be no room for doubt. On comparing the various accounts of this Sub-Committee's proceedings as published by different Tokyo journals, we are disposed to think that Reuter's Agent in Japan was misled by the Asahi's report. In that report it was stated that Mr. Oishi's question took the following form:—"In the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of Alliance there is a clause providing that the military measures to be taken by the two Powers for preserving the peace of India and China shall be made the subject of examination by experts. I do not remember that Great Britain's forces in India are very large. Do the Japanese Authorities contemplate approaching England with a view to inducing her to increase her Indian Army?" Replying to this question General Terauchi was represented as indicating that such was a result of the Treaty and might be inferred without saying. The Asahi did not allege that the Minister of War employed these very words. It merely depicted him as plainly conveying that meaning. The actual language attributed to him was:—Sayo nabaini ai naru beshi. (It will probably come to that). Reuter's agent doubtless relied upon that version of the Minister's reply, and wired that Japan was about to urge upon the British Government an increase or some reform of the latter's forces in India. Had he consulted the Fiji Shimpō of the same morning (1st inst.) he would doubtless have delayed his telegram. The question attributed by the Fiji's report to Mr. Masami was this:—"The responsibilities devolving upon Japan having been made heavier than ever in consequence of the revised Treaty of Alliance, views should be exchanged between the two Powers with reference to the increase of their military and naval forces and the manner of their disposition. What idea does Japan entertain with regard to England increasing her Army or stationing an additional naval force in the Far East?" To this General Terauchi was represented as having replied:—"The Treaty itself provides that the Governments of the two Powers shall exchange views with regard to the disposition of their forces, and it will of course be proper that this condition should be complied with." Reuter's agent does not seem to have observed this discrepancy between the reports. He telegraphed to London in the sense that the Minister of War, replying to a question put by Mr. Oishi, stated that the Japanese Government would approach (or had approached) the British Government, with a view to inducing the latter to reform its army (or its military system). Reuter's agent did not allege that the Minister had actually made this statement. He merely wired that such a statement was attributed to him. It will further be observed that the exact terms of Reuter's message are uncertain, different telegrams from London giving different versions of it, though all agree in substance. What the Minister of War did actually say, according to verbatim transcripts of the stenographic report now published by our Tokyo contemporaries, was this:—"As you are aware, the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of Alliance contains a clause which, so far as I remember, contains what Mr. Oishi has stated, namely, that with regard to steps for mutually rendering armed assistance, the military authorities of the two Powers shall exchange views and confer frankly. As a matter of course this condition will, I presume, be carried out by the Government, but nothing has yet been done in that sense." It will be seen from this that Gen. Terauchi did not make the faintest allusion to such a topic as an increase of the British Army or a reform of the British military system. He confined himself strictly to explaining that the terms of the Treaty would naturally be observed in so far as concerned the armed dispositions requisite for giving effect to it. The Kokumun Shinbun writes very strongly about the want of proper care shown by Reuter's agent, and observes that no one acquainted with General Terauchi, who is a man of extreme circumspection, could imagine him making the statement attributed to him, while even those unacquainted with him should not fail to appreciate the great importance of the subject and should consequently have hesitated to spread such a report to the four quarters of the world. Reuter's agent will naturally have his own explanation to offer. All that now seems necessary is that the error should be clearly contradicted.

It is stated that the editor of the Tribune telegraphed direct to the Japanese Minister of War begging him to convey to it clearly his views about the reform or increase of the British Army. General Terauchi replied that the report attributing any such views to him was quite groundless, a fact of which the British public, it may be observed en passant, are now fully cognizant. This device of the Tribune constitutes a new departure and we are somewhat surprised to learn that the Minister of War acceded to the London newspaper's request. Evidently if the practice of answering telegraphic queries from newspapers be once inaugurated by Ministers of State there will be no end to the questions, and failure to reply will be read by the light of the old proverb "silence gives consent."

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun has a leading article on the subject of the question preferred by Mr. Oishi Masami and the answer erroneously attributed to General Terauchi, but on the whole it may be justly thought that too much importance is attached to this incident. The whole trouble arose from a paragraphist's wholly misleading version of an event in a committee room and from the credence placed by Reuter's agent in the intelligence columns of a usually trustworthy journal. One can not but agree with the Nichi Nichi, however, that the acts and words of the Japanese have acquired new importance in Western estimation and that corresponding care should be exercised in reporting them.

The stenographic records of the meetings of the sub-committees of the Budget are now for the first time accessible and we are in a position to know exactly what Mr. Oishi Masami said when he questioned the Minister of State for War and elicited an answer which has become the occasion of so much misconception. Translations purporting to be accurate renderings of Mr. Oishi's query have already been published by some of our contemporaries, but they were not trustworthy, being mere epitomes. The exact words, according to the stenographic records, were these:—"I have another question to ask, though it may not seem quite germane to the subject. According to the Anglo-Japanese treaty of alliance the country has assumed a large responsibility connected with the preservation of the integrity of China and India as well as the preservation of the peace of the Far East. It is a heavy responsibility; a defensive and offensive alliance. I presume therefore that the Treaty is intended to convey the meaning that military experts on both sides will confer with regard to warlike matters and will come to various understandings. I further presume that on the side of the Army and the Navy English experts or the English Government will be approached with a view to local inspection as to matters of war or defence, and that the measure of military strength having been investigated, representations will be made as to the necessity of increasing it. The English Navy is recognised by the whole world as being very powerful, but by virtue of this offensive and defensive alliance plans may have to be formed for an Anglo-Japanese combination in another direction. In that case the question arises how much assistance would the English Fleet render to Japan or how much would it be asked to render? In that context, speaking from the naval point of view, what would be the size of the squadron posted by England in the Far East; and speaking from the military point of view, would she be asked to increase her forces, inasmuch as her Army is not, we believe, so very strong, or would she be asked to make some reform of her military system for the purposes of combined action on land? Now that East and West are to work in union, is it your intention to have England's Army somewhat strengthened, or to arrange that she shall employ such and such a force in the event of operations at sea? If because our responsibilities have become heavier, we alone must augment our Army and Navy, we shall scarcely be able to bear the burden, I think. It is a question of the future, but I should like to know what view you take."

We believe this to be as nearly as possible what Mr. Oishi intended to say, but we can not profess to have fathomed his meaning with absolute accuracy, for if the truth must be told we have never had the privilege of reading a more confused piece of oratory, or of attempting to render into English a series of sentences so interlaced and so disjointed. It is sufficiently evident, however, that he did inquire whether England should not be asked to augment or reform her army and to fix the naval force stationed by her in the Far East. Mr. Oishi is a politician who has never been remarkable for reticence. The responsibilities of office would probably sober him if he had to shoulder them, but out of office he certainly does not offer any model of circumspection.

General Terauchi's reply was this:—"As you are aware, the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of Alliance does, I think, contain one clause of the nature indicated by Mr. Oishi, namely a clause signifying that the military authorities of the two countries shall confer and take frank counsel with regard to the conditions and measures for military co-operation. As a matter of course the Government, I presume, must carry this out, but up to the present nothing has been done in the matter." The Minister, in short, interpreted Mr. Oishi as referring solely to the provisions which the Treaty of Alliance contains on the subject of conference for the practical carrying out of its purposes. Perhaps General Terauchi, being an eminently circumspect statesman, purposely declined to follow the Progressist politician into the extremely undiplomatic bypaths taken by the latter, but at all events His Excellency took care that his reply should not contain one word to which the smallest exception could be taken.

Reuter's Tokyo Agent has allowed himself to be interviewed by the Yomiuri Shimbun and has explained that he took his version of the occurrence, not from any newspaper, but from the Imperial News Agency. He was greatly misled by the latter, and we must say that the News Agency had much excuse, for short of a verbatim report of Mr. Oishi's question and short of the closest attention to its labyrinthine phrases, any reporter might well have been perplexed; while, at the same time, it is easy to comprehend that a greatly epitomised version of the Minister's reply might be fitted to an erroneous rendering of the question. Reuter's Agent says that he has called on Mr. Oishi and has had the correctness of his telegram verified by the latter. We presume that this refers to the speech of the Progressist politician only since it can not possibly refer with truth to the meaning of General Terauchi's reply. We agree with Reuter's Agent that so far as collecting and transmitting news are concerned, his first duty is to his foreign employers, but we are bound to say that he has a duty to his country also and that to discharge the latter his straightest plan was to acknowledge without the least reserve that in his version of General Terauchi's answer he had been misled. No one attaches much importance to what Mr. Oishi Masami says as an irresponsible unit of the Opposition who devotes a large part of his ample leisure to devising and propounding questions for the confusion of the Authorities; but the utterances of the Minister of State for War speaking to a committee of the House of Representatives must be very differently regarded. It would be an intolerable piece of presumption on the part of any Japanese statesman to make the declaration attributed to General Terauchi, and were such a declaration made with regard to the Japanese Army or Navy by an English Secretary for War, we have no hesitation in predicting that Mr. Oishi Masami would be the first to protest and the loudest among the protestants.

VLADIVOSTOCK.

Somewhat contradictory reports are published with respect to the riot at Vladivostock on the 24th ultimo. The information is said to have been obtained from the master of a British ship which has just reached Nagasaki. She was lying in the harbour of Vladivostock at the time of the occurrence, and her people witnessed the fight on shore. They say that it was between Cossacks and prisoners recently returned from Japan, which statement is elaborated by other observers in the sense that the returned prisoners were Poles. Four hundred and fifty are said to have been killed or wounded, and among the killed was Major-General Korbinski (?), commandant of the fortress. It is further alleged that the various forts are in the possession of the insurgents, and it is here that the story becomes contradictory, for the forts are represented as firing upon all returned prisoners from Japan. We may mention that there is collateral evidence of great anxiety on the part of those in command to expedite the return of the prisoners, for tenders have been invited for steamers to carry these men to Odessa without a day's delay. That would go to confirm the account in so far as it depicts the existence of bad blood between the prisoners and the remainder of the garrison. Another item of news conveyed by these Nagasaki informants is that Linevitch would send fifteen thousand Cossacks to restore order in Vladivostock could he spare them from the duty of watching the semi-mutinous troops in Manchuria, but if the Army under Linevitch be so greatly disaffected, how are we to account for the fact, telegraphed from Europe, that he contemplates returning in March to St. Petersburg for the purpose of assuming the direction of the War Office? He certainly is not likely to turn his back on a mutinous army. Another steamer (British), which has just reached Moji, having left Vladivostock on the 31st ultimo, reports that she reached Vladivostock with a party of prisoners on the 28th, but being signalled not to attempt any landing, she lay 12 miles off the shore for three days. On the morning of the 30th she was permitted to approach, and having put the prisoners hastily ashore, steamed away forthwith, without waiting even for the mails or for a bill of health. She says that the sounds of artillery and rifle fire were constantly heard both by day and by night. Her people were informed, they say, that a great part of the town was destroyed and that the shops and places of business were all closed. No one ventured abroad except folks who were armed and mounted, though occasionally a band of men formed a forlorn hope and sallied forth to draw water. The Japanese inhabitants were living in the Nippon Yusen Kaisha compound under the protection of the American Commercial Agent as well as of the Red-Cross flag. None of them had been injured. The Chinese coolies had all fled, and the labour of carrying provisions and other matters was preformed by the Government troops at the orders of the insurgents, but scarcity was beginning to be severely felt. All the godowns were open, apparently for purposes of purchase; Mischenko's cavalry had failed to accomplish anything beyond seizing the railway station; they could not quell the meeting. About 350 dead bodies were lying here and there in the streets: no efforts were made to bury them. The posts and telegraphs were controlled absolutely by the insurgents, so that communications with the outer world were severed.

It is now reported that the German steamer Servia, which struck a floating mine when attempting to emerge from Vladivostock, had a hundred casualties—the Jiji Shimpō's information says a thousand, but the smaller number seems more credible—among her passengers and crew. She was carrying homeward bound troops. Happily it was found possible to get her into shallow water before she sank.

The report that the ice-crushers had been injured was evidently untrue. They are both at work, and they are kept very busy clearing a channel through an ice-field which extends to a distance of many miles from the shore.

It is now stated that Lieut.-General Semianoff is not the commander of the Siberian Army but the commander of the Vladivostock fortress. He received his wound at the hands of the insurgents in the riot on the 24th ultimo, and his condition is reported as somewhat precarious. Japanese newspapers say that he is attended in Nagasaki by Russian surgeons only and that the greatest secrecy is observed.

Rumour says that trouble has again broken out in Vladivostock and that the Volunteer steamer Kostroma, which is bound thither from Odessa with a cargo of provisions, has been ordered to remain at Nagasaki, where she now lies.

RAILWAYS IN MANCHURIA AND KOREA.

Many conjectures have been hazarded about the railway work done by the Japanese Government in Korea and Manchuria during the war and the work that remains to be done in order to render the lines permanently useful. The subject is very lucidly treated by the Jiji Shimpō. Taking the various lines and observing that the monies hitherto spent on them have been taken from the war funds, our contemporary gives the following figures:—

SEOUL-WIJU RAILWAY.

Already expended, 21,841,243 yen; in which total is included the cost incurred in carrying to rapid completion the railway between Samlang-jin and Masau. This latter road connects Samlang-jin, a station on the Seoul-Fusan road, with Masampo. It appears to have been found essential for military purposes and to have been pushed forward with exceptional rapidity, the additional funds required for the purpose being paid out of those appropriated for the Seoul-Wiju road, but the accounts have not yet been accurately differentiated so that it is impossible to say exactly how much went to the Seoul-Wiju construction and how much to the Samlang-jin-Masampo.

To be still expended upon the Seoul-Wiju line in order to perfect it and bring it into the condition of a permanent road, 20,040,900 yen.

Out of this last total, orders for essential materials have been given and labour has been undertaken to the extent of 4,340,000 yen.

MASAU-SAMLANG-JIN ROAD.

Sum already spent in addition to the money appropriated from the Seoul-Wiju Fund as noted above... 1,191,356 yen

EAST-CHINESE RAILWAY.

Sum already spent..... 29,174,910 yen
Sum required to complete the work... 3,380,239 yen

ANTUNG-MUKDEN RAILWAY.

Sum already spent..... 6,209,365 yen

The sum required to complete the work is not yet definitely ascertained.

Adding up the above figures, it results that the amount actually defrayed out of the war funds for purposes of railway building is 58,416,874 yen, and that the amount still to be spent, so far as has been ascertained, is 23,420,239 yen. Probably the latter figure will ultimately reach a total of 40 millions, and the grand aggregate of expenditure will be 100 millions, approximately. There can be no question about the very solid interests secured by this Empire in Korea and Manchuria. Another point emphasized by the figures is that when Japan asked the Peking Government for the concession of the Antung-Mukden road, she had already invested in the enterprise a very substantial sum, and the same was true on a much larger scale with regard to the Liaching-Chanchung line. The same argument did not apply at all to the Kirin-Chanchung road, and probably applied in only a very insignificant measure to the Hsinmintun-Mukden Line which had been constructed by the Russians.

The recent entertainment given in Tokyo to aid in purchasing a piano for Miss Tsuda's school was eminently successful. The sum of yen 380 was received altogether, out of which yen 6 was paid for the printing of tickets. From the surplus of yen 374, the sum of yen 300 was paid for a piano and yen 74 was handed to Miss Tsuda for the benefit of the school. We congratulate all upon the outcome of the evening.

POLITICAL NOTES.

It may be said that the two great questions between the Cabinet and the House of Representatives are what are called the gensai kikin (fund for reducing the national debt) and the hijo tokubetsu sei keizoku (continuation of the extraordinary war taxes). Concerning these, there appears to be no doubt that the Progressist Party will oppose the former in toto, and will vote for a limit of time in the case of the latter, during which time steps shall be taken to investigate the matter fully and to recast the taxes. But the Seiyu-kai appear to be determined to support the Government on both counts, though they too will probably stipulate for the appointment of a strong committee to investigate the nature of the war taxes and to make re-adjustments such as were not possible in the face of the urgency which confronted the Government at the time of the outbreak of war. The Daido Club will certainly vote with the Seiyu-kai, and consequently the situation may be regarded as safe for the Cabinet.

In our last issue we stated that according to present appearances the Government's proposals for forming an amortization fund of 110 million yen and for continuing the extraordinary war taxes would obtain the approval of a large majority in the Lower House. This forecast is confirmed by the result of a meeting of Seiyu-kai parliamentary representatives which took place on the 3rd instant. It was then decided that both of the above measures should receive the Party's approval but that the Government should be asked to appoint, either by law or by Ordinance, a committee for the purpose of examining the various items of extraordinary taxes with a view to amending them if necessary, and that the expenses attending the operations of the committee should be embodied in an estimate for presentation to the Diet during this session, the work of investigation to be completed within a settled period. The Daido Club, it is alleged, have decided to vote in the same sense, with an additional proviso, namely, that the continuance of the War Taxes shall not at once be made permanent but shall be only for a fixed number of years, within which the desired investigation shall take place. These reservations seem quite reasonable. The schedule of extraordinary war taxes was drawn up hastily and under the pressure of critical circumstances. It could not possibly be expected to embody the best results of mature deliberation, though indeed the general verdict must be that, all things considered, the scheme of increased taxes did much credit to the Finance Department. But if these imposts are to be made permanent, as seems inevitable, it is only right that they should be subjected to the closest scrutiny, and if the Cabinet itself did not at the outset propose a measure for that purpose we can only suppose that it intended to do so immediately on learning the Diet's attitude towards the Budget. The latter point is now clearly settled, for the Seiyu-kai and the Daido Club command between them about 220 votes in the Lower House out of a total of 379. There can be no doubt as to the justice of The Times' remark that the amortization measure will immensely strengthen Japan's credit abroad. It is not a measure voted for one year only. It is a permanent step which can not be hereafter altered without a special Bill. We may not suppose that it would not be altered did Japan find herself confronted by such an emergency as was the recent war, but according to present appearances she will discharge the whole of her foreign debts in the space of about 30 years.

It is evident that the entente between the Progressists and the Seiyu-kai will not bear the strain of pending issues. A great deal of capital has been made by the Progressists out of the statement attributed to Marquis Saionji that administrative reform must now be abandoned. But it is explained on the other side that the Marquis' words have been greatly misinterpreted. What he intended to say, and what his political followers claim that he did say, was that the kind of reform contemplated in ante-bellum days is no longer possible and that such ideas ought to be abolished. He made no allusion to reforms having for their object the reduction of expenses and the improvement of official facilities for conducting business. Improvements in those directions fall within the range of ordinary governmental duties and will be undertaken by the present Cabinet as a matter of course. There is some expectation that Marquis Saionji will take an opportunity of correcting in the Diet the false impression caused by his previous utterances on this subject. That he will be attacked by the Progressists in the House of Representatives by means of questions if he makes such a correction, and probably by means of a resolution if he does not make it, goes without saying. As to other issues, the Progressists are said to have definitely decided that they will implacably oppose the Cabinet's Amortization Scheme; that they will agree to continuing the War taxes for one year only, during which the advisability of recasting the schedule shall be fully considered; and that they will agree to the extraordinary outlays asked for under other headings. There will probably be an animated debate when the Budget come up for discussion, but the Government will command a large majority.

The final break has taken place between the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists. The latter have replied to the former's proposals of cooperation that they can not entertain them with regard either to the amortization scheme or the continuance of the war taxes. They do not deny the necessity of striking out some programme of increased taxation, but they claim that the imposts devised for the purpose of obtaining funds in an emergency can not be free from defects, and their idea is to allow the Cabinet until the end of next fiscal year to effect the necessary investigations and prepare a new programme. As to the amortization fund, they condemn it on the ground that no necessity exists for such heroic methods.

Meanwhile the Daido Club have held a meeting and having decided to vote in the same sense as the Seiyu-kai, with the exception of advising that within the course of two years the Ministry shall carry out a thorough investigation into the scheme of taxation.

We stated in our last issue that the Daido Club had decided to vote for continuing the War taxes provided that a term of 2 years be fixed within which the Government should fully investigate and, if desirable, reform the nature of the taxes. It now appears that the Seiyu-kai also have adopted the view in deference to the Daido Club, thus securing the united support of the two parties for the measure.

The sub-committee on the Communications section of the Budget has decided to add to the railways included in next year's construction scheme a line from Shibata to Akita; in other other words, a line connecting the O-U and the Echigo systems.

The Budget Committee has decided its general policy. Broadly speaking the resolution is to elide all appropriations for new works which are not of a pressing nature, and to effect retrenchments to the extent of 5 million yen in the naval and military schedules, the money thus saved to be devoted to productive enterprises. Further, the building and repairing expenditures of the various departments are to be cut down by 5 per cent., thus effecting a total economy of 3 million yen; and the period for subsidizing the Australian S.S. service is to be reduced from 5 years to 3. The Committee is also disposed to disallow the appropriation on account of the Rumoe railway, the argument being that the construction of this line should depend upon harbour improvement, concerning which no plans have yet been formed. Mr. Ema's motion for eliding the appropriation for the Tokyo Chief of Police was rejected.

The Progressists adhere to the attitude already described, but it is evident that they will be in a marked minority when the Budget comes up for discussion in the House.

The Daido Club has been able to display the strength it wields as standing between the two great political parties. When the appropriation for constructing the Rumoe railway came up in the Budget Committee, the Seiyu-kai members opposed it in toto, on the ground that until harbour improvements were effected, the building of the railway would be a profitless outlay. The Progressists, however, advocated the work, and as the Daido Club members threw their weight into the Progressists' scale, the project was voted over the heads of the Seiyu-kai. Another though not quite so striking an example was furnished by the case of the subsidy for the Australian service. The Government's Bill proposes to continue the subsidy for five years; the Progressists advocate 2 years; the Daido Club are in favour of one year, while the Seiyu-kai support 3 years. The Daido Club amendment was taken first at the Committee's meeting, and was rejected, whereupon the Daido representatives voted for the Progressists' two-year amendment and carried it, again over the heads of the Seiyu-kai.

The Yorozu Choho says that the Government Bill for the nationalization of the railways consists of twelve articles. The important provisions are these. First that the lines shall be purchased at a price calculated by taking their average annual net profits during the three years 1902, 1903 and 1904, and multiplying that figure by twenty. In the case of lines which show no net earnings, their value is to be determined by a committee of appraisal. Secondly, the purchase price is to be paid with five-per-cent. bonds, their face value to be 100 and their price of issue to the railways, 95 yen. Thirdly, that the railways first dealt with shall be the Kiushu, Sanyo, Nippon and the Sobu. The other articles are not given by our contemporary.

Major K. Mori, a retired military officer, residing in Okayama, has committed suicide by shooting himself with a revolver in the enclosure of a Buddhist temple at Sasayama near that city. He was in the army under General Nogi when the investment of Port Arthur was commenced in 1904 but in September the same year, he was sent home owing to ill-health.

RUSSIA AND CHINA.

The Asahi Shimbun has obtained from Peking what purports to be a statement of the proposals made by China to Russia. They are:—

First, that Russia should withdraw her Manchurian Railway Guards, as the Peking Treaty explicitly provides that if she does so Japan will follow suit, and consequently the continued retention of foreign troops within Chinese territory depends solely on Russia.

Secondly, that Russia should give up all mining and railway concessions obtained by her from the Governors of Kirin and the Amur, with the exception of such concessions as have received the approval of the Chinese Government. The Asahi's correspondent learns that these concessions are very numerous.

Thirdly, that Russia shall remove all military railways and telegraphs constructed by her in Manchuria, and shall restore all Chinese property, public or private, held by her troops.

Fourthly, that the Amur River shall be opened to trade.

Fifthly, that Russia shall pay compensation for all damage inflicted on Chinese property apart from the damage unavoidable as accompanying acts of war; for example, the injury wrought in Harbin by Russian rioters.

Sixthly, that Russia shall abandon the projects formed by her for laying, in partnership with Chinese subjects, railways between Kirin and Changchun and between Mukden and Hsinmintun. As to this condition we (Japan Mail) may observe that although Russia had not obtained any consent from the Peking Government, she seems to have made some arrangement with the Governors of Kirin and Mukden respectively for the construction of the lines in question.

Seventhly, that Russia would restore to China the Kulung-kiakta telegraph.

Eighthly, that the Kiakta Treaty shall be revised, that Russia shall give back to China any land appropriated by her (Russia), and that the boundaries of the two countries shall be definitely fixed.

These conditions seem eminently fair. They amount to nothing more than a series of proposals based upon the evacuation of Manchuria by Russia. The latter will doubtless plead, with regard to the Kirin-Changchun railway, that since the Chinese have given to Japan a concession for an Antung-Mukden line, they should give to Russia a concession for the Kirin-Changchun road. But the two cases are differentiated in two ways: first, that Japan has already spent over 20 million yen upon the Antung-Mukden line, and, secondly, that by the Portsmouth Treaty Russia abandoned the Kirin-Changchun line to Japan, so that, if a concession for it is to be granted to any foreign state that state must be Japan, not Russia.

It is nevertheless stated that Russia shows no disposition to concede China's proposals. St. Petersburg's answer to them has been received in Peking, it is alleged, and has been transmitted to the Waiwupu, since which time two meetings of the Plenipotentiaries have taken place in the Russian Legation, and on these occasions M. Pokotiloff has virtually rejected all the Chinese proposals seriatim or has appended conditions of a more or less onerous nature. He has also preferred demands from Russia's side, the principal of which is said to be that a concession should be granted for a railway from Shao-Kulong to Kulong. The Hochi's correspondent supplements this by wiring that Russia takes great exception to the opening of Harbin—it is curious how frankly Russia takes pages out of a book which was supposed to exist in China's political library only—and has asked for a concession to build a line from Ili to Hsinmintun, the work to be undertaken by Russians and Chinese in combination, and if the Chinese can not find capital, the Russians will put it up. The demand is said to be accompanied by a promise that the line shall be returned to China whenever she wishes it.

The Fiji Shimpo shrewdly observes that according to conventions, all that Russia has a right to make the subject of this conference in Peking is to confirm on Japan's account the interests abandoned by Russia in Manchuria in favour of her late adversary. She has no manner of title to seize this occasion for preparing on her behalf demands calculated to restore the losses suffered in the war or in its sequel. But it is plain that she does not take any such view. On the contrary these negotiations, which are in reality undertaken by her as an obligation to Japan, her victor, are regarded by her as an opportunity for recouping her own losses by securing a permanent standing in northern Manchuria, which would be a direct violation of the Portsmouth Treaty, and by securing in Mongolia such a standing as would carry her very near the gates of Peking and invest with really serious menace her proximity to the Indian frontier. She continues to be the great troubler of the peace of the East.

But has she asked for all these things? Will it not be better to reserve judgment until something more definite is known?

Above we publish on the authority of the Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent a statement of the demands said to have been preferred by China to Russia in the negotiations now pending. Below the same journal gives from the same source an account of Russia's counter demands. They are:—

1. A concession for a railway from Kulong via Shao-Kulong to unite with the East Chinese Line. (Shao-Kulong is not marked on any map in our possession, but a line from Kulong to join the East Chinese Railway would apparently run almost parallel to the Trans-Asian road.
2. That Russia shall enjoy in Manchuria the same privileges as Japan has there.
3. The railways in the Amur region shall be built by Russians and Chinese in combination.
4. That Russia shall have the precedence with regard to mining and other concessions in the Kirin and Amur regions.
5. Should foreign aid be required in connexion with the administration of the Kirin and Amur regions, Russians shall be employed.
6. The privilege of felling timber in the Amur region shall be conferred on Russians and Chinese in combination.
7. That the concession for the Kulung-Kiakta Railway shall be given to Russia.

If this list of proposals be trustworthy, it appears that Russia is determined to utilize her late signal defeat in war as an occasion for securing advantages much greater than those sought by her victor, Japan. That would be a most interesting example of moral elasticity. We do not suppose that the vitality of Russia's ambition is much impaired by the series of disasters she received at Japan's hands, but we do suppose that she has some sense of the fitness of things, and that she will not prefer demands which are foolishly inconsistent with the situation. Her own internal condition should counsel moderation, but the man at the front has never been remarkable for the attention he pays to domestic affairs. China must be wide awake to the fact that the Great Northern Power, having been checked on one line of approach to the Middle Kingdom, will turn with all the more avidity to another. In fact China's procedure shows that she appreciates the situation, for she has commenced to build the Peking-Chiangkiakow line, and is preparing to extend it to Kulong, whence it would proceed to Maimachin and Kiakta, finally joining the Trans-Asian line at Veynochinsky, in the immediate vicinity of Lake Baikal. This is not the only route that Russia may take to reach China. There is also the Sinkiang-Shensi route, and here too very visible signs of Russian activity are evident. Indeed it is plain that the Great Northern Power's expansion activity has merely been transferred from the Far East to the Middle East, and that the menace to China is deferred not defeated. Twenty years ago such signs of railway-building enterprise would have been welcomed by the Western world as tending to the peaceful development of trade and the spread of civilization. But the nations have now learned that railways are the most potent instruments of imperial ambition, and any attempt on the part of a military State like Russia, whose trade is almost insignificant, to obtain concessions for lines affording access to the Chinese capital must be viewed with extreme distrust. Probably the sober-headed section of the Japanese nation will now begin to appreciate the wisdom of their diplomatists is not insisting on the grant of the Kirin-Changchun concession. Had Japan obtained that from China, Russia's title to equivalent consideration elsewhere, in spite of her vanquished position, would now be much stronger than it is.

Rumour says that the Russian Plenipotentiary is striving earnestly to secure complete secrecy for the negotiations, as was the case with regard to the doings of the recent China-Japan Conference. It would seem that he has not been very successful since already the public possesses versions of his demands as well as of those of China.

CHINA.

Saturday, February 3.

The report is confirmed that the Russo-Chinese conference with respect to Manchuria will be opened at an early date but its proceedings are likely to be quite secret. It is stated that on the day following the exchange of the Japanese-Chinese Convention's ratifications, a meeting took place between the Vice-Minister of the Waiwupu, Mr. Tang Shou-i, and the Russian Representative, Mr. Pokotiloff, on which occasion the former handed to the latter a list of Chinese proposals. M. Pokotiloff promised that the matter should receive full attention but since that time no communication has been received from the Russian side. Neither does it appear that any proposals have been formulated from St. Petersburg. Hence there is no basis for conjecturing the date of the conference. China is said to have appointed as her Plenipotentiaries Messrs. Ku Fun-ki and Shou-i.

Rumour says that whereas Russia will not prefer any demands with regard to Manchuria, she will seize the opportunity to push her interests in Mongolia, Ili and Sinkiang. In other words, she will shape her plans in accordance with the idea of advancing against China from the north and north-west instead of from the north-east. It is impossible to tell how much of this intelligence is mere conjecture. The public has now again entered the era of thought-reading so far as Russia's central Asian designs are concerned. Nothing seems tangible and certain except that her ambition has not been stifled, and that if it has sustained a momentary check in Manchuria, it will seek compensations in other directions. That conviction will inspire a great many assertions in the future.

Among the properties which China is seeking to recover there is said to be a gold mine on the Muho, (a branch of the Amur) which has the reputation of being one of the richest mines in China's dominions. It produces over a million taels worth of ore yearly. But it is in Russian hands, and the prospect of its being got back into China's possession are remote indeed.

There are rumours of anti-foreign disturbances planned by the Kolao-hui in Szchuan. Nothing has been heard of the Kolao-hui for some time.

The Viceroy of the two Kuang, whose assassination has just been reported, is said to have stated, in his last memorial to the Throne, that the two merchants arrested by his orders in Canton had declared their intention of proceeding to Formosa and becoming naturalized Japanese subjects, rather than submit to the taxes imposed in their own country. The Viceroy did not consider that such language could be condoned in the mouths of Chinese merchants of standing, and therefore he ordered the arrest.

There is no further news about the assassination. The late Viceroy is described as having been a man of quick resolve and firm purpose, with few equals in China. It is surprising that some details of his death are not telegraphed, and pending their receipt it is perhaps permissible to hope that the whole story is groundless.

Monday, February 5.

A telegram to the Asahi Shimbun from Peking says that the Commercial Bureau of the Chinese Board of Agriculture and Commerce has again issued an injunction to all the leading men in the various localities, urging them to estimate and apply for whatever railway and mining concessions offer any prospects of successful exploitation, so as to anticipate foreign applicants and thus promote the policy of recovering Chinese rights for China. This is said to be the second instruction of the kind which has emanated from the same quarter. The first was issued last October. In view of the mood now prevailing in China, it is not wonderful that Baron Komura failed to obtain concessions for the Hsinmintun-Mukden and Kirin-Chiangchun roads. Rather it is wonderful that he obtained the Antung-Mukden concession.

It appears, so far as we can judge, that the alleged murder of the Viceroy of the two Kuang was a false report. We ventured to doubt its truth in view of the absence of all subsequent reference, and our doubt is now confirmed by the absolute silence of all sources of information. The latest allusion to His Excellency is that the Peking Government has declined to sanction his proposal for borrowing ten million taels, which money was to be applied to "new enterprises"—presumably the Yeh-Han railway. Peking thinks that there would be difficulty in returning the principal and that the danger of such loans ought to be very patent to Viceroy Tsen.

It is stated that among the Chinese Government's demands handed in to Mr. Pokotiloff, there is one for a sum of 5 million taels to compensate Chinese shareholders in the East Chinese Railway which Russia has transferred to Japan.

There was recently circulated a rumour that the Russian Government had acceded to a demand for five million taels by way of compensation for losses of Chinese life and property in the Vladivostock riots, and had agreed that the money should be deducted from the sum still due from China on account of the Boxer indemnity. But this statement is now contradicted. It would seem, on the contrary, that Russia is disputing the claim, for Viceroy Xuan is reported to be arranging for an appeal to the international tribunal at the Hague.

Prince Sü is said to be about to visit Kulong for the purpose of conducting various investigations connected with the gradual pressure of Russia's advance on that quarter.

Wednesday, February 7.

The Chinese in Canton have held a meeting at which subscriptions for the building of the Yeh-Han Railway are said to have been put up to the extent of three million taels. Leaders of this movement are entirely opposed to the Viceroy's plan for building with the proceeds of taxation. They want to have the enterprise made a joint-stock affair, which certainly seems a much more natural process. Meanwhile we hear nothing more of the alleged assassination of the Viceroy, and it is impossible any longer to avoid the inference that the statement was a mere canard.

An anti-missionary outrage is reported from Canton. A missionary and his wife, whose name in transliterated form reads "Beatie," were bound hand and foot and their residence was looted.

Thursday, February 8.

Nothing seems to be settled about the formal commencement of the Russo-Chinese negotiations. The Plenipotentiaries have not exposed their credentials and the place of conference has not been fixed. Rumour merely indicates that, as already shown, Russia does not regard this conference merely as a necessary outcome of the Portsmouth Treaty and has no intention of limiting herself to the indications contained in that document. She will, on the contrary, seize the occasion to recoup some of her losses.

There is a report that Prince Sü is about to visit Russia for the purpose of conducting some negotiations about Mongolia.

FORMOSA.

In the Sub-Committee entrusted with the work of examining the estimates for Formosa, Dr. Goto Shimpei, Chief of the Civil Administration, made some interesting statements on the 2nd instant. He said that eminent success was attending the Government's measures and that no change of policy had been found necessary, unless, indeed, an increase of educational facilities might be classed as such. It was deemed desirable to extend education as widely as possible, and to instruct the natives in the use of the Japanese language. The finances of the island were full of promise, but it was to be noted that the main sources of revenue increment were the four State monopolies, camphor, opium, salt and tobacco. Consequently the Authorities proposed to devote further capital to the development of these industries, and it was anticipated that by such means the revenue, now standing at 25 million yen, might easily be raised to 30 millions. As to the question put by a member of the Committee, namely, whether, when its income increased sufficiently, Formosa would pay the expenses of its own garrison troops, Dr. Goto said that he could not speak with authority but if he might be allowed to express his own personal views he would say that the garrison of Formosa served two purposes, one was the defence of the Empire, the other, the preservation of good order in Formosa itself. So far as the former object was concerned, it seemed just, and it certainly was in accordance with the colonial systems of all Occidental Powers, that the State should bear the cost of maintaining a garrison, in so far, at least, as such cost did not exceed what would be required for the support of the same force at home. Anything over and above the latter figure, namely, any outlay demanded by special circumstances existing in the island, should be defrayed from the Formosan exchequer. Concerning Formosa's trade with foreign countries and with Japan, the figures stood thus:

	1900. Yen.	1904. Yen.
Trade with Foreign Countries.....	19,590,000	25,230,000
Trade with Japan.....	5,830,000	25,900,000

Formosa might be roughly divided into two sections: one, covering some two-fifths of its area was populated by about 3 million civilized Chinese; the other, covering the remaining three-fifths, was peopled by a hundred thousand savage folk, according to statistics, but probably the exact number did not exceed fifty or sixty thousand. These savages were divided into 20 tribes, whose languages were mutually unintelligible. Another division of the savage region might be made into north and south, the inhabitants of the north being much more obstinate and fierce than those of the south. To employ troops against these people was found to be bad policy. The best plan was a system of local police, who were disposed along a line some 500 miles in extent. This line was gradually pushed forward, and its steady advance, being regarded by the natives as an encroachment upon their domain, provoked more or less resistance. Persuasion and force were both employed, but the success had not been altogether such as could be hoped, though ultimately the lines would be drawn closer and closer. Simultaneously most strict measures had been adopted to prevent secret trade with these savages, and they had thus been deprived of supplies of arms, ammunition and salt. The railway was another instrument of civilization so that, altogether, success might finally be looked for.

THE EXTRAORDINARY WAR EXPENSES.

The Government has placed in the hands of the members of the Diet an explicit statement of the purposes to which the extraordinary war outlays of 450,450,000 yen are to be devoted. These outlays are embodied in a supplementary budget now in the hands of the Lower House. The figures are:—

WAR DEPARTMENT.		Yen.
Maintenance and repatriation of the Troops.....	197,982,075
Expenses of railway building, etc., in Manchuria.....	5,697,332
Expenses of railway building, etc., in Korea.....	21,106,211
Maintenance of Japanese Prisoners in Russian hands.....	361,952
Maintenance of Russian Prisoners in Japanese hands.....	5,477,648
Special Rewards and Decorations.....	22,600,393
Barracks and initial Equipment in Manchuria.....	18,452,090
Building of Warehouses.....	5,000,000
Buoys in Tairen Bay, constructing offices, etc., for the Kwantung Civil Administration, etc.....	948,420
Building offices, etc., for the Civil Administration in Saghalien and investigating the Island's resources.....	200,000

SUBSIDIES FOR NAVIGATION.

The question of subsidies to steamship companies was brought up on the 2nd instant in a meeting of one of the Budget sub-committees. Being asked by a member of committee whether the time had not come to abolish the subsidy for the Australian line, the Government Delegate replied in the negative. He pointed out that the steamers on this route having for main purpose the carriage of passengers and mails, it was necessary that they should be ships of the highest grade, which meant increased expenditure. Thus the earnings and expenses on the Australian service had been as follow:—

	Earnings.	Expenses.
	yen.	yen.
From Oct. 1900 to Sept. 1901 ...	990,000	1,530,000
From Oct. 1901 to Sept. 1902 ...	990,000	1,680,000
From Oct. 1902 to Sept. 1903 ...	870,000	1,600,000

The service was temporarily suspended owing to the war, and that it would have to be permanently suspended unless State aid were given is evident from the above figures. Hitherto the subsidy allowed by the Treasury has been 510,000 yen annually, but this is now to be reduced to 470,000 yen and renewed for a period of 5 years. The Delegate explained that the Government of course intended to cease subsidizing any line which could be run successfully without such assistance. For that reason no more aid is to be given to the Bombay steamers. He also stated that it had been decided to increase the services to North China and to Shanghai, and to open new services to Tairen and Korsakoff. The Government further contemplates subsidizing lines to the South Seas and to South America, but these are to be things of the future. The subsidy to the Korsakoff service is to be 25,000 yen yearly and that to the Tairen service 150,000 yen, and both sums will be paid out of the Extraordinary Expenditures.

The movement in opposition to maritime subsidies has assumed definite shape. It is headed by Mr. Omitani and Mr. Shimada Saburo and with them are some 60 members of the Lower House. They call themselves the Kaiji Kenkyu-kai (Maritime Investigation Society) and they propose to introduce in the House a Representation urging the following:—

- Total abolition of the Australian Service Subsidy.
- Reduction of the Yangtze Subsidy by one half.
- Reduction of the European Subsidy by 20 per cent.
- Abolition of the Subsidy for calling at special ports.
- Total abolition of the San Francisco Subsidy.
- Reduction of the Eastern Sea Lines' Subsidies by 60 per cent.

The total saving thus effected would be 2,530,000 yen, a not inconsiderable item in the Budget. There has been a feeling for some years among certain Japanese that the State should draw in its horns in the matter of encouraging navigation, but hitherto the bulk of public opinion has been against any such retrenchment, and it does not by any means follow that because Messrs. Shimada and Omitani have found a measure of support in the Lower House, they will be able to affect the voting for these subsidies when the Budget comes up for discussion. The Law for Encouraging Navigation and Shipbuilding was an outcome of political and economic considerations. If Japan is ever to be really great it must be by emerging from her insular condition. In that respect she clearly resembles England. Had the English been a stay-at-home people; had they waited for foreigners to develop communications and transport facilities between the British Isles and the other countries of the world, they would not now be even free, to say nothing of being powerful. The factor that has contributed most to England's growth has been maritime enterprise, and unless the same factor can be enlisted in the cause of Japan's development, she will always be stunted and comparatively insignificant. That is the economic side of the question. The political side is that no use exists for Japan's armies unless she can transport them over-sea. Perfectly clearly was that fact appreciated by the framers of the post-bellum programme of 1896. They were not without experience. The organization of the Kyodo Unyu Kaisha (United Transport Company) 13 years previously, had been necessitated by the discovery that, with the small fleet of transports then at her disposal, Japan could not venture to assert herself even in Korea. The statesmen of 1896 saw plainly that to build up a powerful army without means of carrying it to the place of action and maintaining it there would be a totally objectless performance. So, simultaneously with their scheme of military increment, they asked the Diet to sanction a measure for encouraging navigation and ship-building, and the Diet consented. The results are before our eyes. Suppose that the growth of Japan's mercantile marine had not proceeded faster after 1896 than it had done prior to that date, what could the empire have attempted in the hour of crisis two years ago when Russia was about to consummate the swallowing of Manchuria and to win a permanent footing in Korea? Yet even before the transports, which were not less essential to the country's successes than were the Army and the Navy—even before these transports have carried back the whole of the troops from Manchuria, we have Mr. Shimada Saburo and his sixty fellow-thinkers agitating in favour of measures which would surely prove a heavy set-back to the growth of the mercantile marine. These gentlemen would cut down by some 30 per cent. at a stroke the subsidies paid under the present laws, and would continue the operation of retrenchment with equally ruthless heroism. It is perhaps useful that the public should be stirred to reflect upon these things, and we sincerely trust that, in the interests of the Empire, propositions like those of Mr. Shimada and his colleagues will not gain favour.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK.

At a meeting of the Special Committee appointed to examine the Bill for amending the Law of the Industrial Bank, Mr. Sakatani explained that the project of increasing the Bank's capital from 10 millions to 17½ millions had for main object the introduction of foreign funds. This had been one of the principal purposes of the Bank's establishment, and the need of foreign capital was now much felt. The face-value of the Bank's shares was to be reduced to 50 yen and a hundred and fifty thousand new shares were to be issued to capitalists abroad.

Mr. Hadano remarked that the new shares were not to be registered and in that event they would take the ultimate form of a loan of 7½ millions rather than of bank capital. He asked also why the face value of the shares was to be altered.

Mr. Sakatani said that the transaction might bear the aspect of a loan if regarded merely from the point of view of the paying in of the money, but since the subscribers would themselves become shareholders no such apprehension need be felt. As to the denomination of the shares, it was a matter of convenience. In answer to a question whether the Treasury's obligation as to interest would not be extended by this transaction, Mr. Sakatani said that the Bank was now paying 6 per cent., and over, and since there was no reason to apprehend that it would be less prosperous in the future, this query about an interest guarantee did not seem to have any importance.

Mr. Masumoto observed that the 50 yen shares of the Industrial Bank were now quoted at from 70 to 80 yen in the open market. Had the 150,000 shares spoken of above been handed to their foreign subscribers at par, and, if so, was such a bait necessary in order to attract foreign capitalists? Again, while granting that the introduction of foreign capital was essential, it must be equally granted that the method of introduction demanded great care. It appeared to result from the plan under consideration that capital could not be obtained through the medium of the Industrial Bank at a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent., whereas it could probably be borrowed more cheaply in the open foreign market. In the third place, when foreign money was obtained by the ordinary process of loan, the lenders were not invested with any power to interfere in the internal affairs of the borrowing company, whereas if the money was obtained by the medium of shares, the foreign shareholders acquired a voice in the control of the company's affairs.

Mr. Sakatani replied, first, that the Industrial Bank's shares seemed to have risen in market value owing to this project for increasing its capital. In the second place there was no instance of new shares being issued at a premium. The Tokyo Gas Company had attempted this last year and had failed. Nothing offered except to issue at face value. Thirdly, the time seemed to call for measures which would bring foreigners into close touch with Japanese business, would make them take an interest in its development and would associate them in the task. As to their undue interference, the Government had full power to check anything of that kind.

Mr. Matsumoto insisted on his point as to the impropriety of handing to foreigners at par a great block of shares which stood at a high premium in the market. The invariable course in such cases was to consult the present shareholders and to give them an opportunity of taking up the shares or a part of them. Would it not have been much better and fairer for the Bank to issue debentures endorsed by the Government?

Mr. Sakatani said that the method of endorsed debentures did not commend itself. It had been tried under unavoidable circumstances in the case of the Seoul-Fusan Railway. As to the present shareholders not having been consulted, there could be little doubt that they would have consented.

Mr. Mizumachi, Government Delegate, supplemented Mr. Sakatani's statement. He said that when the project of selling these 150,000 shares to foreigners came upon the tapis, the 25 yen paid up shares were selling at about 30 yen in the market. There had been reluctance to allow this profit to go to the new shareholders but Mr. Takahashi, of the Bank of Japan, who was conducting the negotiations, had advised the concession, in consideration of equivalent concessions made by the foreign shareholders who had agreed that in the event of issuing debentures in London they, the foreign shareholders, would pay the stamp duties and would not ask for fees higher than one-half per cent. Moreover, the London shareholders had asked to be placed on the same footing as the Japanese in the matter of equal holding of shares, but had finally consented to leave the larger number in the hands of the Japanese.

Mr. Matsumoto asked whether, if the Government approved of placing foreigners and Japanese on the same footing, it would interfere in the event of foreigners coming to hold a majority of the shares.

Mr. Sakatani replied that if all the shares fell into foreign hands, the Government might buy back some of them, but there did not appear to be any such prospect. It was not the Government's policy to set up any distinction between foreigners and Japanese so far as concerned the holding of shares.

Mr. Hadano asked whether, in the event of foreigners being elected on the directorate, the Government would endorse the election.

Mr. Sakatani saw no objection to foreigners being elected among the directors.

MILITARY AND NAVAL SUB-COMMITTEE.

The Sub-committee of the Budget Committee charged with the Army and Navy Section, met on Sunday (4th) at 10.30 a.m. Mr. Tsunematsu Rinkei asked for information about the Russian ship—special transport—Ilits (7,507 tons) which had been sunk off Shimane Prefecture in the Battle of the Sea of Japan. The Government Delegate replied that the arms and money would be handed over to the Government and the ship to those salvaging her. An agreement had been made in that sense.

In answer to a question as to the increase of naval appropriations by 4,900,000 yen, the Delegate said that this included expenses on account of the first and second programme of naval increment as a matter of course, and also a sum of a million yen on account of the third-period increment.

Another piece of information elicited was that the present tonnage of the Japanese Navy is 260,000, but that it would be 400,000 next year. We presume that these figures refer to ships on the actually efficient list.

Asked why the outlays for the Navy had increased, Mr. Murakami, Chief of the Paymasters' Bureau, said that whereas meat had cost only 88.3 sen per kaname (8½ lbs.) when the war broke out, it now cost 2 yen, and the price of cloth had undergone appreciation owing to the consumption duty on woollen goods.

Admiral Saito, being asked about the defalcations charged against an officer connected with the duty of superintending the building of war-ships in England, said that the affair was profoundly regrettable. The culprit, a junior officer of the Paymasters' Department, by name Takenouchi Jujiro, had managed to embezzle a sum of 320,000 yen. The regulations on this subject were most strict, and though the Specie Bank might possibly have exercised more care, the criminal had proceeded by methods exceedingly difficult to provide against. He had fled and all efforts to apprehend him had failed thus far, but he had been sentenced to 11 years' imprisonment with hard labour. As for his superior officers, Chief Engineer Matsumoto and Commander Iwamoto, they had been severely censured. There had not been any other instance of defalcations during the war except a malversation of 20,000 yen in connexion with the defences of Chinghai-wan.

Asked about the Mikasa, whose loss had constituted the basis of many strange rumours, the Minister of War said that until the vessel was raised it would not be possible to ascertain with absolute certainty the cause of her loss. The Naval Authorities were quite confident of refloating her, and the probability was that the catastrophe would prove to have been due to some chemical action among the explosives, but this must remain unsettled for the present.

The Minister's answer, though it does not accurately define the ultimate cause of loss, disposes finally of the silly rumours that the ship was blown up by mutinous sailors.

Mr. Murakami, in answer to questions, said that as the Naval Authorities had found no use for balloons, they had handed over to the army the one obtained from England, as well as two others captured at Port Arthur. Concerning carrier-pigeons, it had been decided that no use existed for them in these days of wireless telegraphy.

Mr. Murakami, being asked whether all vessels for the Navy were to be hereafter built in Japan and whether the materials would have to be obtained from abroad, said that with the exception of brass tubes and supplementary engines everything could be furnished at home, and that it was proposed to build entirely in Japan. He called special attention to the fact that the materials for the first-class armoured cruiser Ibuki and the battle-ship Aki were entirely of domestic manufacture.

The Committee then went into secret session.

THE BUDGET COMMITTEE.

Answering questions in the Budget Committee, the Minister of Finance stated that, with regard to the extraordinary war taxes and their continuation, the Government purposed to introduce in the present session of the Diet the following Bills:—

- (1) Bill for amending the taxation of building lands.
- (2) " " Soy-tax Law.
- (3) " " Customs Rates.
- (4) " " Exchange-tax Law.

The second of these measures is connected with the salt monopoly. It involves the abandonment of the rebates hitherto allowed on salt intended for the manufacture of soy, but, on the other hand, the tax on soy is to be reduced. The object of amending the Law for the taxation of Exchanges is to remit the tax on dealings in public securities so as to facilitate such transactions.

These statements were made by Mr. Sakatani with reference to the problem of a general revision of the War Taxes, such revision being deemed necessary now that the taxes are to continue in operation. Readers of the reports hitherto published in these columns and of the doings of political parties are aware that while all sections of public opinion may be said to recognise the necessity of continuing the war taxes, there is also a general feeling that these taxes should be carefully revised, inasmuch as, having been hastily imposed in the face of an emergency, they can not be credited as the outcome of mature reflection. The political parties differ as to the time that should be allowed for this work of revision, but the Seiyun-kai and the Daido Club have agreed that they will vote for 2 years. Meanwhile the Ministry have seized the opportunity to make known that they also recognise the necessity of revision and that if they ask the Diet to sanction the continuation of the taxes in the present form, such a step is dictated by temporary necessity and is the prelude to careful investigation. The Minister of Finance has consequently declared that arrangements are already being made for organizing a strong revision committee, which shall include influential members of both Houses of the Diet. The Government recognises the advisability of altering or abolishing certain of the taxes, as the tax on woven goods, on communications, on business and on incomes, but there had not been time to effect carefully considered changes, and it is estimated that 2 years will be required for the work. Thus it will be seen that the Cabinet, on its side, is prepared to adopt the two-years' amendment proposed by the Seiyun-kai and the Daido Club.

On this occasion Mr. Sakatani was asked to indicate the expenditures which, though included under the heading of "extraordinary," possessed the nature of continuing expenditures. His answer was this:—

- (1)—The Amortization Fund of 110 millions annually.
- (2)—The pensions and annuities fund of 32 millions.
- (3)—The War Department's Appropriation of 10 millions on account of troops stationed abroad.
- (4)—The Naval Department's Appropriation of 4,270,000 yen.
- (5)—The expenditures on account of posts and telegraphs in Manchuria, Korea and Saghalien, namely, 1,720,000 yen.
- (6)—Cost of carrying out the Salt Monopoly and collecting taxes, namely, 14,510,000 yen.

These six items make a total of 172,600,000 yen.

This concluded the questions with regard to the Budget, and the committee then proceeded to debate the Amortization Fund. Speeches in opposition were delivered by Messrs. Asano Yokichi, Hadano Denzaburo and Shimada Saburo. Briefly summarized their argument was that so long as the country has to borrow money with one hand, the process of paying back debts with the other is irrational. Several members of the Seiyun-kai spoke in support, and finally a closed ballot was taken. It resulted in 18 votes for the measure and 13 against it. That is probably very nearly the ratio that will be shown when the Bill comes before the Lower House to-day. (We are writing on Thursday morning).

Then the Bill for continuing the War taxes was taken. Again Mr. Shimada Saburo opposed. He contended that whereas the Government called upon the nation to face its financial problems with a united front, no example in that sense was set by officialdom. They knew from statements made by the Government delegates that although this schedule of war taxes were abandoned at the originally fixed date, namely, December 1906, the deficit of revenue would be only 10 million yen—namely, the amount which would be collected during the last three months of the fiscal year (January, February and March) by continuing the taxes. Such a paltry deficit, if not covered by the usual excess of estimates over actual outlays, could easily be met by other devices, and he therefore considered that faith should be kept with the nation; namely, these taxes should be abolished, as originally promised, at the close of 1906, and other means of finding future revenue should be elaborated. Other modifications of the measure were proposed, but all were rejected, and the Committee decided to recommend the Bill for adoption. It will thus be seen that all the crucial questions of finance may be said to have been disposed of, the Extraordinary War outlays also having been voted by both Houses as shown in our issue of the 7th inst.

MARQUIS ITO ON HIS KOREAN POLICY.

The reports of Marquis Ito's speech at the dinner given by His Excellency to the leading journalists of Tokyo are not at all as full as is desirable. The gist of what the distinguished statesman said, however, may be gathered pretty clearly:—

GENTLEMEN.—As I am starting soon for Korea I have invited you this evening for the purpose of laying before you a general statement of the hopes I entertain with regard to the affairs of that country and for the purpose of learning your views. On the 17th of last November the fundamental relations between this Empire and Korea were settled by treaty, but the provisions were very brief. They did not do more than fix foundations, leaving the superstructure of details and the consummation of purposes to depend upon the method of applying the covenant. For example, with regard to business arising out of discussions between the Foreign Consuls and the Korean Local Officials, it was arranged that our Residents should discharge it, but concerning the relations between the latter and the Local Officials the details of procedure have still to be enacted. Thus it must be settled that there shall devolve on the Korean Local Officials the duty of immediately carrying out, on receipt of a communication in that sense from our Residents, any business about which representation have been made by the Foreign Consuls, and again, in the event of the Local Officials failing or neglecting to discharge such duty, it must be decided that orders to discharge it forthwith shall be conveyed to them in the sequel of reports to the Emperor of Korea or of communications to the Korean Government. Among such matters there will be, on the one hand, some with regard to which the Japanese Government must approach foreign Governments by way of preliminary, and on the other hand, there will be some calling for the arrangement with the Korean Government of an accurate line of procedure. In the case of the former I hope that before I assume office they will have been disposed of, and in the case of the latter I hope to settle them myself after careful consultation with the Korean Government subsequently to my arrival in Seoul.

As for the reform of the Korean Administration, it will be the duty of the Government of this Empire to take it upon itself in accordance with the Protocol, but governmental corruption in Korea is of remote origin and to reform it in a day is no easy task. Of course to revise laws and thus effect superficial reforms is a matter presenting no difficulty, but such, I believe, is not by any means the way to achieve the object of administrative reform. What I hope with regard to this subject of Korean administrative reform is to give the matter the fullest thought and to accomplish it gradually so that the people of Korea shall be made simultaneously to reap its blessings.

"The poverty of the Koreans is a matter of universal knowledge, and if it be neglected and no means devised for relieving it, this empire will not only be violating its responsibility as protector of Korea, but will also itself have to suffer in the end.

"The Japanese Government has taken upon itself the burden of Korea's national defences and has accepted the duty of posting a certain force of troops in Korea. Looking at the expense of this alone, it is seen to be not inconsiderable. Further it would be by no means a wise arrangement that she should shoulder Korea's various expenditures which are destined to grow hereafter larger and larger and that they should be imposed on our people. Therefore it is essential that we should make the Koreans gradually increase their financial strength and should devise means for getting the people of Korea themselves to bear as far as possible the expenses of all Korean undertakings. With regard to contriving an increase of their financial strength the first thing to be considered is agricultural improvements. But in the domains of engineering and forestry also there are not a few matters calling for reform and organization pari passu with agriculture. I hope to investigate all these matters fully and to carry them out gradually.

"The population of our country shows a very rapid rate of increase, and it is natural that its increment should over-flow into Korea. Above all when the various enterprises in that country reach a stage of development it is quite evident that we shall witness a very great addition to the number of our people going there, as compared with to-day. But there has been much to censure in the conduct of our nationals hitherto in Korea. The greatest indignities have been put upon the Koreans and they have been obliged to suffer them with tears in their eyes. It is true that persons guilty of such conduct constitute only a small part of the Japanese residing in Korea, but now that this Empire has taken upon itself the protectorate of Korea this improper behaviour calls for the utmost correction; especially inasmuch as, since the beginning of the Meiji era many difficulties have been eliminated from the relations of the two countries and two great wars have taken place the practical results of which are now for the first time displaying themselves. Yet because the conduct of our nationals towards the Koreans is not what it ought to be, they (the Koreans) pose abroad as sufferers and entertain the keenest dislike for us at home, with the very regrettable result that much injury is done to the relations of the two countries. I am persecuted that when our nationals go to Korea hereafter in increasing number, earnest steps must be taken to check this impropriety. It is needless to say that after I have assumed my duties, such of my nationals as are engaged in legitimate enterprises in Korea will be protected, but I propose to take ample measures for dealing with all malwants sujets.

"What I have now said conveys only the gist of the hopes I entertain. In realizing them there must of course be order and method, but I am resolved to follow on the whole the policy I have here indicated. At some of you, Gentlemen, must be well versed in Korean affairs, I trust that you will have no hesitation in expressing your views with regard to my intentions. I shall be most pleased to hear them, and if there be any reason to modify my policy I will not hesitate to do so."

The speech made by Marquis Ito on the 5th instant to the parliamentary members of the Seiyun-kai was as follows:—

"I am extremely gratified that you, gentlemen of the Seiyun-kai, remembering my old relations with you, have enabled me to meet you at this farewell party on the eve of my departure for Korea. It is still to me a source of great satisfaction to recall how you gentlemen formerly shared my political opinions, and how when, in spite of my very humble attainments and small abilities I acted as your leader in my capacity of President, you made every allowance for my incompetence and deferred to my views. I am also profoundly pleased that in conjunction with Marquis Saionji you are to apply yourselves to the post-bellum enterprises. My intercourse during many years with Marquis Saionji has been a source of gratitude to me. I have learned not a little from him, and being entirely at one with his political opinions, I am persuaded that with him assuming an important position as to the post-bellum enterprises and you, gentlemen, standing by his side and sharing his responsibility in great affairs of State, not only will the advantages of the people be furthered but also the security of the realm will owe much to your exertions. Concerning present day problems of the legislature, you are making them, I am persuaded, an object of the fullest study, and therefore there does not appear to be any need to refer to them here. But inasmuch as any error with respect to the post-bellum undertakings would not only sacrifice the good results of the war but also involve the State's future in peril, I earnestly hope that your attitude will be one of extreme circumspection.

I turn now to the Korean problem, which for the past thirty or forty years, has well nigh shaken the Far Eastern firmament. Japan's special geographical and political relations with the peninsula affected her relations with the Powers also and plunged her into two wars which cost her heavily. To-day at length we have succeeded in obtaining a formal solution of the problem but to solve it in practice still belongs to the future. This is the result of the sacrifices that Japan has made of life and treasure, and since, as I believe, it is a matter of serious import to the safety and independence of the Empire, I go to assume office in Korea with much trepidation and with full consciousness of my own inability. Nevertheless though I can not certainly count on attainment, seeing that in all things failure is more frequent than success I am resolved to labour to the utmost of my ability.

"From Japan's point of view we certainly have had a most painful experience with regard to Korea, yet from Korea's point of view she doubtless believes that she too has been subjected to great pressure and she certainly does not submit to us willingly. That she feels reluctant is because, when there is question of forfeiting independence, it is much the same by what country one is deprived of it. Hence if there be any to mislead her, she will at once break away from the Japanese bridle, and it follows that unless this country can win her sincere allegiance, we may again beget for ourselves all the old troubles. We must consequently make her understand that Japan's protection is not for the purpose of harming her independence; that if the Japanese extend protection to her it is because they are compelled to do so for the purpose of preserving their own independence, and that no injury of any kind is to be inflicted on her. Hence while I myself will approach the Korean problem with all sincerity of purpose, I shall not confine myself to words in dealing with the pitiable condition of the people, but whether in matters of administration or of finance will give them practical proofs of sympathy.

"Thus since, as I have explained, Korea does not feel at all easy about our protectorate, it is to be hoped that you, gentlemen, will take care not to give cause of offence to the Koreans, but that by seeking to inspire them with sentiments of community of interests, in other words, to show them that we are fellow-passengers on the same boat, you will remove their feelings of doubt and umbrage. This is not merely my thought. It is what our fellow-countrymen universally hope and what our Sovereign desires. I take office with the firm resolve to carry out His Majesty's purpose, and therefore I pray that you also, gentlemen, will sympathise and take care that the lives of tens of thousands of our countrymen shall not have been sacrificed in vain.

"It is not with regard to Korea alone but with regard to the whole problem of the Far East that nothing opposed to the sentiment of the Powers should be done. No strong country whatsoever can march forward independently and at its own arbitrary convenience. If Japan, puffed up by her victories in war, should forfeit the sympathy of the Powers, she will be laying up for herself misfortune in the future.

"A great political party may be said to represent the country, yet it can not be guaranteed against erring against the country's interests, and thus much more than common diligence must be brought to the discharge of political duties. Let not the State be sacrificed by seeking to please the people only. That is what I declare with all earnestness. I believe, further, that any change of the Government's present financial policy would be injurious to the State, and it has been a source of great comfort to me to learn that the attitude of the Seiyun-kai towards this matter is settled. I most strongly hope too, that you will go forward to the full realization of your aims.

"To-day's meeting is engraved upon my heart and will remain a perpetually agreeable memento which shall never fade from my mind."

UNEXPECTED RETURNS.

Several of the officers who were supposed to have perished with the Kinsu Maru when the Russians from Vladivostok sunk her off Gensan are understood to be now en route for Japan. They were in reality taken prisoners by the Russians, but owing to the latter's singular indifference about furnishing lists of the prisoners in their hands, it is only now known that these officers escaped. It will be remembered that on the occasion of the disaster Commander Mizoguchi, who held the position of naval superintendent on board the ill-fated steamer, went off to the Russian cruisers, apparently to seek terms of surrender. He did not return, having doubtless been detained by the Russians, but his whole procedure displeased his countrymen very much as compared with the conduct of the army officers who remained on the Kinsu Maru. These were reported to have committed suicide in the most approved manner of bushido, and a great controversy arose among philosophers as to whether the act had been a silly waste of life or an inevitable outcome of true military devotion. Another point much and most unfavourably commented on was the failure of the Russians to attempt to save the lives of the Japanese on board the transport. It would now seem that the controversy was somewhat unsubstantial and the comments exaggerated. Several of the officers, including even the sergeant-major whose suicide was so graphically described, are well and hale, and will soon be in Japan again. They must have been picked up by the Russians, a fact which absolves the latter from the imputation of wanton cruelty. The Nippon writes as though it were aggrieved by this unlooked for denouement. It seems to be of the same mind as Captain Kedjick who considered that Mark and Martin "did n't ought to have come back alive from Eden." But it appears to us that when officers have allowed the ship to sink under them rather than surrender, they have about done their duty to the canons of chivalry.

THE BUDGET AS IT NOW LIES BEFORE THE DIET.

It is now evident that the Budget for 1906-7 will not undergo any signal changes in its passage through the House of Representatives, and we therefore proceed to lay it before our readers so far as its main features are concerned:—

KOREA.

The boundary question in Hamyongdo threatens to become very troublesome. It relates to the islands in the Yalu and the Tumen, which are of great extent—a Japanese expert recently estimated their area as equal to that of Kyushu—and which have a Korean population of some seven hundred thousand. These folks are now in league with the Il Chin-hoi. They are determined, it is said, to establish a republic on their own account if they can not obtain public recognition as Korean subjects and be taken under Korean protection.

The ceremony of opening the Residency General in Seoul in the 1st instant seems to have been very simple. It consisted of a few brief remarks from General Hasegawa, Mr. Hayashif and Mr. Tsuruhara, the drink of a glass of champagne—that inevitable companion of all festivities—and the giving of cheers for the Mikado. Much more important is the news—if it be trustworthy—that in Korean official circles the establishment of the Residency General is now regarded, not with passive indifference, but with genuine confidence as the beginning of an era of reform and prosperity. The telegrams state that a conference of the Cabinet Ministers has been held had they have adopted a resolution to lend all possible aid to the programme of progress.

The seven men, including the Vice-Minister of the Household and the Chief of Police, who were arrested on a charge of plotting violence and conspiring assassination in connexion with the November Convention, have been released from custody after taking oath to refrain hereafter from such practices.

An Imperial Ordinance (No. 14 of 1906) has been issued fixing the uniforms of the officials connected with the Residency-General in Korea. Another Ordinance (No. 15) directs that there shall be a naval and a military officer attached to the Residency. They may be of rank as high as Rear-Admiral and Major-General, respectively, but they must not be of lower rank than Major, and they are to discharge their duties under orders of the Residency-General. As to their salaries, if they are of the rank of Rear-Admiral or Major-General they are to have 3,500 yen annually, and if of lower rank 3,000 yen.

Taxation troubles are reported from Chihungchihong-do. Circulars have been distributed pretexting the debased coinage, the bad crops and the dullness of trade as reasons for not paying, but these documents appear to have something of a revolutionary character and steps are being taken to apprehend their disseminators.

Major-General Murata has been relieved of his duties at the Head Quarter Staff and has been attached to the Residency-General in Korea. Captain Miyaoka Naaki, of the Imperial Navy, has also been attached to the Residency-General.

Marquis Ito left Tokyo on the 7th instant by the 2.10 p.m. train. His Excellency had a brilliant send-off, nearly all the magnates in the capital assembling at the station to bid him farewell. He will remain at Oiso for a few days, and will probably leave for Korea on the 15th or 16th. He is to proceed to Fusan from Shimonoseki by the cruiser Izumi.

The Emperor of Japan has conferred on Mr. McLeavy Brown the First-class Order of the Sacred Treasure. The same Order has been conferred on Lt.-General Daniloff.

PROPOSED REDUCTIONS OF THE BUDGET.

In the Budget for 1906-7, a large section of the extraordinary expenditures appear under the heading of the Finance Department, and among the subdivisions of these outlays the following appear:—

War Department 45 million yen; namely 10 millions for the maintenance of 4 Divisions of troops to be posted in Manchuria and Korea; 10 millions for the initial outlays on account of these troops, and 25 millions for restorations of material expended during the war. Secondly, Naval Department, 27,324,368 yen; namely, 2,309,275 yen on account of Port Arthur, 15,093 yen for compiling the history of the Russo-Japanese War, and 25 million yen for restorations of material. The Budget Committee decided to ask the Government to reduce these outlays by 5 million yen, and to apply the money thus saved to productive enterprises. This matter came up for consideration in the Committee meeting on the 7th instant, and when the Government's views were sought, General Terauchi said that the utmost economy had already been exercised in compiling the estimates. He did not however deny that it might be possible to effect a saving on the outlays for restoration of material, and while declining to pledge himself, he promised that no effort should be spared in that sense, with the proviso that in case of unavoidable necessity due allowance should be made. Admiral Saito spoke in a similar sense, and the Budget Committee then intimated that they would not attempt to prescribe the nature of the economies to be exercised, but would leave that matter entirely in the hands of the Departments concerned, recording their wish, however, that the money saved should be devoted to productive enterprises.

THE NEW SILK LAW.

It is thought that this Bill will be withdrawn. Strong opposition to it has been developed among the Seiyu-kai, and the probability now is that the Special Committee charged with the duty of examining and reporting on the measure will advise its withdrawal. That would certainly be the wisest course, we venture to think. The explanation offered by the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce did not carry conviction. His Excellency intimated that no intention existed of enforcing inspection, and the idea was to be guided by applications from parties to a transaction. But the Bill distinctly provides power to make inspection compulsory. The contemplated practice, therefore, would convert the new law into a superfluity. No one doubts that the Government aims solely at encouraging the development of sericulture, and therefore, so soon as those connected with the trade are found arrayed against a measure as likely to defeat that object, the best plan is to abandon the project.

Following is the official reply to the foreign silk merchants' protest against the proposed new silk law, together with the protestants' rejoinder:—

Tokyo, 1st February, 1906.

H. ABEGG, Esq.

Chairman, Yokohama Foreign Dealers Guild for Raw and Waste Silk.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your esteemed letter referring to the new regulations for the Inspection of Raw Silk which the Government has placed before the Diet, I have been fully informed this morning by the Director of the Agricultural Department, of the facts contained in your letter.

It is not my opinion to forcibly enforce the inspection of Raw Silk, but it is to be left to the desire of parties concerned and consequently will not interfere or change any of the trade customs hitherto observed. It is with extreme regret that I hear that there are persons who misinterpret the meaning of the new regulations.

The silk trade of Japan has been showing a steady progress every year and it is my wish to further this progress. The new regulations were framed in order to stop any export of inferior silks which are sometimes fraudulently sold as superior goods and consequently damage the reputation of the Japanese Silk. In order to check this it has been decided to frame the regulations leaving to the Minister concerned the right to order an inspection of all silk intended for export.

I also hear that you have no special objection to the changing of certain fees for any inspection in future.

K. MATSUOKA.

Minister for Agriculture and Commerce.

THE ASSOCIATION OF FOREIGN RAW AND WASTE SILK MERCHANTS OF YOKOHAMA.

Yokohama, 2nd Feb., 1906.

YOUR EXCELLENCY,

I beg respectfully to acknowledge receipt of your Excellency's favour (No. 830) of yesterday's date and herewith beg to thank Your Excellency for the explanation therein contained.

My Association, however, consider this explanation merely as an interpretation of the Bill as framed and cannot find any assurance of its withdrawal or of modification of any of its objectionable clauses.

A very great feeling of uneasiness is entertained by my Association as regards that part of the Bill, which, if enforced, would make it possible for the Authorities to command compulsory examination of all Raw Silks to be exported from Japan.

Should the Bill become Law as now framed the effect thereof would be such a modification of prices paid to the Reelers as would cover any additional expenses enforced by the Law.

This again would undoubtedly be an embargo placed on the Export of Raw Silks and similar in effects to the levying of an Export Duty which, in no time, would have a detrimental effect on this Country's first and foremost industry.

In finally submitting the views of my Association to Your Excellency I beg to enclose a resolution just received from Lyons, referring to the suggestions made by the Silk Association of America, which my Association think, are of great importance as showing the ideas of French Silk Merchants.

My Association beg once more to endorse in full their opinions as expressed in my communication of the 31st of January, 1906.

(Signed)

H. ABEGG.

To His Excellency

MATSUOKA KOKI,

Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, Tokyo.

The raw silk manufacturers of Gumma and Nagano prefectures have decided to oppose the proposed law regarding silk conditioning. They hold the opinion that the law will injure and impede their business. Messrs. K. Haneda and T. Katakura, representatives of the Nagano manufacturers, recently arrived in Tokyo to lay their views before the Ministers concerned and also to present copies of their statement to the members of both Houses.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Hochi Shinbun says that Admiral Togo will attend the great Military and Naval Celebration which is planned to take place in the United States next April or May. The Admiral will go in command of two first-class armoured cruisers, and after the celebration he will make a trip to Europe, but whether the cruisers will accompany him it is not stated. We read in the same journal that the Admiral took the occasion of Mr. Griscom's return to Washington to send a present of a pistol to the President, and that a very cordial letter of thanks has reached him from Mr. Roosevelt.

His Imperial Highness Prince Kanin, Lieut.-General, has been appointed to the command of the First Division vice Lieut.-General Iida, who is placed on the Reserve List.

A number of Russian officers have arrived at Nagasaki by the Volunteer Fleet steamer Tamboff. They are said to have made their escape via Vladivostok but that version may be altogether erroneous. The names given are Lt. General Baron Semianoff, Commander of the Siberian Army Corps, Captain Somonakoff of the Staff; Colonels Ritschelm, Kaminsky and Ardormann, and Commander Prott of the Navy. General Semianoff is wounded and will go into hospital in Japan.

It is announced that the following changes are made:—

Admiral Samejima is transferred from the command at Saseho to the Retired List and Vice-Admiral Arima succeeds him at Saseho.

Admiral Shibayama is transferred from the command at Port Arthur to the Retired List and Vice-Admiral Misu, now in charge of the Bureau of Naval Education, goes to Port Arthur.

Vice-Admiral Yamanouchi, now in charge of the Arsenal at Kure, becomes Port Admiral there.

It has been decided that Tokyo will hold its second great festival of welcome to the returning troops on the 16th instant. The principal military figures will be Field-Marshal Nozu, Generals Oku, Nogi and Kawamura, with about 1,500 or 1,600 officers. It goes without saying that all the notables of Tokyo will be invited. The men are not to march from Hibiya to Ueno as they did on the last occasion but from Ueno to Hibiya, which seems a much better arrangement.

This is the amende honorable made by the Shanghai correspondent of The Times:—

Shanghai, December 24.

The Japanese Consul-General denies that any of the Japanese here sympathized with the rioters. He explains that the eye-witnesses who reported instances of Japanese fraternizing with the crowd were probably misled by their inability to distinguish between Japanese and queueless Chinese students wearing European dress. I gladly transmit this explanation. Last my reference on the 18th instant to injudicious advice to the Chinese possibly given by certain Japanese should be misunderstood, I would state that the majority of the Mikado's subjects undoubtedly deprecate the Chinese anti-foreign movement and loyally co-operate with us, as has been proved by the keenness of their company of the Shanghai Volunteers. At the same time it is inevitable that this country should, since the war, have attracted a certain number of the same class of Japanese as that which has admittedly prejudiced the administration of Korea. The irresponsible activities of this class are particularly undesirable in China, where Japan's paramount influence necessarily entails corresponding responsibilities.

The affair of Baron Suyematsu's treatment on board a German mail steamer appears likely to afford some curious developments. Two statements are published by the Tokyo press. One purports to have been made by the officers of a British steamer—the Baralong—which has just reached Nagasaki. They say that Professor Takakusu, the well known pupil of Max Müller, and Captain Kaburagi, who is bringing to Japan the effigy of Nelson, joined the German steamer at Southampton and were put in the very lowest places at table. They said nothing, expecting that when Baron Suyematsu came on board at Naples (? Genoa) this want of courtesy would be remedied. But it was not. On the contrary, the Baron himself was relegated to the same position as were certain Chinese and Malay passengers. The other statement comes from Baron Suyematsu himself through the medium of the Jiji Shimpō's Shanghai correspondent, who interviewed the Baron. The latter is represented as confirming the above account of the treatment given to Captain Kaburagi and Professor Takakusu, and as adding that he himself and his party were similarly banished to the lowest places, all his hints to the Captain having been disregarded. Another allegation attributed to the Baron is that at the various ports of call the captain of the steamer spread misleading reports about this matter. We reproduce these statements as they have now obtained wide currency. No hint is given of the assertion which Baron Suyematsu is alleged to have made, withdrawing his complaints and acknowledging them to have been groundless. Thus the affair has assumed a very inexplicable complexion, and the sooner the German company takes steps to make the truth known, the better.

The handing over of the Russian prisoners is now nearly concluded. From all places except three the repatriation has been completely effected, Nagasaki's contingent having been shipped on the 6th instant. Those three places are:—

Officers. Rank & File.

Nagoya .....	75	45
Hamadera (Osaka) .....	11	7,213
Matsuyama (Shikoku) .....	7	31

It is expected that the last of the Osaka batch will have embarked by the 15th instant, and Japan will then be in a position to present her bill to Russia. In a list of expenses published in our last it was shown that the expenses to be defrayed by Japan on account of her prisoners in Russia were 361,952 yen, which sum has to be deducted from the Russian liabilities.

Prince Arthur of Connaught is to leave Hongkong on the 12th and arrive in Yokohama on the 19th. He will proceed at once to the Palace at Kasumigaseki which has been prepared to receive him. On the 20th the ceremony of presenting the Garter will take place, and on the 21st the Emperor will visit the Prince at the Kasumigaseki Palace. According to present appearances the fact of the British Court being in mourning will not affect the celebrations in connexion with the Prince's coming. It is stated that Admiral Noel will again visit Japan, coming by the Diadem which is to carry the Prince and his suite.

Professor Haraguchi, one of the most celebrated of Japanese civil engineers, is said to have been engaged by the Chinese Government for purposes of railway construction at a salary of twelve thousand dollars yearly, and with the proviso that all materials for Chinese railways shall be purchased through Japan. This statement is made on the authority of the Kohmin Shimbun. Professor Haraguchi is the designer of most of the big bridges in Tokyo.

It is stated that the whole of this year will be required for transporting the Russian forces in Manchuria to the home country. One may justly doubt, however, whether the work will be completed by that time. All reports hitherto received have indicated that Russia would be much perplexed to accomplish this task within the period of 18 months fixed by the Portsmouth Convention. As for General Linevitch himself, it is alleged that he will return to Russia in March and will then be appointed Minister of War. Rumour also alleges that a number of his staff officers will visit Japan in the spring or the summer. If they come they can count on receiving a hearty welcome from the Japanese.

Japanese journals publish a statement that the Russian Government has instituted criminal proceedings against General Dessino and Mr. Pavlov on a charge of making away with public money. One of the counts is said to relate to a sum of no less than 7 millions of marks which arise out of a shipping transaction. After the fall of Port Arthur eight thousand Russians had to be repatriated. General Dessino and M.

Pablov arranged with a German Steamship Company to carry the men for 300 marks a head, but charged the Russian Government a thousand marks, pouching the difference, namely, seven millions. Again and on a still larger scale, they contracted for the carriage to Odessa of 40,000 prisoners at 250 marks each, and they repeated the official figure of 1,000 marks, thus clearing a sum of 30 millions. There are other details given but these suffice, for truly it is quite impossible to believe that such reckless frauds were attempted on a scale so huge as to render detection virtually certain. Rumour has evidently been very busy.

The Government has organized a Committee called the Manshu Keiei Jinkai, whose function will be to investigate everything connected with enterprises in Manchuria. The Committee consists of:—

General Baron Kodama, President.
Major-General Ishimoto, Vice Minister of War.
Mr. Anekoji, Vice Minister of Communications.
Mr. Chinda, Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs.
Mr. Wakatsuki, Vice Minister of Finance.
Mr. Yamaza, Chief of the Political Bureau in the Foreign Office.
Mr. Arai, Chief of the Accounts Bureau of the Finance Department.

THE IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10 a.m. on the 5th instant, and having disposed of applications for leave, proceeded to consider the following measures:—

- (1) Bill for rescinding Law No. 3 of the year 1898. (Vide Proceedings of House of Representatives, Japan Mail of January 26th.)
- (2) Bill relating to the Payment of Extraordinary War Expenses. (Vide Proceedings of House of Representatives, Japan Mail of January 26th.)
- (3) Bill for amending the Civil Code in the sense of erasing Art 10, the reason being that the land-adjustment operations in Okinawa Prefecture having been concluded, it was necessary to apply in that region the provisions of the Civil Code relating to rights of real estate.

The first of the above measures was entrusted to a special committee, after some explanations had been offered by Mr. Sakatani.

With regard to the second Bill, the Minister of Finance offered the same explanation as that given by him in the Lower House, and mentioned that the expenses of prisoners handed over by Russia were included.

Baron Ozaki inquired about the sum that was to be received from Russia on account of prisoners, but the Minister said that as the process of handing them over had not been completed, he could not make any definite statement.

Mr. Kojima Iken and Baron Date asked the Minister of State for War how many years would be required to restore the Army to its normal condition? General Terauchi answered that he could not yet say certainly, but all possible expedition would be employed. The matter would be communicated to the House in writing at the earliest convenient date. The Bill was then handed to a special committee of 15.

With regard to the third Bill, Mr. Matsuda, Minister of State for Justice, explained that Okinawa Prefecture had now to be placed on the same footing as the rest of the Empire. The Bill was entrusted to a special committee and the House rose at 10.30 a.m.

The House met at 10.05 a.m. on the 7th instant, the Order of the Day being:—

- (1) Applications for leave of absence.
- (2) Bill for abolishing Law No. 3 of 1898 (vide Japan Mail of 6th instant.)
- (3) Bill relating to the Payment of Extraordinary War Expenses (vide Japan Mail of 6th instant.)
- (4) Bill for amending a portion of the Code of Civil Procedure (vide Japan Mail of 6th instant.)

Before the House proceeded to the Order of the Day, Viscount Tani presented a question with regard to the University Affair. He spoke for over one hour. The question related to the complication which commenced with the placing of Professor Tomizu's name on the retired list, which event was followed by the resignation of President Yamakawa, then by the resignations of several of the Faculty and finally by the presentation of a protest on the part of 190 Professors and Teachers. The purport of the protest had been published and much excitement had ensued. The Viscount claimed that the Imperial University is a branch of the Department of Education, that it is in no sense independent and that the members of its Faculty are in fact officials. If the above conduct was not a violation of official discipline, what was it. How did the Government propose to deal with it? Viscount Tani made a vehement attack upon one of the Government Delegates in the Lower House, whom he accused of having attempted to set aside this matter by alleging that the document in question was not a protest but a statement of facts and a plea for redress. If such methods were adopted, then the history on which the Professors of the University were engaged would be a wholly untrustworthy compilation. There was no greater crime than to insert falsehoods in printed books. The protest could not be set aside in that manner. It must be regarded as a distinct breach of discipline the authors of which deserved to be punished as officials.

The first item on the Order was agreed to without comment. The second was passed unopposed after it had been favourably reported by the special committee.

As to the third item, Viscount Tani, in his capacity of Chairman of Committee, reported favourably but with reservations as to the practical impossibility of fully scrutinizing such a measure. The House then passed the Bill without taking the reading separately. The Government's programme for an expenditure of over 400 millions on account of extraordinary war expenses obtained the consent of both Houses.

The 4th Bill was passed unopposed and the House rose at 11.30 a.m.

On Wednesday, February 7th, in a special committee of the House of Representatives the bill for amending the law of the Industrial Bank was adopted and sent to the Upper House.

In the Petitions Committee the question of abolishing the Tokyo Chief of Municipal Police came up for discussion. The Progressists members and the Seiko Club, numbering 13 in all, voted in favour of the petition, but the Seiyu-kai and the Daido Club, numbering 22, voted against it, and it was therefore rejected.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.05 p.m., the Order of the Day being:—

1. A Government Bill providing that the accounts of all extraordinary expenditures for the Army and Navy should be wound up by the 30th of November 1906, and that any works, operations, buildings or restorations not completed by that time should be included thereafter in the general accounts.

2. A Government Bill for amending a portion of the Law of Works Accounts, in the sense of placing the Naval Collieries in a special account with a working capital of 100,000 yen.

3. Second Reading of the Amortization Bill.

4. Second Reading of the Bill for continuing the War Taxes.

5. Second Reading of the Bill for amending the Law of the Industrial Bank.

6. Second Reading of the Bill for amending the Railway Construction Law. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th.)

7. Second Reading of the Bill relating to Expenses of Experiments and Instruction in the matter of Productive Enterprises. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th.)

8. Second Reading of the Bill relating to Appropriations for the Maintenance Fund. (Vide Japan Mail January 26th.)

9. First Reading of the Private Bill for amending the Law of Finance. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th.)

10. Second Reading of Government Bill for amending Law No. 39 of 1902. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th, section of House of Peers.)

11. Private Bill (first reading) relating to changes of Juridical Limits, in the sense of altering the jurisdiction of the Nara Local Court to that of a District Court. Presented by Mr. Kubo Ichizo and others.

12. Representation relating to Maritime Subsidies. Presented by Mr. Omotani and others. (Vide Japan Mail of 7th inst.)

13. Representation relating to Development of National Resources. Presented by Mr. Tada Sakubei and others. The gist of this is that whereas many enterprises await prosecution in the interests of the nation's resources, and whereas a Representation in that sense was adopted by the Lower House last session, no legislative steps have yet been taken to give effect to it.

A great deal of time was occupied by speeches in explanation of questions.

The first question was explained by Mr. Morita. It referred to amendments of the Criminal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He asked the President to ascertain whether the Government intended to introduce a bill for amending the Code during the present session. The second question was introduced by Mr. Hapai Takuzo and referred to the action of the late Cabinet in applying the law of siege to Tokyo by an urgency ordinance and subsequently rescinding the law by the same machinery. Mr. Hanai said such a course was illegal, and that the proper method was for the Government to suspend the action of a law thus enacted and subsequently to consult the House about its repeal. He asked whether the present Cabinet approved of such procedure in this respect.

The Order of the Day was then taken and the first two bills were handed to special committees after explanations by the Government Delegates. The third Bill having been favourably reported upon by the Budget Committee a long and animated discussion followed. Messrs. Asano, Oishi and Shimada spoke in opposition, Messrs. Mochizuki, Ooka and Inouye supporting. Finally a closed ballot was taken and the House voted by 230 to 127 to carry the Bill to a second reading, and it was finally passed.

The fourth bill was also favourably reported on by the Budget Committee. Again a keen discussion took place. Messrs. Shimada, Hadano, and Hatoyama opposed the Bill and Messrs. Motoda and Yokota supported it. A closed ballot showed 222 in favour and 125 against. The Bill was passed through all its readings.

The fifth measure was passed unopposed and the House rose at 25 minutes past 7.

MURDER IN TOKYO.

T. Okubo, formerly a police detective in Tokyo, who was recently arrested on a charge of fraud, is now charged with murder. It appears that D. Koike (27) and Z. Watanabe (30) silk merchants of Yamanashi prefecture, were reported last alive when they left for Tokyo with a stock of merchandise on joint account. The relatives of the missing men applied to various police offices in the capital asking for news of them. On the other hand, T. Okubo was arrested on Jan. 15th by the Hongo police on a charge of fraud and on searching his dwelling at Tamachi, Hongo, the officers found a portion of the goods believed to have gone missing. Under ground, about six feet in depth, in a house which had been occupied by Okubo till the middle of December last, two dead bodies were found. Apparently they had been strangled. The dead bodies were removed on Feb. 2nd to the hospital of the college of medicine for examination.

On Feb. 4th, Take (40), wife of the alleged murderer, and several men were arrested on suspicion of being accomplices in the crime. The same day, a post mortem examination was held, the result is not yet reported.

JAPAN'S POLICY TOWARDS KOREA.

THE main facts brought out by Marquis Ito in his interesting speech to the Tokyo journals are that he intends, on the one hand, to vigorously restrain any ill conduct on the part of his own nationals in the peninsula, and on the other, to encourage productive enterprise so that the people of Korea may find themselves substantial gainers by the Japanese protectorate. The Marquis justly says that those Japanese whose proceedings in Korea have excited censure constitute only a small portion of the whole body of residents or travellers. That is undoubtedly true and it is a truth deserving emphasis, for were hard-and-fast inferences drawn from the writings of certain foreign critics, one would suppose that nine out of every ten Japanese living in Korea or visiting the country were men of the worst possible type. They are nothing of the kind, but of course the negative virtues of a majority are always eclipsed by the positive vices of a minority, especially when the audience is led by persons who detect the latter much more readily than the former. Marquis Ito, however, while recognising this feature of the case, has evidently no intention of allowing his country's good name to be smirched or the success of his own statesmanship imperilled by the evil behaviour of a band of adventurers, be they few or many, and he announces his intention of sparing no effort to correct this abuse. It is understood that he intends to establish local tribunals of justice such as shall be worthy of the people's confidence, and that the Koreans will be encouraged to appeal freely to these tribunals for protection in all cases where they consider themselves aggrieved. Acts of open violence will of course be prevented or punished to the utmost limits of police capacity, but evidently police efforts can not cover the whole ground. The second purpose informing Marquis Ito's policy—second in the order of these remarks but first in order of importance—is to make Japan's protectorate a harbinger of prosperity to the people of Korea. To that end they must be assured in the enjoyment of the products of their industry, and the methods of that industry must be improved up to modern standards. It is stated that the Korean farmer has much to learn even in the culture of his perennial staple, rice, and that much promise offers for cotton growing. This latter is an affair of the highest importance to Japan herself, for she is now importing from India and America raw cotton to the extent of something like 100 million yen annually, and if she could obtain a large part of that stock in Korea, the drain on her specie reserves would be proportionately diminished. These forecasts form only a small fraction of the task lying before Marquis Ito in Korea. It is a colossal task, but the honour of achieving it successfully will be correspondingly great, and Marquis Ito may be supported by the reflection that seldom in the world's history has such an occasion been placed within reach of one man. The thing to be deprecated before everything is the prevalence of hasty expectations on the side of the public. Work of the kind awaiting Japanese statesmanship in Korea must of necessity be slow if its results are to be abiding, and although many onlookers, seeing that the task is entrusted to a man of Marquis Ito's established calibre, will be disposed to look for signal indications of success, any reflecting person will appreciate the necessity of possessing his soul in patience. Marquis Ito, we may be quite sure, will not jeopardise the achievement of his purpose by precipitancy or superficiality.

THE FINANCIAL PROGRAMME.

A GREAT deal of interest centered on the Government's amortization measure which pledges the nation to devote an annual sum of 110 million yen during the next thirty years to the interest and amortization of the Empire's foreign debts; and also to the measure for continuing the extraordinary war taxes which, in the ordinary course of events, should have come to an end immediately. After these two measures, perhaps indeed in a higher degree than either of them, the attention of keen financiers has been devoted to the Extraordinary Expenditures set down under the heading of the Finance Department. The Expenditures total 84½ million yen—in round numbers—and in the schedule of Extraordinary Revenue appears an item of 81 million yen under the heading of "money to be raised by a domestic loan." Looking at these sections of the Budget people asked whether these so-called "extraordinary expenditures" must not be regarded as outlays destined to recur every year, and whether the country is not about to enter upon a career of constantly increasing debts under the guidance of its present Government. This is a matter of such moment that our readers will not be averse to studying it briefly.

In the first place it is to be observed that out of the total appropriation of 84½ millions demanded for the Finance Department, 12 millions are for the construction of railways, telegraphs and telephones. These are productive investments and it has always been the State's policy to obtain capital for them by means of domestic loans. Hence the extraordinary outlays to be here considered aggregate, not 84½ millions, but 72½. The question then is, what portion of these outlays must be regarded as continuing? Four items attract special notice. They are two sums of 25 millions each on account of restorations in the Army and Navy, and two sums of 10 millions each for the maintenance and establishment respectively of the troops which are to act as guards in Manchuria and Korea. Undoubtedly a part of these items must be regarded as continuing. We know from statements made by the Minister of War at a Budget Committee's meeting that the total amount required to re-equip the Army is 164 million yen, and that 98 millions are already available, having been provided in the war funds in view of the possible prosecution of the combat. Therefore the sum remaining to be furnished is 66 millions, and out of this next year's Budget furnishes 25 millions, the final result being that from the fiscal year 1907-8 a total of 41 millions will remain to be provided. General TERAUCHI says that this is to be spread over 6 years, as arms require time for their manufacture, and consequently we may conclude that the Army will need 7 millions annually during the six years commencing in April, 1907, and ending in March, 1913. Turning to the Navy, we find that the Minister, speaking in the Committee room, has estimated the restoration expenses at 113 million yen, a part of which has already been paid. We are uncertain as to this "already paid" portion. In the accounts of war expenditures three items stand under the naval heading. One is 17 millions for manufacturing and repairing arms; another, 13 millions for docking and repairing ships; and the third, 44 millions for building ships. A considerable fraction of these figures must belong to the class of restorations, but we have no exact information on that point, and we gather from Admiral SAITO's remarks that none can yet be furnished. At all events it will be a thoroughly conservative estimate to assume that 100 millions have still to be expended, and since 25 millions are demanded for next fiscal year, it follows that 75 millions will remain to be furnished between 1907 and 1913, or 12½ millions annually. The result of this calculation is that the Army and Navy together will call for extraordinary outlays aggregating 19½ millions yearly during the six-year period subsequent to March, 1907.

Next, as to the two items of 10 millions each on account of the guards posted in Manchuria and Korea. It is evident that a considerable part of this outlay must be on account of establishment; that is to say, terminable expenditure. If we take as a basis for calculation the cost of maintaining troops in Japan, it appears that 15 million yen should be an ample appropriation for the support of the four Manchurian and Korean Divisions. Thus we have the following figures as continuing expenditures:—

Army restorations—to be concluded in	yen.
1913 .....	7 millions.
Navy restorations—to be concluded in 1913 .....	12½ "
Cost of Guards in Manchuria and Korea	15 "
Total .....	34½ "

The only other item of a continuing nature in these extraordinary outlays of the Finance Department is a sum of 1,180,000 yen for the support of the Residency-General and the Residencies in Korea. In the Naval section, however, there is a sum of 2½ millions, representing expenses connected with Port Arthur. Nothing has been stated as to the details of this item, but if we assume it to be continuing, the final result is a sum of 38 million yen to be provided in excess of the ordinary Budget from 1907 to 1913. No revenue to meet this is now actually incoming, but there can be no doubt that some returns will be obtained from the Fushun mines and the East-Chinese Railway, to say nothing of the fact that Liaotung and Korea may properly be required to pay a part of the outlays incurred for their defence. At all events we can not follow the Fiji Shimpō when it calculates that 100 millions annually will be needed in excess of the State income now in sight.

THE NAVY.

A QUESTION of great interest which, nevertheless, remains somewhat obscure, is that of the prospective strength of the Japanese Navy. In an article published some time ago we showed that whereas the Japanese went into the war with 76 vessels representing a displacement of 274,184 tons, they emerged with 80 ships totalling 332,114 tons. Of this latter figure 16 vessels representing 103,955 tons, had been captured from the Russians. Further, Japan has in process of construction or to be immediately laid down 38 vessels aggregating 140,520 tons, so that the strength of her navy actually in sight is 118 ships and 472,634 tons; being an increase of 55 per cent. in ships and 73 per cent. in tonnage as compared with her strength before the war. But what we do not know, in the first place, is the light in which her experts regard this fleet. How do they estimate the disabling effects of the two years' combat upon the vessels engaged in it, and what fighting force do they attribute to the ships taken from Russia? Upon these points they are absolutely reticent, but it is a fair conclusion that they do not consider the ships now in their hands—the surviving veterans of the long campaign and the re-floated or captured relics of the Russian squadrons—they do not consider these as first-class fighting material, and that they will lose no time in equipping themselves with sea power worthy of their own competence to employ it. They would be more than human if they did not feel extremely proud of the glory won by them in every phase of the sea fight, and they would be less than ordinarily perspicacious if they failed to appreciate that in every war which they may hereafter be required to wage, their navy will be an absolutely indispensable essential. Russia without a fleet would not have been greatly weakened for purposes of defence in Manchuria, but Japan without a fleet could never have fought in Manchuria at all, and the same will be true of all this Empire's future combats wherever the arena. It is possible to be sure, therefore, that the Japanese Navy will be increased at all costs. When we come, however, to examine the steps likely to be taken, we are confronted by some uncertain elements. In 1902 the Diet passed a bill authorizing what was called the Third-Period Scheme of Naval Increment (dai-sanbi kaigun kakuchō). The programme contemplated an addition of 80,000 tons, costing 99 million yen and spread over a period of eleven years. In accordance with this law three first-class battle-ships, three first-class armoured cruisers and two second-class cruisers besides smaller craft were to have been built—eight fighting ships in all. But only three of them have been taken in hand, namely, the battle-ships Katori and Kashima (16,500 tons each) which are now awaiting in English dockyards the arrival of Japanese crews to navigate them to the East, and the first-class cruiser Ibuki (14,500 tons) which is under construction at Kure. The remaining vessels of the programme, namely, one battle-ship, two first-class cruisers and two second-class cruisers, have not been touched. Of course it was the war that intervened to cause this interruption. The Japanese naturally refrained from commissioning British shipwrights to construct vessels which it might have been impossible to bring to the East. At the same time the war changed the situation in two important respects. It created an urgent necessity to replace the ships lost in the fighting, and it suggested the vital importance of augmenting the capacity of Japanese dockyards so that they would be able to do the work hitherto entrusted to foreign builders. The two propositions might indeed be regarded as one, for had Japan been obliged to rely on foreign builders she could not have recuperated her losses until the war was over; that is to-day, until after the pressing need had ceased to exist. Under these circumstances the expedient resorted to was to purchase materials in England—these could always be carried over-sea in merchant steamers—and, supplementing them by supplies from the Wakamatsu Foundry and the Kure Steel Works, to construct vessels at Kure, Saseho, Yokosuka and Maizuru. Money for this purpose was obtained from the war funds, a step that did not require any parliamentary sanction since it might be regarded as an essential operation of the campaign. The ships lost in the war by Japan were 12 with an aggregate displacement of 46,025 tons. It should be premised that torpedo-craft are entirely ignored in these remarks and that the Mikasa is not regarded as a loss since her re-floating is certain. Among the twelve vessels only 4 were of considerable fighting value, namely, the battle-ships Hatsuse and Yasuhima and the second-class cruisers Takasago and Yoshino. The other nine, however, constituted a distinct loss of naval efficiency. To recoup this loss 8 vessels were taken in hand, namely:—

	Tons.
First-class battle-ship Aki .....	18,000
First-class battle-ship Satsuna .....	18,000
First-class armoured cruiser Tsukuba .....	14,500
First-class armoured cruiser Ibuki .....	14,500
First-class armoured cruiser Kurama .....	14,500
Second-class cruiser Tone .....	4,200
Gunboat Yodo .....	1,300
Gunboat Mogami .....	1,300

And these were supplemented by 29 destroyers. Up to the end of October, 1905, a sum of 44 million yen in round figures had been spent out of the war funds on these ships, apart from 30 millions devoted to restorations; namely, 17 millions for the manufacture and repair of armaments and 13 millions for the repair of ships. A further amount of 25 millions appears in next year's estimates, making 99 millions in all up to March, 1907, and we know from statements made by the Minister of the Navy in the rooms of the Budget Committee that further outlays will be required during the six-year period ending in 1912. All this is tolerably clear, with the exception of the exact sum required for these restorations. But the public does not know precisely what course is to be pursued with regard to consummating the Third-Period programme sanctioned by the Diet in 1902. One line-of-battle ship and two armoured cruisers remain to be built under that programme, apart from minor craft. We know, from the Minister of Marine's emphatic statement that the programme is to be put through, but how or when we do not certainly know. We believe, however, that all war-ships needed by Japan will henceforth be constructed in her own dockyards. This decision seems to have been helped by experiences with the Miyabara boiler. Of three sister ships, the Itsukushima, the Hashidate and the Matsushima (4,277 tons), the first and the third were built in France and have Belleville boilers, but the second was built at Yokosuka and has Miyabara boilers. During the war the French-built cruisers had to have their boilers changed, whereas the Hashidate's boilers not only stood the wear and tear successfully, but are now found in good order so that the ship has already started on her training cruise. Moreover the Miyabara boilers for a line of battle-ship cost only 500,000 yen and are comparatively light. All Japanese ships hereafter built will therefore be fitted with them. We may assume, therefore, that Japan will henceforth do all her own construction, and the only unsolved question is that of time. She will also supply all her own materials, except brass tubes and certain auxiliary machinery.

ORGAN RECITAL.

The organ recital given in Christ Church on Wednesday evening was very largely attended and proved most successful. When it is said that Mr. Hugh Horne was organist, and that the vocal part of the programme was shared by Mrs. Lee Lee, Miss Woodward and Rev. R. A. Walke it will be understood that the numbers set down were rendered with ample effect. We append the programme with an expression of the hope that another recital may be found possible on an early occasion:—

- 1.—Air ..... "Rejoice greatly" ..... Handel.
Miss Woodward.
- 2.—Organ ..... (a) "Prayer" ..... Guilmant.
(b) Andante in C..... Mendelssohn.
- 3.—Air ..... "He shall feed his flock" ..... Handel.
Mrs. Lee Lee.
- 4.—Organ ..... Festal March ..... Smart.
- 5.—Song ..... "My Redeemer and my Lord" ..... Buck.
Rev. R. A. Walke.
- 6.—Organ ..... Andante in A ..... Smart.
- 7.—Hymn No. 160 "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty."
- 8.—Organ ..... (a) Invocation ..... Salome.
(b) Offertoire ..... Allitsen.
- 9.—Song ..... "The Lord is my Light" ..... Allitsen.
Miss Woodward.
- 10.—Organ ..... Adagio from VI Symphony.....
Tchaikowsky.
- 11.—Air ..... "O Rest in the Lord" ..... Mendelssohn.
Mrs. Lee Lee.
- 12.—Organ ..... Toccata ..... Dubois.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The American Board of Foreign Missions have just taken a most important step in regard to their work in this country. They have placed all their churches unreservedly under the control of the Kumiai Kyōkai. This measure seems to have been in contemplation for some time. But it took no practical stage till last summer when a missionary conference was held at Arima and two representatives of the Kumiai Kyōkai, in conjunction with the missionaries present, arranged the preliminary measures necessary for carrying out the projected scheme. Five representatives of the American Board of Foreign Missions, namely, Messrs Greene, De Forest, Allchin, Pettee and Cary, and five representatives of the Kumiai Kyōkai, namely, Messrs Harada, Miyagawa, Nagata, Takaki and Tamura, in conference, subsequently arranged for the transference to the Japanese Congregationalists some 40 churches hitherto controlled by the missionaries of the American Board. At a meeting held at the Ōsaka Young Men's Society Club on Oct. 15th last, attended by all the above-mentioned Delegates, the following resolutions were unanimously passed: (1) From January 1st, 1906, the Nihon Kirisuto Dendōkaisha (Japanese Missionary Society) shall take over and manage all the churches now receiving support from the American Board of Foreign Missions. (2) The American Board of Foreign Missions, in order to aid in the carrying out of this project, will contribute the sum of 6,000 yen to the Japanese Missionary Society. This money is to be paid within 3 years. (3) The Japanese Missionary Society, with a view to carrying out the above-named object, agrees to collect within the next three years a sum not less than 6,000 yen.

It is stated in the report published in the Kirisutokyo Sekai, from which we have culled the above particulars, that the American Board missionaries will henceforth be honorary members of the Japanese Missionary Society. Their incomes, we presume, will still be paid by the American Board.

The Kirisutokyo Sekai of January 18th has an article entitled "What we expect from missionaries," which contains the following remarks. There is not one of us but acknowledges how much the success of the recent movement is to be attributed to the insight, the great-mindedness, the generosity and the persistent efforts of the missionaries concerned. But now that they have contributed so much towards the inauguration of an entirely new state of things in our church, we trust they will give us all the assistance they possibly can in the work that has to be done. There should henceforth be no unfriendliness between the foreign and the Japanese workers. Race distinctions should melt away. It may be said that the missionaries who have been instrumental in effecting the great change are all Japonized, and hence we think they will work in perfect harmony with us. They are now honorary members of our Church, but there is nothing to prevent them from becoming ordinary members if they are so disposed. They could hold office in the native churches if they pleased. It does not seem to us that there will be any further need for their existence as a separate body supported by a foreign Missionary Society.* It is a fact that the missionaries possess a knowledge of theology and scripture exegesis which is most valuable to our churches, and as organizers of various societies their assistance cannot be dispensed with without loss. If on account of their being missionaries they are treated differently by the churches which they serve, that would be a proof that those churches have not reached a high state of development. As regards the Japanese Congregational Church as a whole, its principle is to banish race distinctions and work in harmony with fellow-Christians of every nationality. As for the missionaries themselves, it is most important that their future work should all be carried on in connection with the native churches, or by degrees the same state of things as has existed for years, and which has only now been got rid of will be created again. If they have preaching stations of their own, they will gradually form churches of their own and the old trouble of a divided body of Congregational Christians will be revived.

In its review of the religious history of the year 1905 the Kirisutokyo Sekai calls attention to the fact that all the Protestant sects have been discussing seriously the subject of independence and self support. It is not unlikely that sooner or later other denominations will follow the example of the Congregationalists. The visits of Messrs. Taft and Bryan to this country are supposed by the Kirisutokyo Sekai to have considerably helped forward the cause of Christianity. Under the title of "The world of thought and the world of literature in 1905," the Kirisutokyo Sekai says that there is in Japan at the present time an undoubted revival of interest in moral, religious and philosophic questions. Inquiry is going on apace and most of the great modern teachers of the West have their admirers here. From month to month the Ethical Society connected with the Imperial University, called after the year in which it was formed Teiyū (丁酉) Rinri-kai discusses the connection of morality with religion and a number of philosophic and theological questions of interest. But thought on these subjects is still in a great state of chaos and the scepticism which the writings of the late Dr. Takayama did so much to encourage has obtained a strong hold in many quarters. Mysticism seems to have attraction for certain minds. The year has been marked by the appearance of many translations from European poetry by scholars of some note.* There is a strong desire on the part of earnest students to study western poetic thought. This to a certain extent may prove an antidote to the strong materialistic tendency of the age.

It will be remembered by readers of the London papers that some months ago the remarks of the Bishop of London on the efficacy of prayers for sick people were the subject of much discussion. The Bishop seemed to claim for prayer the power of setting in motion miraculous agency such as it is asserted by some was made use of by Christ and His apostles. It is well known that the Roman Catholics believe in the possibility of supernatural influence and healing power in certain cases of sickness. But it was a surprise to many that a Protestant Bishop should in this 20th century champion such a theory. The Fukui Shimpō (Presbyterian) thinks that the Bishop went too far, apparently differing little from the Christian Science teachers in what he said on the efficacy of prayer. But this organ is not prepared to say that prayers for the sick are of no use. The view of God which represents Him to be too far removed from all human affairs to take any interest in them or to exercise control over them is not the Christian view, says the Fukui Shimpō. According to the teaching of the Bible God is in constant communication with man and may be appealed to on all subjects that concern human life.

In an article which appears in the January 2nd number of the Fukui Shimpō, entitled "Liberty and Submission to Authority," Dr. Anezaki defends Roman Catholicism against Protestant and other attacks. The substance of the article originally formed part of an address of welcome to Archbishop O'Connell. Dr. Anezaki made use of the occasion to explain to his fellow-countrymen the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church to certain great questions. It is frequently said, observes Dr. Anezaki, that Roman Catholicism is the enemy of liberty and that it relies solely on authority for enforcing its teaching. The Pope is represented as a despot who allows no freedom of belief to those beneath him. Roman Catholicism, according to this theory, wherever it is accepted does positive harm to States, in that it opposes political as well as other kinds of liberty. This opinion is widely held in this country and is a proof of the flippant, inaccurate way in which so many of us treat questions like this. People frequently represent liberty and authority as incompatible with each other. But are they really so? Liberty is no other than freedom to act according to one's original nature, that is, according to one's higher nature. To follow one's desires and lusts is slavery. Now is there anything in the authority wielded by the Roman Catholic Church that opposes this liberty? We think not. The liberty which as human beings and members of society we actually have is after all very limited. We cannot free ourselves from our environment; we cannot act in defiance of certain fixed laws of nature. We are a part of the great system of the universe, subject to a great purpose that lies beneath phenomena. The recognition of the one pervading spirit of nature, call it what one may, is the basis of all religion and all morality, and also a great impetus to scientific inquiry. Men can only have such personal liberty as the laws and the great system of the universe allow. Once having recognized the existence of the Divine Being, the Heavenly Father, then to do His will in everything becomes the great object of life. To subject oneself to Divine guidance is no loss of liberty. It alone is the true kind of liberty. The Church is, as it were, God's body. It represents Him on earth. So to subject oneself to its authority is only subjecting oneself to the will of God. This can never be regarded as an improper curtailment of liberty.

Dr. Anezaki concludes his remarks with the expression of great admiration for the ways and teaching of the Roman Catholic Church and adds that its connection with this country is likely to become more and more intimate.

The following short notes on various topics are epitomized from the Fukui Shimpō.

Religion in England.—The Nonconformists in England are now quite as numerous as Church people. In view of the large amount of scepticism, agnosticism and secular indifference that exists in England, Churchmen and Nonconformists have dropped to a considerable extent their petty disputes and animosity and are uniting against a common foe. But the most striking fact connected with Christianity in England to-day is the extent to which rationalism has been carried within the pale of the Church of England. There are clergymen holding high positions in the Church who in the most open manner denounce the written creeds of the Church. Nothing is done to them. They retain their rank in the Church despite their belief. This state of things must sooner or later lead to a great crisis in the Church of England.

English and American Character.—In a book lately published written by Morgan Richards the following passage occurs:—"An American glories in his wealth and endeavours to make known to the world how rich he is. On this will spend much money. The Englishman always strives to appear less rich than he really is." There is much truth in this criticism. To which of the two types of Anglo-Saxons do we Japanese approach nearest?

Natural Gifts and Study.—In the Seikō (Success) Dr. Tsubouchi Shōyō writes thus:—"There are a great many people in the world who fail as a matter of course throughout life because they are tied to occupations for which they have no natural talent. Such are the men who take to writing without having a gift for it. To suppose that because one likes literature therefore one has literary talent is a great mistake."

The Cost of Japanese Hurrahs.—According to statistics given by Dr. Ikeda, the chief military medical inspector, the number of men killed in the war was 43,219; the number of those who died of illness 63,601. If to these figures the number of those who were wounded, those missing and those still ill be added, the grand total amounts to 439,565. The total cost of the war was approximately 2,000 million yen. These figures put together represent the cost of the shouts of Teikoku Banzai which are to be heard day after day throughout the country. Do most of the shouters realize this?

* In connection with this we may mention that Mr. Tsuchii Bansui, a well known Japanese verse writer is now furnishing the Taiyo with translations of Book I of Milton's Paradise Lost in the Shintaisi style. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

Union of Churches.—On Nov. 15th last a very remarkable Conference was held in the Carnegie Hall, New York, which had for its object the union of no less than 30 Protestant sects. The 700 delegates who attended the meeting represented no less than 20 million Christians. The delegates were all evidently bent on effecting the amalgamation, but they took a very determined stand against admitting Unitarians to the union. At first the agreement drawn up referred to Christ as "Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," but at the suggestion of a Professor in the Brown University the words were altered to "Our Divine Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."* This was considered sufficient to show that the Conference did not wish Unitarians to form part of the union. President Roosevelt sent a letter to the Delegates in which he urged on them the importance of trying to extend the spirit of union to Japan and of thus immensely aiding the progress of Christianity in this country.

The Fukui Shimpō is of opinion that a new impetus has been given to the adoption of foreign ways and the use of foreign articles by recent events. The pictorial post-card rage has spread here. The supply of foreign post-cards this year is said to have been less than the demand. The use of foreign dress is certainly more general than it was a few years ago. Christmas is now kept by members of the aristocracy and other gentlemen—a thing almost unknown heretofore. Piano, organ and violin playing are getting to be more and more fashionable and the samisen and the harp are being given up. Life in modern Japan is changing very rapidly.

The Fukui Shimpō is publishing a series of articles on "The Connection of Christianity with other Religions." No. 3, published Jan. 2nd, treats of its connection with Buddhism and No. 4 with its relation to Egyptian religion.

Two well-known Christians, Messrs. Harada Tasuku and Motoda Sakunoshi, are about to proceed to India on a very interesting mission. It seems that certain missionaries in India, realizing how little progress Christianity has made in India compared to what it has done here, have set on foot a movement for reaching Indians as far as possible by means of Japanese, being of opinion that Asiatic races are more susceptible to one another's influence than they are to that coming from Europe. It is reported that Japan's victories have had the effect of greatly hindering the progress of Christianity in India. The Hindus argue thus. It is not necessary to be Christian in order to excel. Asiatic nations may keep themselves abreast of the most forward Western nations without adopting Christianity, as the Japanese are doing. Whether, says the Fukui Shimpō, the visit of these two Christians to India will effect the end desired and whether their going on this mission is altogether wise are questions on which there is room for much difference of opinion. Irrespective of the object they have in view, their visit to India will be attended with considerable interest.

The question, what has been the general effect of the increase of Japanese prestige in the East on the propagation of Christianity is not easy to answer observes the Fukui Shimpō. But it seems to be a fact that our influence in many parts of the East has in certain ways proved a hindrance rather than a help to mission work. Some of the Chinese foreign missionaries have complained of this (Shina ni okeru gwaiokoku sentyōshi chū ni mo nijū-shichi, hachi nen no senyeki irai Nihon no seiryoku ga aru hōmen ni oite dendo mo shōgai wo nashi tsutsu ari tote, tsu-buyaku mono naki ni arasu.) But on the other hand, it is only fair to say, adds the Fukui Shimpō, that in some respects mission work has been helped by Japanese influence and control. Our system of education ignores religion and sets up a purely secular ethical creed. Moreover, it encourages ancestor-worship and the like, and so has undoubtedly helped people in India, China, and Korea to cling to their erroneous ideas. One of the principal objects of the handful of Japanese evangelists who have crossed over to China and Korea is to try and remove the bad impression that our merchants and politicians have created and to unite their efforts with the missionaries on the spot in extending the dominion of Christ.

* The remarks of the Fukui Shimpō here are rather obscure. Whether the word "Divine" only was used in the formula or whether the word God was applied to Christ we are not certain. The term "Divine" is used by Unitarians in the sense of God-like and hence if the Conference agreed to its employment in one of the articles of the agreement drawn up it need not be interpreted as antagonistic to Unitarianism.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

We do not ourselves place much faith in the mission on which Messrs. Motoda and Harada are going to India, says the Fukui Shimpō. It seems to us that to the argument that without reliance on Christianity Japan has succeeded in war and therefore that Far Eastern nations need not trouble themselves about Christianity, there is only one satisfactory reply, which is, that the development of physical or military power is not the object of Christianity. Its weapons are not worldly weapons. Its battles are not against flesh and blood. If these two gentlemen attempt to show that success in this war has been directly or indirectly connected with Christianity, they will fail. Men of strong faith are not necessarily robust in health nor do they invariably make good soldiers. We are not for appealing to civilisation or to wealth and power as a proof of the value of Christianity. We think such a line of argument to be very unsafe. Christianity has to stand or fall on its own merits. There is too great a tendency to resort to such arguments in this country at present. (Yohai wa tsun ni bummei to ka fukyo to ka iu gotoki kotogara wo baki to shite dendo suru nomachi-gai naru wo tonayetari. Kirisutokyō no dendo wa mottomo shūkyō teki naru koso yokere. Amari ōku ta no dōki (動機) ni uttauru toki wa, sono iekkawa fukwanzen naru wo manukaresu. Waga kuni ni oite sono hei sude ni ichijirushiki mono ari to iwasarubekarazu.)

We have already more than once called attention to the publication by the Shinbukkō Doshikai of a book called Raise no Umu, (The Existence or Nonexistence of a Future World). We should like to see the book translated into English. It would certainly go far to settle the vexed question of the attitude of the Japanese educated mind to religious supernaturalism and philosophic arguments in favour of the immortality of the soul. Writers on these subjects in the West too often do nothing but repeat the same old humdrum exploded arguments. Japanese opinions on these questions have the charm of novelty at any rate, except when the writers are orthodox Christians and hence repeat the doctrines they have been taught by missionaries. But it is not our business to either praise or condemn the attitude of the Japanese mind to these topics, but simply to show precisely what it actually is. For this purpose we propose inserting in our Summaries literal translations of some of the more striking of the enunciations of belief or unbelief published in the Raise no Umu. We shall only omit quite irrelevant matter such as excuses for not answering letters of inquiry more promptly, and the like. We can of course only find space for short extracts from this book each month. But we shall aim at giving all schools of thought a chance of having their say. It will be remembered that the inquiry put by the new Buddhists to Japan's noted scholars was:—"Is there a future world or not? If you say there is, give reasons for this belief. If not, on what rounds do you decide this? If you think there is a future life, what kind of life do you take it to be?"

(1) Mr. Yamagata Teizaburō.—To a man of little learning like myself your questions are difficult to answer. I hardly know what to say. But as one who has his own individual existence in this world, I strongly hold that there is a future world and as far as I can I try to live a good life, and I feel that if when I die I can say "I have done my duty" I shall die thoroughly contented.

(2) Dr. Kōō Hiroyuki.—Think of it as I may, to me it seems there can be no future life, * Boku wa dō kangae mo raise ga aru to wa omowarenu. Nani yuze naraba, konnichi made kwagaku-teki ni raise no aru to iu shōkō ga deki te konai kara.

because up to to-day no scientific proof of its existence has been forthcoming.

(3) Mr. Emi Ninjō.—The questions you put were hardly worth writing about. So, for economy's sake, I reply on the paper you sent. First, it is necessary to inquire what you mean by raise (future life or future world). If you mean a life beyond the grave, then in my opinion it is enough to say there is no such life. But if your raise is an abbreviation of mirai no sekai (a future world), this future world need not necessarily mean a world after death. It might refer to future time in this life, to to-morrow, next month, next year, for instance. If this latter meaning be given to the term, then your inquiry becomes a vastly momentous one.* But it would seem that your inquiry is to be interpreted in the sense of a life beyond the grave, and you want to know whether people believe in a paradise and a hell. But I can't understand how a number of intelligent men like you could have put such silly questions to the public. Rather than make use of the term "future life" it would have been more suitable to ask whether people believed in the immortality of the soul or not, as is taught in the Buddhist Scriptures (Mida Kyō), "In the existence of a material future world we can't believe" (Keitai wo sonayetaru raise sekai aru wo shinazuru atawazu). But in the existence of a spiritual world where we shall all take a part in helping to fulfil the ultimate end of the universe I firmly believe. In that world our spirits will exist through untold ages. It is a world where all is light and where there is no darkness at all. This will be our paradise. The expectation of this ideal life it is that acts as a constant stimulus to all my highest aspirations.

"Post bellum Evangelistic Work" is the title of three well written articles appearing in the Sikyō Shimpō, evidently from the pen of the talented editor of that journal, the Rev. K. Ishikawa. The articles are too long to be satisfactorily dealt with here. The first appeared on December 1st, the second on December 15th, and the third, which seems to us the most important of the three, and which we epitomize below was published on January 15th:—"That our evangelistic work is making poor progress is the opinion of all our workers. Various reasons are given for this. Some of us say that the lack of zeal and push among us is owing to the low salaries which our workers receive. No doubt the salaries are low. No doubt many of our evangelists find it very hard to live. But the question is, would the doubling of the salaries insure double the amount of earnestness among our workers? The salaries paid to many Protestant evangelists are almost double those received by our men. But are these Protestants double as earnest as our evangelists? There is really not much to choose between them and us. Some of our workers are by no means in poor circumstances, but their work is little better for this. Some of the poorest of our men are the best workers. So that the "so much money, so much work" argument is not based on fact, and is therefore worthless. Moreover, it is an extremely worldly view to take of Christian work. We as Christian workers should never allow it to be said that we would do more were we paid more. We can then dismiss this excuse for lethargy and pass on to discuss other causes of existing stagnation in our Church. It is impossible for us to conceal from ourselves the fact that our Churches have got into a sleepy non-progressive state. Our pastors, instead of working to gain new converts spend most of their time in looking after those converts they have. The proportion of time given to evangelistic work pure and simple is only one-tenth of that given to the service of the Church. Unless some steps can be taken to rescue our 200 odd workers from the stagnant conservatism which now enthralls them, I have no hesitation in saying that no length of time will suffice to make our Church really great.* In the distribution of pastors and evangelists throughout the country the idea seems to be that these men are intended to make it their principal work to look after Christian converts and their preaching to unbelievers is not considered at all important. So it happens constantly that for years there is no increase of converts in many country churches. This seems to cause no surprise among our pastors, so settled is the conviction that to hold what they have is the one thing to be thought of—not the gaining of fresh converts. The stagnancy in some of our country stations is something pitiful. There are at such places preaching places often consisting of small houses where services for believers are held. There is no attempt whatever to reach outsiders. The pastor or evangelist in charge of the station feels no responsibility as regards mission work pure and simple. His sole concern is to attend to the wants of the few Christians connected with the church. He has quite forgotten that he has been sent to the provinces to preach the gospel to unbelievers (Ware wa Shu no fuku-in wo tsutaeru mono nari to no jikaku wa hotondo bōkyaku serare oru arisama nari.) Pastors most in request in country districts are oldish men who have had experience in worldly affairs. Half of the work that these men are asked by their converts to do is not really church work at all. Their time is frittered away on comparative trifles. Men are not chosen to fill these posts because they are likely to be active preachers of the gospel to outsiders, but solely for the convenience of the Christians. For years and years our country churches have been asleep and our country pastors have lost all ambition to conquer new territory. The practice of paying a whole crowd of pastors to do nothing but look after a few Christians in one place or another should be abandoned, and men who are real evangelists should be sent to the country to preach the gospel. To keep pastors for years in places where no progress is being made involves the total extinction of the evangelistic spirit in these pastors. They should be withdrawn from such places and sent elsewhere, and other measures should be devised for training the few Christians left in these unprogressive places. These measures will be discussed by us on a future occasion. And in the case of young evangelists, who often are full of earnestness when sent to take charge of some remote country station, if it is found that after two or three years' experience they make no converts, they should shake the dust off their feet, turn their backs on those places and begin work elsewhere. The effect of two or three years' isolation in some dead-alive country station has often driven young men into fits of despondency from which it has been difficult for them to recover.

* This is manifestly satirical. An inquiry as to whether a man is likely to live much longer, coming from Buddhist teachers, would be a big joke, says Mr. Emi.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

The presbyters (司祭) * who govern our Churches should take this subject of the distribution of evangelists up in right earnest and endeavour to put some life into the whole of our missionary work by impressing on the evangelists and pastors working under them the importance of their laying themselves out to win new converts. The whole future of our church depends on our taking an entirely new view of our responsibilities as transmitters of the message of salvation.

We read in a recent number of the Gokyo that two bodies of Methodists have formed a Methodist Social Club in Tōkyō. The Gokyo thinks this may go far to promote the cause of union among the Methodists. It says that hitherto in the Methodist Church there has been too strong a tendency to allow parties to manage the Church as arisama wa mattaku no hoshu-shugi nite, kaku chihō no denkyōjō no nichi nichi no yōji wa, kyōkai naibu no yomuki kuba nite, fukyo (布教) dendō no yō-muki sono ichi bu to no arisama nari. Moshi nan to ka no hoko wo kojite, ni hyaku yūyo no dendōshi wo kyōkai no naibu no hataraki hoshu-teki jōtai yori sūku ni arazumba, nihon seikyōkai wa sen hyaku nen wo keikua suru mo fōtei, daiyōkai to naru no nozomi nashi to dangen seazaru wo yezu.

* In the Roman Catholic church this term is the translation of prêtre, but we rather think that in the Greek Church the term is used in the sense of Dean. —(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

they please. Laymen have been left out in the cold. One of the objects of this club is the revival of lay interest in the work of the Church and, if possible, the devising of steps for the effecting of the Methodist union so long talked of.

In an article entitled Tsukazu Hanarezu (Not too far and not too near) the Gokyo discusses what should be the proper attitude of the Church to the world. It observes that the ancients were wont to say that he that would minutely describe the world's affairs in verse must neither approach too near them nor keep them at too great a distance; the reason being that there are many things in human life that are apt to injure the minds of those who look into them too closely. Yet if they be not studied at all, they can not be truly depicted in verse. So it is with the Church of Christ in the world, says the Gokyo. Its proper position resembles that of a water wheel, which is half in the water and half out of it, that is, it is half immersed in worldly affairs and half not. Were not the Church to be impelled by the stream of worldly events it would become motionless and useless. Were it altogether immersed in those affairs it would cease to fulfil its mission. Christianity differs essentially from Buddhism in that it does not advocate entire separation from the world. Christian believers are expected to mix with other men and impart a flavour to their lives just as salt flavours what we eat. But they must endeavour ever to retain a certain superiority to the world. But this standard is very frequently not kept up, and our Christians make use of thoroughly worldly methods in trying to promote the interests of their religion.

The Gokyo in a leading article calls attention to a somewhat extraordinary development in the religious world. It seems that during the past 12 or 18 months there have been a number of persons who claim to be in special communication with God or to be new Saviours of the world, or prophets sent to teach erring mankind. One Miyazaki a short time ago gave himself out to be a prophet, and one Suehiro to be the Saviour of the World. In a recent number of the Buddhist magazine known as the Myōjō (Bright Star), the editor, Mr. Yosano Kan, sounds the praises of a certain man calling himself Shichi Zenyū, whose words of salvation are given in that magazine. People are all begged to come to him for salvation. He claims to be able to reform character and teach unadulterated truth. Then a writer in the Yomiuri Shinbun, Mr. Kawakami Hajime, whose articles on Socialism attracted some attention last year, suddenly alleged that he had been the subject of a special revelation from God while in a kind of trance, "when for 10 days he did not remember the taste of food" (Inshoku no aji wo wasururu koto toka narishi, &c.) So he stopped writing on Socialism and published a long essay entitled 大山鳴鶴, Daisan-meido. This was towards the close of last year. Since that he has published new matter under the title of "The Ultimate Object of Human Life." Then the author of a book which appeared last autumn called Byōkanroku (Record of Sickness), Mr. Tsunajima Ryōsen, in the New Year's numbers of the Chūōkōron, the Shinjin and the Yomiuri Shinbun tells the public of his new self-consciousness that he is the Son of God. Many people, says the Gokyo, will treat these phenomena with contempt as the silly vagaries of unbalanced minds, but we are not disposed to take that view. To us they seem to be a clear indication of the existence of a certain spiritual craving in the minds of a large number of people; which craving these alleged revelations are intended to satisfy. The notion that we as a people are satisfied with mere intellectual development, that we have no aspirations beyond this is not borne out by facts. Alleged communications with God attract attention and inspire belief because there is something in man's spiritual nature that makes him desire more enlightenment and teaching than he now possesses. That those who are conscious of possessing an unsatisfied craving for something that they have not yet found should often become the dupes of impostors or the admirers of religious monomaniacs is inevitable. But by us Christians, says the Gokyo, the presence of the craving for something higher than they possess displayed by so many persons at this time should be regarded as a good omen, and it should be our desire to satisfy this craving by means of the spiritual food Christianity supplies.

THE VICAR OF HEXTON.

The Rev. R. C. Fillingham is well-known in Yokohama, so we make no apology for reproducing the following from the columns of The Times :—

Before Sir Lewis Dibdin, the Dean of the Arches, a sitting of the Arches Court of Canterbury was held at the Church House, Westminster, to hear a suit promoted by the Bishop of St. Albans against the Rev. Robert Charles Fillingham, M.A., vicar of Hexton, Hertfordshire, in the diocese of St. Albans, for alleged contravention of the ecclesiastical law, statutes, canons, and constitutions of the Church of England by purporting to ordain a minister of the Church of God, he not being a Bishop, by preaching and administering the Lord's Supper in an unconsecrated building without the leave of the Bishop, and by disobedience to the lawful commands of the Bishop. The respondent, Mr. Fillingham, denied the charges, and in his responsive plea he said that, in using the form of words and doing the acts alleged, he had no intention of ordaining and did not in fact ordain a priest according to the order of the Church of England, and that the authority to preach the word of God and to minister the Holy Sacraments in the congregation which he intended and purported to confer was the authority of a presbyter in the Church of God according to the most ancient and primitive conception thereof. He denied that he had offended against the law in what he did, and he asked the Court to dismiss the suit with costs.

Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., for the Bishop of St. Albans, quoted Mr. Fillingham as writing, in reply to the Bishop's inquiry :

"The Rev. A. C. White has suggested that I should ordain him to the pastorate of Emmanuel Church, Southend, where he ministers to an attached evangelical congregation, and I have agreed so to do. Neither he nor I regard ordination as conveying any supernatural powers. The one qualification for a minister of God to possess is, we believe, the inner call. This certainly was the view of the Apostle Paul, who ministered himself and conferred orders on others, as Timothy, without having himself sought ordination at the hands of the other Apostles. The formal ordination, the laying on of hands, we regard merely as publicly setting a man apart for the work of the ministry. With this view we feel that a presbyter can set apart a man as well as a Bishop, nor are there wanting precedents in the Church of England. For example, Whittingham, Dean of Durham in the reign of Elizabeth, was in presbyterian orders, and in the sister Church of Ireland, Lancaster, Archbishop of Armagh, ordained priests before he had himself been consecrated a Bishop. In the proposed ordination at Southend, therefore, we are following Scriptural and Reformation precedents. I am your lordship's obedient servant, R. C. Fillingham."

The Bishop wrote to Mr. Fillingham commanding him "to take no part whatever in this proposed ordination or in any way to officiate at such a service," held within the diocese. Mr. Fillingham, in reply wrote :—

"March 6, 1905. My dear Lord Bishop,—I am giving the matter my most anxious consideration. I feel myself to be between two duties. The main object of Mr. White's mission in the town of Southend is to oppose the illegal and dangerous ritualism prevalent there, and if I fail him I feel I shall be lacking in courage in the cause of Protestantism. If I consent to abandon my purpose, will your lordship pledge yourself to order the immediate discontinuance of the illegal practices at All Saints, Southend—incense, Eucharistic vestments, mixed chalice, elevation of the Host—under pain of the inhibition of Dr. Lang and withdrawal of his curate's licence? There is no doubt about the illegality of these practices; there is about the proposed ordination. I am your lordship's obedient servant, R. C. FILLINGHAM." In answer to that letter the Bishop's chaplain wrote :—

"March 7, 1905. Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of yesterday's date, the Bishop of St. Albans desires me to say that he cannot allow any condition whatever in your obedience to what he is advised to be the law of the Church."

Mr. Fillingham disobeyed the Bishop. The case was adjourned.

The Asahi has a telegram from Liaoyang to the effect that thirty Chinese banks are almost in a bankrupt state. Consequently a panic exists in commercial circles.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

The three-hundred-and-fourteenth meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society, held at the Van Schaick Hall on Friday evening, will be memorable in the annals of this flourishing institution. Mrs. Hugh Fraser's lecture was a most intimate and charming description of her girlhood's days in the great city of the seven hills before the unification of Italy had turned it from a mediæval haunt of gorgeous ecclesiasticism into the modern capital of a very modern nation. Through the kindness of Mr. Noel Evans, who visited Rome in February, 1904, Mrs. Fraser was able to illustrate her lecture with some very beautiful views of the more antique portions of the city. These were received with great satisfaction by the large audience.

The President, introducing the lecturer, said Mrs. Fraser carried with her the assured welcome of an old friend. Many among the older members of the Society would remember her in happy days gone by as the gracious chataleine who dispensed so charmingly the hospitalities of the British Legation; others again knew her as the sister of that very accomplished man-of-letters, Mr. Marion Crawford, whose novels and historical writings occupied such a very sure place in popular esteem; while others had been so fortunate as to make Mrs. Fraser's acquaintance through her own delightful writings and novels. The Yokohama Literary Society extended to her the heartiest of greetings, feeling greatly honoured that such a busy and distinguished person should give to it so freely of her time and talents.

Mrs. Fraser began by saying:—Let me thank you for the honour you have done me in asking me to inscribe my name on the very fine record of the Yokohama Literary Society, and also for the kind welcome I have received on my return to Japan after so many years. The changes and chances of mortal life have dealt strenuously with this charming country, but they have not touched the kindness of those who dwell here. It has been a great pleasure to a confirmed wanderer like myself to find a matter of ten years' absence bridged in an instant by the same hearty hand-clasp and the same warm greeting that used to brighten the happy moments and give courage in the sad ones.

And now, I warn you, that I am going to talk a great deal about myself. Has it ever struck you that the reason why some good people are such mortally dull company is that conscience, the great silencer, forbids them to abuse others or to talk about themselves? Two such thrilling subjects! I don't think I was ever very intimate with my conscience and this evening I bade it a polite farewell in Tokyo for, in the days I am going to tell you of, it seemed to me that Rome, the spendthrift, had risen three times from the dust of her ruined cities to make one great rainbow playground for my youth. Far on the upper outskirts of the city used to stand a great square palace, golden grey with age, its enormous windows set foresquare to the world, its topmost terrace open to the winds and commanding a view of the entire city below, with Soracte and the "dark Ciminian Hills" to the north, the Sabines to the east, the Alban Hills to the south, and to the west the wide stretches of the Campagna, rolling softly to the sea, its gold and purple emptiness touched here and there by the ruined watch towers where shy, dark-eyed shepherds herd their flocks at night. The Campagna was so near us that the vast Renaissance gardens of our villa stretched away into it gradually, a statue here, a cypress there, a great marble fountain lost among the vineyards, showing how splendid had been the pleasure that the great Pope Sixtus the V. had laid out around the palace. I am afraid the palace itself was built of materials filched from the Baths of Diocletian, whose huge sulky-looking arches covered some acres of ground near us. There is no destroying that titanic Roman masonry and though many a famous palace has been built with the stone and marble that could be removed, when it comes to the mass of concrete and bricks they covered nothing short of dynamite will make any impression upon it. Sixtus the V. had no mind to forget his humble origin, and though the pigs he had herded as a boy were not represented in the frescoes which everywhere covered the walls and vaulted ceilings of the house, yet his family name, Peretti, which means little pears, was signified by clusters of pears at every turn, and his natal village, Montalto, explained three high peaks behind them which greatly puzzled my childish mind. It was fortunate, perhaps, that I did not know all the terrible stories connected with my birthplace. It had been the home of one of the worst women who ever lived, Vittoria Accaromboni. I must not tell you much about her as my brother, Marion Crawford, has been so attracted by her dramatic wickedness that he means to make her the heroine of a novel. She had married Francesco Peretti, a gorgeously handsome young relative of the Pope, and wishing to replace him by another husband, sent him out from this house to be murdered by the hired bravos of an old admirer. Him she married and also disposed of, and was very properly murdered herself a month later for the sake of the enormous wealth he had left her.

As a family, we have always been what I may call "subject" to ghosts, and the old house was eerie enough; but out in the gardens all was peaceful with the sleep of centuries, and except one piece of wall behind the orange walk, where the bricks were scaled away in the outline of a tortured female figure, there were no corners that were not happy haunts of gods and fairies for us. The statues of Hercules and Hermes were our friends, and there was a little altar of Flora in one of the deep box hedged closes, where Marion and I regularly brought offerings of cakes and bonbons that had been given to me for saying my catechism with peculiar unction. It was always I who earned these pious rewards, for my brother was the most obstinate little dunce that ever lived! He would learn nothing, and for two or three years my small elder-sisterly heart was heavy with the conviction that he would grow up—an idiot! He was superbly beautiful, and seemed to think that no more should be required of him—not even the art of walking, an exercise against which he protested practically by sitting down in the street the moment the much-tried nurse set him down from her aching arms. The most humiliating moment of my life was the one when, at two years old, the young tyrant subsided in the middle of a crowded street and had to be carried home by a stalwart policeman, I following sadly, carrying a fat blue shoe that he had kicked off in a paroxysm of rage. Those were the days when there was a great circle of artists in Rome, and I remember realizing quite vividly the regal privilege of being not only a Roman born, but an artist's daughter as well! My father had built a series of enormous studios over the ancient reservoir of the Baths of Diocletian and here I used to take refuge from the world and sit for whole days among the shining white statues, perfectly happy with a ball of clay and a modelling stick, listening to the delicate ring of chisel on marble—still to me the sweetest music in the world. From the studios I could slip out through a dark ilex grove and climb a little hill on which sat a colossal statue of Rome, spear in hand and helmet on head, looking down with stony eyes on her namesake city, while above her swayed the tall dark spires of some giant cypresses planted by Michael Angelo. I used to hope he would come and talk to me there and let me ask him why I loved his statues and was afraid of his paintings! It is all gone now. The railway runs where the ilex grove broke in gold and green rustlings over my small head; the railway station stands on the site of our studios; gone is the lovely fountain court, guarded by stone lions and encircled by cypresses wreathed to their crests with climbing roses. The fountain had been playing for three hundred years, and the place was so quiet and remote that when my sisters and I looked down from our nursery windows on moonlight nights we used to see a ring of ghostly little Campagna foxes drinking silently out of the great marble basin.

The great epoch of our year was Easter time, when we climbed the long stone stairs leading to the tower, and stood breathless under its vast open arches in the soft Italian night to gaze at St. Peter's, outlined and covered from pinnacle to portico with stars of silver light. Far away, across the dark city, we could trace every detail of cross and dome and portico, quivering with mysterious radiance against the velvety darkness of the sky. Not a sound was to be heard. We knew that a hundred thousand people were watching with us in that breathless darkness. Then, from the Castle of St. Angelo, one cannon thundered out its signal, and ere its echoes died away, the silver summit of the Cross on the Dome flamed to molten gold, which ran in a torrent of glory down, down from dome to roof, from roof to pillar, from pillar to colonade till the whole great distant fane was one breathing hive of gold. How we used to clasp each other's hands and gasp with joy and terror and ask each other "Did he get down alive?" For the task of changing the light on the towering Cross, four hundred feet above the ground, was so desperately dangerous that a condemned criminal was granted his pardon if he would undertake it, and—those were the days of faith—the man who dared that climb for life always made his confession and received absolution before attempting it.

The illumination was repeated on St. Peter's day, the 29th of June, and I remember once seeing it from the Alban Hills, where we used to pass our summers in a villa perched on the steep slope of Rocca di Papa. Just above us was Hannibal's camp—the strange little plateau shelved out of the mountain side, where tradition told us—and tradition was dogma to such children in such surroundings—Hannibal had stood with his army at his back, looking at Rome lying like a great sulky hound in the hollows of the Campagna, and had turned away with a sigh, knowing that here he had reached the limit of his conquests. Marion and I spent those summers in searching for Carthaginian swords and helmets, among the wild flowers and the thyme! Our heroes were so real to us! We had an enchanting young American governess who taught us Roman history—the only history she or we thought worthy our attention—from the monuments and on the spots where its most stirring incidents took place. We felt ourselves uplifted to fame when a bit of the great wall of Servius Tullius was discovered in our villa. Reverently we looked down at the massive piles of Horatius' bridge—I cried for a whole day when I learned that his second name, "Cocles" meant "the one-eyed";—we wandered by the reedy marsh that used to be Lake Regillus; we rode to the Portian Heights where "Up rose the golden morning" on the day Herminius died and his horse, our dear "Black Auster" fled riderless to our own Alba Longa. Down in the Forum we knew where Marc Antony stood when he pronounced Cæsar's funeral oration—and we gazed with sorrowful awe at the red stains of Cæsar's noble blood on Pompey's statue. Up in the Capitol we heard the echoes of the wise and watchful geese; we knew every step of the triumphal way and the story of many a conqueror who had dragged his captives at flower decked chariot wheels past the shouting intoxicated crowds. Down under the Tarpeian rock I believed I actually saw the mountain of gold bracelets under which expired the covetous Roman maiden Tarpeia, who for them sold the city to its enemies. Old Roman was so supreme in our imaginations that until we grew older we had little sympathy left to bestow on the Christian Martyrs whose blood had dyed her splendid, sinful soil. I think the gorgeous, vicious luxury of the Baths of Caracalla and the Palace of the Cæsars (where we were fond of passing our Sunday afternoons)—first brought to us a sense of the necessity of her fall. It was a strange education for little modern children, but our instructors spared us nothing—all the Feasting and the Sinning and the Killing passed before our eyes—and, wandering among the ruins in the soft Roman sunshine, we learned the lesson of retribution; we saw our few great ideals come unscathed through that Cloaca Maxima of lust and blood, and slowly our young eyes saw the later and more abiding glories of the Rome of Christianity.

I was but a tiny child when the first gleam came to me—unheralded and unexplained. It was one of those glorious winter mornings that seem to break for Rome alone. Every fountain was sparkling in the sun, the flowers made summer in the great public gardens of the Pincio—the famous gardens of Lucullus where Messalina murdered his heir and was finally slain herself. On the spot where the world was freed of her execrable existence my brother and I were playing hide and seek among the flowers and statues, when our attention was arrested by a gorgeous company coming towards us in the dazzling sunshine. A number of officers in glittering uniforms and white plumed glittering helmets surrounded a group so striking that I seem to see it now. Two Cardinals in geranium scarlet, their long trains carried by pages, walked on either side of a tall, noble-looking man dressed in spotless white, the only touches of colour in his costume being a broad scarlet girdle and a great gold cross and chain. He had brilliant dark eyes and a pale face full of calm benignity. "It is the Pope!" exclaimed our nurse. Then we saw that the group had paused and a splendid noble guard was clanking towards us, his silver breastplate and gold helmet blinking in the sun. "The Holy Father wishes to speak to the children," he said, and taking us by the hand led us quickly towards the tall man in white. When we stood before him, Pius the Ninth laid a hand on each of our heads, and stooping down with a smile, asked our names and how old we were. Then, after his custom (for he was fond of children) he blessed us solemnly and sent us back to our play, much lifted up with joy and pride. Indeed we were always getting blessed by some kind-hearted prelate, my brother's extraordinary Saxon beauty attracting attention wherever we went. Once, when he was very small, a pretty ceremony was going on at the Church of St. Agnes, on the Martyr's Feast Day. It was the custom for the Campagna shepherds on that day to bring the prettiest of their yearling lambs to be blessed by the titular Cardinal of the Church, thus ensuring increase and prosperity to the flocks. The pet lambs were washed and combed, and decked out with bright ribbons, and the men in their picturesque costumes brought them in their arms, and passed in rapid succession before the old Cardinal where he stood in the porch of the Church. The Cardinal was nearly blind, and when he saw my brother lying, a fluffy white bundle, in the nurse's arms, he thought it was another yearling waiting for its benediction. I remember how he stooped down trying to see better, then exclaimed, "Che! bell' agnellino." (What a beautiful lamb!) and solemnly blessed that particularly naughty baby, praying that it might live to a good lamb age and produce plenty of nice pure wool!

By the time I was ten or eleven years old, the gods and goddesses and the dear Roman heroes had grown misty, and the wonderful spectacles afforded by the Papacy and its hierarchy, the festal processions, the antique ceremonies, were filling my horizon with glow and colour tempered by the mystic radiance of their religious meaning. No one can dream what the Feast of Corpus Domini, for instance, meant to a child brought up in that strange beauty-charged atmosphere! Imagine a morning of mid June in Rome—in the Piazza of St. Peter's. The vast dome towering against the blue, the fountains, sheets of living diamonds in the sun. Every pillar of the great encircling colonnade is wreathed from plinth to capital with roses, lilies, violets, which swing in garlands from column to column. Underfoot in the wide arched space the pavement has been covered with fine golden-coloured sand, strewn in its turn with fresh sprays of box—a green and gold mosaic floor for the procession which is forming up there in the vast court-yards of the Vatican. Now a company of Guards, every man the son of a noble Roman house, come riding down on their coal-black horses, helmets and cuirasses gleaming, spurs jingling, white plumes tossing in the sun, martial music suddenly filling the morning air with a pean of triumph. It passes on, and now a soft low chant is heard, and the breath of the flowers is mingled with the fragrance of incense, blue against the sunshine's gold. The Religious Communities come slowly down, each monk carrying a lighted candle a yard long. There are White Dominicans, Grey Franciscans, Brown Capuchins, the Trinitarians in their sweeping white robes crossed with scarlet and blue; Black Benedictines—thousands and thousands; they pass by, chanting psalms, each company headed by its standard, till the whole atmosphere is pulsing with the grave full music. Next the colleges: fair Germans in scarlet, Englishmen in blue, the young Roman nobles in black, all the young faces happy and smiling. Now come the grave Monsignori in trailing amethyst; thoughtful faces, devout faces, ambitious faces; a gold cross on breast and candle in hand; and after them the Princes of the Church, the seventy Cardinals, their scarlet silk robes swimming with light like a bed of red geraniums in the sun. Some are old, bent, emaciated, spiritual looking; some handsome, alert, aggressive. "There goes the next Pope," exclaims an old servant in charge of us, pointing to a kindly, handsome man, the same, I believe, who died of grief a year or two ago when Leo the XIII's life was despaired of! Ah, now it is coming, the squad of the Swiss Guard in their yellow and scarlet trunkhose, halberd on shoulder and peaked helmet on head, the guard that immediately precedes the central figure of all this splendour, Pius IX., borne high on men's shoulders, kneeling before the jewelled pyx that contains the Sacred Host. In stainless white, eyes closed, kind, blessing hands clasped in prayer, the Holy Father passes down the flowery way, so wrapt in love and reverence that all the Heaven-rending shouts of the assembled multitudes could not win a glance from him during the two long hours that the progress occupied—hours during which the motionless white figure never moved from its attitude of silent, beseeching prayer.

Yet in daily life Pius the IX. was the most genial open-hearted of men. One of his gentlemen, the Marquis Cavallotti, used to tell us of his quaint frugal ways, his witty little speeches, his lavish tenderness towards the poor. These often got from him the last penny that he had in the house. There was a little drawer in his writing table which he called the "poor drawer" and though it had been emptied at one call, the Pope would say to Cavallotti when another came, "Go and look, my son." "But we took the last cent this morning, your Holiness," the Marquis would exclaim. "Never mind," was the Pope's reply, "if for the poor, there may be something now," and there always was.

I believe Pius IXth never forgot the poor. At Easter time many thousands of peasants flocked into the city to attend the great ceremonies. Many of them had walked over a hundred miles, and when they reached Rome would have had to sleep in the streets had not quarters been provided for them in the Hospital of Santo Spirito. Here, for three days, they were entertained free of charge, and as the pilgrims were the guests of the Pope it was the duty (and the exclusive right) of the Roman Princesses to wait on the women and children, while their husbands and sons were similarly occupied in the quarters assigned to the men. On each evening of those three days a very strange sight was to be seen in the great wards devoted to the women. Long tables were set with a generous meal, and the women, most of them carrying sturdy, sunburnt babies, came trooping in, in the wonderful old costumes of their villages, and sat down on the benches with their backs to the table. Then the Princesses, in full court dress of black velvet, and long black lace veil, wearing also all their most famous family jewels, came, carrying tubs of hot water, and kneeling down, washed the tired, dusty feet which had tramped from distant Castelli in Tuscany or Calabria, and had probably not undergone any ablutions since the ceremony of the year before. I shall never forget the expression of proud, fastidious Princess Massenio, close to whom I happened to be standing on one occasion, as she knelt before a tanned dusty peasant from the south, her long strings of historic pearls, big as moons, getting hopelessly mixed up with the soap and water—while she scrubbed away with a fierce determination very little to the taste of the contadina, who evidently looked on this part of the ceremony as a necessary penance to be gone through before enjoying the regal fare of meat, red wine, macaroni and fruit which was waiting on the table behind her. Meat is such a rare luxury with the peasants that all over the kingdom of Naples it is called "quella grazia di Dio" ("that grace of God"). I never went over to the men's side of the Hospital, but on Easter Sunday I used to gaze with awe at the procession of Roman Princes in Henri Quatre costumes carrying huge candles in the Procession which accompanied the Pope through St. Peter's. It was there that I had my first glimpse of a Scotch kilt. The head of a devout and noble Jacobite family came stalking along in the procession, in full Highland canonicals, bare knees, gorgeous tartan, bejewelled jacket, dirk in garter—and a candle as tall as himself in hand. Nobody explained him to me—the Romans shrugged their shoulders and said "Another mad Englishman—like all the rest," and it was not till I took my first plunge into Walter Scott that I identified my gentleman's nationality.

I think that was the chief defect of our queer, exotic upbringing—there was no world worth thinking of outside Rome. My mother seems to have discovered this and sent me off to England for three mortal years to forget Italian and to learn proper English. I wept—and went—and discovered to my amazement that there were people in the world who knew nothing about Rome. The English home was hung with weak, cold, water-colours, and I thought I would show my teachers something worth looking at, and brought out my photos of the old statues. When I triumphantly displayed a likeness of the Apollo Belvedere, a horrified silence prevailed. Then I was told to take that indecent thing away and never show it again! I looked at it amazed—and discovered for the first time, that the pretty god had no clothes on.

When I came back from my exile my dear people were delighted. I was only fourteen, and I could talk like any English Duchess, besides having acquired a profound knowledge of dates, starting with "The Creation, 4004, Cain killed Abel 3986," a valuable equipment for the battle of life! But Rome took me to its heart again and I forgot all the dates in meeting my first ghost! My people had left the villa on the Hill and had come down to live in a much more modern palace, a mushroom thing, only two hundred years old, in the heart of Rome just behind the Forum of Trajan. Of course it had been built by a Pope, and the descendants of his family occupied the first floor, and let out the others, after the manner of the thrifty Roman nobles. The buildings in the square consisted of five palaces,—that of the Colonnas stood opposite to us, with its lovely gardens stretching right up to the Quirinal on the hill behind. There is a tradition that in one of these palaces a man was walled up alive by some genial enemy, and when our ghost appeared, we made sure that it was in ours. He was a gentle shade in late 17th century costume, and every night for seven years, cast his charming outline on the wall of the vaulted ball-room. We got quite accustomed to him, and when we went racing through the room would call out "good-night" as if he were one of the family. He disappeared just before my eldest sister's wedding, and I missed him horribly. There was a ghostly coach too, with black horses and clinging footmen, which used to rumble across the empty square towards midnight, invariably stop at the same paving stone, drop an invisible passenger who slammed the door to, loudly, and then the whole thing would disappear. I so longed to know the story, but the only trace that ever came to me was when a few years ago, a friend presented me with a Piranesi engraving of the palace. There was my ghost, pose and costume correct to a detail, leaning out of the ball-room window, watching the ghost coach, which had stopped at the old well-known spot in the Square!

We were prouder of our ghost than the Colonnas were of the bomb which lay on the marble step where it had fallen in the siege of 1848. It was not till the 20th September, 1870, that we were similarly honoured. One of General Bixio's shells, (one of many fired in fury at being given the post near St. Peter's instead of the coveted one at Porta Pia) came crashing into our library, where it exploded, destroying a beautiful collection of Etruscan vases and everything else within reach. Rome of the Romans was about to pass away, but I must tell of one interesting experience that came to me first. This was a visit to Cardinal Antonelli, a great figure of those closing years. He was considered the Evil Genius of the Papacy, and was as universally execrated as Pius the Ninth was beloved. A modern Mazarin—without the grasp of affairs which alone could have averted or lessened the coming catastrophe. He was the last of the secular Cardinals, having steadily refused to be ordained a priest. He occupied a splendid apartment in the Vatican, where he delighted in collecting beautiful objects of every kind. He received us in a great crimson room, flooded with sunshine, and at once the magnetism of his personality swept away the thought of all the wild stories I had heard of his ambition, his covetousness and his unscrupulousness. At the time he occupied the post of Prime Minister, and must have had plenty to think of, but he received us as if his only pleasure in life was to be found in the society of young people. In an instant we were all at our ease, and then he brought out one beautiful object after another to show us. There was, I remember, a cinquecento casket of exquisite workmanship—a lovely fragment of a Greek statue lately discovered; but the crown of the collection was contained in a little plain leather case which he kept to the last. "If I ever have to leave Rome in a hurry," he said, his black eyes twinkling with laughter, "this is the only thing I shall take with me. You see it will be easily carried." Then he opened the box and showed us, packed into the smallest possible space, thirty rings whose splendour took away my breath. Each held a great pure gem, ruby, sapphire or diamond, mounted in settings of finest workmanship, some copied from historic rings, some designed by the Cardinal himself. The plain little case held a fortune in portable form. He never had to run away from an infuriated populace, and after his death the rings and his other treasures were the occasion of a lively lawsuit among his heirs.

The last winter before the Italian invasion was one of the most brilliant that had ever been seen in Rome. There were balls every night, meets of the Roman Hunt twice a week at different spots on the Campagna, (the tomb of Cecilia Metella was a favourite one) picnics, theatricals—I was in the throes of my first dramatic passion, and Madame Ristori used to read to me her splendid tragedies before she would let me see her act them. With all this worldly glitter—the city seemed full of music, of pretty faces and bright uniforms,—were mingled the solemn faces and wonderful rich costumes of the bishops who had gathered from every part of the world for the Ecumenical Council.

When the almond trees blossomed round the old city walls, we were all tired to death, and spent every day of that glorious spring in the villas which embower Rome with roses and orange blossoms for months at a time. Then we dispersed, as Roman residents do, for the summer, making a thousand delightful plans for our reunion in the autumn. But the summer—we spent it in the Julian Alps—was taken up with breathless watching of the Franco-Prussian War—weeping over the French disasters,—for all decent people south of the Alps were violently French at that time. Then in mid September came the news that the "Italians" (Romans are not Italians) were about to march on Rome, and in sore anxiety my mother and I rushed down to Florence to try and get home before the blow fell. We were too late—none but the troops were allowed to travel—so we waited in Florence, till, on the evening of the 20th of September, the city went mad with joy on receiving the news that Rome was taken.

In great anguish of mind as to the fate of some of our friends—in the Zouaves there was a dear beautiful Irish boy who was sure to get killed if he could—we went out to try and obtain more precise news, and were instantly swept off our feet and carried along in a surging crowd that was making for the Pitti Palace. Every avenue was choked with people howling for a sight of the King, Victor Emanuel, who was broken-hearted that day as we ourselves. When the French troops were withdrawn from Rome, he had given his word to Napoleon the Third that the Pope's dominions should not be molested. He was so furious at being forced by the people to break his word, that, for days past, no one had dared to speak to him. Above all things he prized his reputation for honour—and he had always been a faithful son of the Church. Now the will of the Italian people had proved too strong for him. There was but one alternative—abdication, and had he accepted it, his son would have been driven to Rome in his stead, with far worse results to all concerned.

We knew all this, and unhappy as we were, could feel for him, as we stood, two frightened women, hedged in by the swaying, clamouring mob, below the state balcony of the Royal Palace, where the windows remained obstinately closed. The mood of the people was becoming dangerous—cries of anger mingled with the calls for the King—it was evident that in another moment the Palace would be raided. Suddenly the central window flew open, and out stepped an angry, thick-set man, his face scarlet with rage, his huge moustache bristling fiercely, his eyes darting furious glances down on the howling mob. Frantically the people cheered him with cries of "Roma" and "Viva il Re." He stood there for an instant, glaring down on us, then his face grew purple, his frame stiffened, and without a word he turned back into the room and the window slammed to behind him.

They say he never smiled afterwards. I used to see him, during the few weeks he annually spent in Rome, driving sadly in under the portico of the Quirinal palace where he was obliged to live. It was the personal property of the Popes, and the King was so afraid of dying there that he would never sleep under its roof, but crept out at night to the "Consula," a kind of official dependence across the way. But death found him in the Quirinal after all—and ere he breathed his last, Pius IX, from his retreat in the Vatican across the Tiber, sent him a message of reconciliation and forgiveness.

A month later, he too passed away—Pius IX, the great but unfortunate Pontiff who had been the Central Figure of Old Rome in the days of my youth.

The speaker, on resuming her seat, was very loudly applauded. The President, in moving that the best thanks of the Society be accorded to Mrs. Fraser, said that the high expectations which each member of her audience had formed previous to the meeting had been more than realised in fact they had been, in some cases, quite surpassed. Mrs. Fraser had truly carried them into the world of her childhood with all its hopes and fears, its wondrous surroundings and gorgeous colourings, and the Society owed her a deep debt of gratitude. Personally he was very glad that her sisterly fears regarding her distinguished brother's future career had not been realised; else had he (the speaker) been deprived of many long hours of rapturous delight in the company of his books, and so would many thousands of men and women who had found solace and delight in his writings.

The second part of evening was devoted to a miscellaneous programme of a very high order, as the following discloses:—

Piano and Organ—"Pilgrim's Chorus".....Wagner.
Miss Blundell and Mr. W. Karl E. Vincent.

Song....."A Song of Sunshine".....Goring Thomas Miss Grace Thompson.

Recitation--
Scene from "The School for Scandal".....Sheridan
Miss Schereschewsky.

Song....."Under the Deodar".....Lionel Monckton.
"La vie est Vaine".....Teresa del Riego
Miss Lloyd Thomas.

Song....."Three Little Green Bonnets"
"Going Calling."
"A Boy's Delights."
"Tribulations."

Rev. A. R. Walker.

Violin Solo....."Sarabande".....Handel.
Mr. Oswald White.

Mr. K. Matsumoto, a Secretary of the Department of Communications, has been ordered to be present at the Sixth International Postal Conference to be held at Rome, this year.

YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF JAPAN.

(COMMUNICATED.)

Fifty years ago in London, what is now the world-wide organization of the Young Women's Christian Association was begun by Lady Kinraid to help the increasing number of young women who were going up to London to seek employment. The work with its avowed aim from the first to help young women physically, socially, mentally and spiritually, grew very rapidly, specially among young women in large industrial centres in shops, offices, hospitals, and among young women of leisure. Some little time later, the work was begun in America among women students, and to-day the combined movement among all classes of young women, has spread into almost every country in the world, so that now nearly one million young women of all nationalities are banded together in this organization.

The organization is similar in its aims and methods to that of the Young Men's Christian Association, and under two main departments, namely the student and city, the work is carried on. In colleges and schools of higher learning the work stands for the development of true Christian character, and in more than 500 women's colleges of America, 35,000 students are members of the Christian Association, representing a little more than half of the entire number of students in those institutions. Through means of the student associations young women are leaving the colleges year after year more in earnest to use their lives in practical Christian service.

The broader field of work though by no means more important is that carried on with unceasingly great success among the different classes of young women found in large cities. In many of the larger cities of Great Britain and America, and indeed in Europe, Africa, Australia and India are to be found large association buildings where are centres of all kinds of work for young women. Conspicuous are the boarding houses where young business women and students away from home may have a safe and comfortable home. The employment bureau work which more or less successfully attempts to assist young women in obtaining employment, the travellers' aid work through which some woman wearing the badge of the association meets the trains, and helps strangers to find safe lodging, association restaurants where food can be obtained at reasonable rates. In the central association building are to be found gymnasia for helping young women physically, rooms for educational and social work, where young women come in contact socially and so counteract many of the dangers incident to loneliness which come into many a young woman's life who is a stranger in a strange city, and supply to some extent the craving in every young woman's life for sympathy and friendship.

The work and its possibilities in many cities have grown so largely that the work has been carried into large industrial centres where young women work. In many cases, the employers welcome a work which tends to elevate the moral tone of their employees, and in many cases, have substantially assisted to make possible a work to help their young women physically, mentally, socially and spiritually. It has been a universal testimony that where such work has been carried on, a new tone and spirit have come among the girls, and that the practical illustration of the spirit of love and helpfulness has awakened many a young woman to a true sense of her duties in life.

About ten years ago an advance step in the association movement took place by the organization in London of a World's Committee that has a general supervision of the various national works, with a special reference to the unification of the various organizations in Europe and the Orient. This Committee has brought into touch countries hitherto isolated, and it is now possible to learn of methods which have proved successful in many different fields of activity. In Paris, in May of this year, the third World's Young Women's Christian Association will be held, and it is hoped that Japan will be represented at that important gathering.

Because the organization is unequivocally Christian in its foundation, while at the same time working for and among all young women irrespective of creed or religion, it illustrates in its methods of work the true breadth of Christian activity and sympathy. Because all have been endowed with body, mind and spirit any organization which stands for such an all-round development of young women may expect to receive the endorsement of all those who are interested in the progress of an individual or a nation. Because character is the end of life the Young Women's Christian Association seeks by practical helpfulness to show the spirit of Christ to young women of all lands, and by the aggressive evangel of God's love seeks to bring young women into living union with Him.

The present time in Japan has been described by a Japanese lady who knows the life and needs of Japanese young women as few others do, as the psychological moment for such a work in Japan. During the war, the chief attention of those most interested in the welfare of the nation, has been turned naturally toward work for soldiers, but now, among the many post bellum adjustments is the problem of Japan's young womanhood. More and more in Japan as in western countries, are young women entering the field of higher education or business life, leaving the protection of the home, for the untried independent life of a large city like Tokyo and the temptations and dangers incident to such a transition period in a young woman's life may well give serious-minded people grave thought. It seems to be the universal opinion that many of the dangers could be lessened by the establishment of Christian dormitories where students could find a safe and comfortable lodging while away from home; for it is a well known fact that the capacity of the various school dormitories are utterly inadequate to accommodate more than a fraction of the students who come up every year to the large cities to enter school.

There is in Tokyo a National Committee to supervise the establishment of the work in Japan, and last autumn this Committee organized a local association in Tokyo, with the following officers and committee members: - Miss Ume Tsuda, President; Mrs. Buck, Vice-President; Mrs. Obata, Treasurer; Miss Michi Kawai, Recording Secretary; Mrs. Honda, Mrs. Hirata, Mrs. Tei Motoda, Dr. Tomo Inouye, Miss Mitsu Okada, Miss Kin Sato, Mrs. D. C. Greene, Miss H. B. West, Miss M. A. Whitman, Mrs. C. V. Hibbard, and Miss A. C. Macdonald, ex-officio. With such a strong committee as the above names indicate, it is felt that the advance work which the committee contemplates of opening a boarding home for students will meet with sympathetic and substantial interest. The protection of young women is one of the most serious problems in the social life of Japan to-day and a movement to establish homes where they will be surrounded by Christian influence and protection is a practical method of helpfulness.

In all nations, the welfare of womanhood means the welfare of the race. Perhaps in no place more than in Japan, serious-minded men and women are grappling with the real problems of national life, and among them is this of the protection of young women and the development of true character.

SENSATIONAL FIRE ON THE BLUFF.

Fire broke out about 5 o'clock on the morning of Thursday in one of the buildings comprising the compound known as Cherry Mount, or Sakura-yama No. 177 Bluff. How the fire originated seems to be a mystery, but one of the tenants under whose premises there was a bathroom suddenly awoke to the existence of smoke and fire in his vicinity. As a matter of fact he was barely able to escape by a window. A strong northerly wind was blowing and the flames under the vigorous draught speedily enveloped the whole building. Huge pieces of timber, red with fire, were carried to the surrounding buildings, of which there were eight in the same compound. All combustible material that was touched by such embers became at once ignited and in a few minutes all the detached houses included in the Hotel enclosure were either in flames or showing burning streaks on roof eaves. The occupants had to make prompt escape. In nearly all cases they got out with little except the night raiment they wore at the time and in most instances they lost practically all of which they were possessed.

The conflagration, for it seemed nothing else, attracted the attention of all within view who had been aroused by the insistent clangour of the bells and very soon the affair began to wear serious aspects for residents in the vicinity. The whole eight buildings being quickly ablaze, the gale swept large half-burned pieces of wood in the wake of the blaze—some even landing on the new Catholic Church compound so as to call for precautionary measures on the part of those entrusted with its care.

One resident whose house lay immediately to leeward of the fire and which was saved only by the exertions of the police fire brigade, coupled with the efforts of his own coolies, said his first intimation of danger was caused by a servant who knocked at his door and said the place across the way was in flames. A moment served to confirm this intimation of the danger and the wife and children were promptly collected and brought down to the dining room where with the windows closed they remained while steps were being made for their removal. Meantime red-hot embers were flying thickly and the police and firemen having arrived attention was directed to subduing the frequent outbreaks under the eaves, and on overhanging roofs. In the case of this gentleman a friend arrived opportunely and conveyed the wife and family to his own house. How this residence remained immune can only be ascribed to the exertions of the police assisted by servants and friends who came as is the habit of the Japanese to render aid in such a case.

The case of Dr. J. E. Jones (formerly of the Washington, D.C. Star), who with his wife and two young children was on his way to take up his post as American Consul at Dairen, may be mentioned. Awakened about five o'clock by Mr. Church, who shouted an alarm of fire he said that the whole of the Cherry Mount compound seemed to be ablaze. Speedily realizing the danger this gentleman bundled his wife and children out of danger and after they had found shelter under the roof of Consul General Miller he returned to attempt the rescue of some personal matters, his house not being yet over-whelmed when he left. He was able to get upstairs and to seize a few things but was overtaken so quickly by the advancing flames that he had to leave by an up-stairs window. A small trunk containing some personal jewels, a few ornaments and a silk rug or two were all that he was able to lay his hands on. Among these were a picture from the President (autographed) and a letter from the late Mr. John Hay. When after jumping out he had gained a distance of 50 yards, the whole roof of the house he had lately been in fell through with a crash. He had acquired a quantity of valuable of carved-wood furniture, and also a great number of articles of personal wear, which all went up in smoke uninsured.

In one of the quarters occupied by Mr. and Mrs. McKee a fine Steinway piano was burned with the rest of the effects.

It may be said with some safety that the fire originated in a bathroom under the rooms of Messrs. Church and Clark. These gentlemen had small chance to save anything for they spent most of their time in warning their neighbours. Some narrow escapes were made and when one considers that over a score of guests were on the compound, and the conformation of the ground it is more than surprising that some serious casualty did not occur. It is understood that the houses were insured, but the residents lost all they did not take out of their rooms.

Other sufferers by the fire were Mr. C. Thwaites of No. 48, whose kitchen, servants' quarters and schoolroom were entirely destroyed, and Mr. Balot, of the adjoining house, whose back premises also were burnt.

The Cherry Mount Hotel was owned by a Japanese, and was also leased by a Japanese, having been opened about seven or eight months ago. The building and fittings were insured with the Yokohama Fire Insurance Co. for yen 30,000, while the Hotel property and furniture were insured for yen 20,000 with the Meiji Insurance Co. The total loss, however, is estimated at yen 100,000.

FIRES.

About 7.30 p.m. on Feb. 1st, fire broke out in the office of Messrs Strauss and Co., No. 204, Yokohama. A hibachi, or fire-box, seems to have been the cause. The flames were put out at once, and the damage was limited to a small part of the floor.

The same evening, an outbreak of fire occurred in the top story of the store of Messrs Curnow and Co., No. 82, damaging a part of the roof. It is believed in this case that some sparks from the fire which took place the same morning in the offices of Messrs Durand, Cobb and Co. were blown into the roof and gradually smouldered. The damage was trifling.

A shell exploded on February 1st in the barracks of the 35th regiment at Kanazawa. Lieutenant Shinohara sustained severe injuries.

At 11 a.m. on February 1st, fire broke out on a freight train on the Nippon Railway between Koga and Mamada. One car was destroyed and two out of five horses in it were killed, the others being badly injured. A belto who is believed to have been with the horses at the time of the accident is missing.

After a long period of immunity from serious fires, Nagasaki has been visited by two on successive days—one at the Revenue Administration office on Monday, February 20th, another which broke out on Tuesday morning at Oura in a godown belonging to Messrs. R. H. Powers & Co. next to their Auction Mart. The origin of the second fire, says the Nagasaki Press, is quite a mystery. We understand that there is no reason for any light or fire being on the premises at any hour of the day. The godown, which was used for the storage of general goods, was completely gutted, the goods, which were not insured, being valued at yen 8,000 to yen 10,000.

The excitement of the fire so affected J. F. Picard, a chemist, whose premises were near the destroyed godown, that an apoplectic fit was brought on and he died on Wednesday morning. Mr. Picard was a native of New Orleans.

Fire broke out at 1 a.m. on Sunday in a watchman's box in the enclosure of Messrs. Langfeldt and Co., No. 73, Main Street, destroying the structure. The fire originated in a hibachi.

The well-known Buddhist temple Ryusen, in Aichi prefecture, was destroyed by fire on the night of Feb. 4th.

A telegram from Kagoshima says that fire broke out on the morning of Feb. 5th on Oshima, an island off the city, destroying three hundred houses, including the office of the head-man.

The offices of the Ise Shinbun at Tsu, Ise province, were destroyed by fire on the evening of Feb. 1st. The damage is estimated at thirty-thousand yen.

SNOW.

Nagasaki, February 5.

A fall of snow began last night. It lay to a depth of over twelve inches. The thermometer registered 32 Fah.

Fukui, February 5.

Heavy snow was experienced here last night. Traffic on the railway was interrupted for three hours.

Yokkaichi, February 5.

Snow was experienced here to-day. The temperature was 32 degrees Fah.

Kumamoto, February 5.

Last night snow fell to a depth which had not been experienced for many years past.

Taipei, Formosa, February 5.

To-day, snow was experienced here and at Taichu. Temperature was 3 degrees C.

JAPAN BREWERY CO., LTD.

The eighth ordinary general meeting of the Japan Brewery Co., Ltd., was held at the Company's offices, No. 123 Bluff, on Monday afternoon. There were present, Messrs. F. S. James, Chairman and Managing Director, T. B. Glover, R. Fachtmann, L. J. Healing, C. B. Bernard, Directors; M. Russell, H. C. Litchfield, E. Eichelberg (Chief Brewer), R. S. Thomson (Chief Engineer), R. Wendt (Assistant Brewer), J. H. Dinsdale (Secretary).

The Secretary having read the notice convening the meeting, on the proposal of the Chairman the Report and Accounts (which have already been published) were taken as read. The Chairman then said:—

GENTLEMEN,—This is the 8th Ordinary General Meeting of the Company held for the purpose of submitting the Report and Accounts for the year ended 31st December, 1905.

When we met at this time last year, we hardly anticipated the satisfactory change that was shortly to take place in the brewing industry. The war was still being fought out, with no signs of peace, and the business' outlook was anything but reassuring; but after the great naval victory of the Sea of Japan, a sudden change set in. Confidence was restored, and our company immediately began to reap the benefit in larger sales. After peace was proclaimed the demand for beer became much greater, and this demand still continues is, and we hope, may go on increasing.

There is very little for me to say as regards the accounts beyond what is in the printed report, but I would point out to you how very much the Company has profited by adding liberally to the Reserve Fund. Without calling for increased Debentures or further Capital, we shall this year be in a position to deliver 25 per cent. more beer than we did in 1905.

We have continued our policy of writing down the cost of our property and plant, which now stands at a very low figure in the Balance Sheet, and it is needless for me to tell you, that if we had our present brewery re-valued, or were obliged to replace it, the difference in cost would very greatly exceed the figures shown.

You will notice from the accounts, that we have paid during the year, the large sum of yen 183,228.49 as Excise Tax, besides other taxes amounting to yen 13,806.26. This has been a heavy drain on the Company, but it is a satisfaction to know that notwithstanding these large payments, the percentage of net profit has more than doubled that of 1904.

The quality of Kirin continues unsurpassed, and for this we have to thank our Chief Brewer, Mr. Eichelberg, who with his assistants have carefully kept the beer up to standard. The materials used in its manufacture are always of the finest quality without reference to prices, so that our beer is more expensive to make than most other brands, but we have the satisfaction of knowing that it is steadily gaining in favour, both for home consumption and export.

Our selling agents, Messrs. Meidiya, have worked well for the Company, as shown by the extensive sales, and we look forward to greater endeavours for the present year.

No questions having been asked the Chairman proposed that the report and accounts as presented be passed.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Russell and carried nem con.

The CHAIRMAN said the next business before the meeting was the re-election of the retiring Directors, Messrs. T. B. Glover and R. Fachtmann, and on the proposal of Mr. Bernard, seconded by Mr. Litchfield, the re-election was carried.

Mr. Healing proposed the re-appointment of the Auditors, Messrs. F. J. Hall and J. F. Cox Edwards. This was seconded by Mr. Russell and carried unanimously, bringing the business of the meeting to an end.

THE GRAND HOTEL, LTD.

The postponed half-yearly meeting of shareholders of the Grand Hotel, Ltd., was held on Monday, February 5th, at the Hotel. Dr. C. H. H. Hall, Chairman, presided, and there were also present Messrs B. C. Howard, A. M. Knapp, L. Mottet, C. F. Heinlein, R. Howie, A. Coye, and C. K. M. Martin.

The notice convening the meeting having been read. The CHAIRMAN said:

The Directors' Report and Statement of Accounts for the last half-year are now before us for consideration, and will be taken as read if there is no objection. The showing seems a good one in view of the unsettled state of the world of late, and now that peace is concluded the prospect of resumption of travel is encouraging, letters already received indicating a large and early flow toward Japan.

Hitherto our consideration of the half-yearly accounts has not been characterised by discussion or analysis of them. You were merely reminded at our last meeting that while we had written off yen 292,184.36 since the organisation of the Company, the actual value of our property still remained double the amount of the assets as published. On this occasion, however, it may be that a brief analysis of the accounts before us may assist to a better understanding of them.

Our liabilities, as you may see, are stated to be, in round numbers yen 324,000, and the assets the same. But if you will look over the list of these assets you will see that seven of the thirteen items are either cash or its tangible equivalent in process of conversion into more cash than they represent, while the eighth is a bit of general stock, such as stationery, etc. As to the remaining five items of the assets, it will probably suffice to direct your attention to a comparison of the figures there given with an intimation of what they would be if all the facts were stated.

You will observe that the ground is put down at yen 60,000, the buildings at less than yen 131,000, the furniture at a little more than yen 60,000, electric light plant at yen 8,500, and the steam-launch at yen 3,500; total, yen 269,000. If any person were to undertake to supply such a plant for this sum he would learn a lesson in political economy. The ground comprises, according to the title-deeds, 1,735 tsubo, and you are perhaps aware that less desirable Bund land was sold for 110 a tsubo before the Hague Decision increased the value of all perpetual lease property by 25 per cent. If these facts and the unique situation of the land for hotel purposes are duly considered, a fair valuation of the ground would probably estimate it at about yen 200,000. In order, however, to dismiss conjecture as to the value of the ground, expert opinion has been obtained within the past week, and the report is:—"Conservative valuation would be yen 100 per tsubo, yen 173,500." The same expert opinion values the building at yen 285,640, and two years ago expert survey of the contents of the buildings placed their value on a conservative basis at yen 192,920, exclusive of certain fixtures which are included in the above valuation of the buildings. Since that valuation of the contents was made the additions of new furniture more than offset subsequent depreciation. The sum total of these figures, arrived at by conservative expert valuation of the whole property, is yen 652,060. These figures convey an interesting suggestion, viz.—that against liabilities of yen 324,000, we have property valued at double that amount, and therefore a virtual reserve equal to our total liabilities. This fact should afford the shareholders cause for satisfaction with their investment.

I have only to add that the property, accommodation, and service are fully kept up to their usual standard, that administrative measures are correcting long-standing abuses of opportunity, that a Reference Library is being added for the use of guests in the reading-room, and a National cash register of latest model put in use to check receipts at the bar. A new Manager, Mr. G. L. A. Smith, was appointed late in September, and is showing commendable zeal and judgment in the discharge of his duties.

I now move the adoption of the Directors' Report and Statement of Accounts for the half-year ended 31st December, 1905, and trust that some member will second the motion.

Mr. R. HOWIE seconded the adoption of the report and accounts and the declaration of a dividend.

Mr. A. M. KNAPP asked what was included in the item of suspense amount?

The CHAIRMAN that the suspense account as was explained at the time was originated about the beginning of the war. It was held over in part to meet liabilities already incurred and expenses which were expected in view of the situation at that time—one of pending war. It had since been left untouched with the exception that it was drawn upon for part of one half year's dividend and the Directors in consideration of the circumstances decided that should be left. As to whether it was an asset or a liability the accounts had been prepared by the auditor and he could not venture to speak on the subject. It was a question of bookkeeping and he should prefer not to enter upon it.

Mr. KNAPP said he had only asked for information; he was himself no authority on bookkeeping.

Mr. MOTTET said it was a special reserve, which the hotel might employ as cash.

The CHAIRMAN said at the present time the suspense account was about covered by the liquid assets, wines, provisions, etc., in stock. The fact that the item was placed by the auditor where it was seemed to show that it was a liability but shareholders were quite within their powers to question it. As to the asking for information he had to say that the Chairman and the other directors would be glad at any time to have questions addressed to them by shareholders and to give as full answers as possible.

The motion proposed and seconded by the Chairman and Mr. Howie was adopted unanimously.

The next business was the election of two directors. No nominations had been sent within the proper time, consequently the only candidates were the retiring directors, Messrs. Mottet and Martin.

Mr. KNAPP recalled that on a previous occasion it was said that a board of three Directors would be sufficient to carry on the corporation. He therefore asked the chairman whether this was the proper time to carry out that recommendation.

Mr. HOWIE said he would be distinctly in favour of not reducing the number of the board of Directors from 5 to 3. Members of the board might become sick, and various reasons might operate to make that number inconvenient.

The CHAIRMAN said this was not an occasion when such a change could be made. Their articles of association provided for 5 Directors and until those were changed they could not decide upon having a smaller number. As to the case mentioned by Mr. Knapp it was thought desirable by the Directors then to return to the original number of 3, the occasion for having 5 passed away some years ago. It was the opinion of the Directors that they should be allowed to reduce the number to 3 by casual vacancies, by which was meant the resignation or death of a director, not on the termination of the period for which he had been elected. So long as their articles of association required 5 Directors, they could not at a meeting such as this decide not to elect 2 retiring Directors. If they refrained from electing such Directors then the latter must hold over till their successors were elected.

On the motion of Mr. Howie the retiring Directors were re-elected.

On the question of Directors' remuneration,

The CHAIRMAN in reply to Mr. Knapp said the latest addition to the Director's remuneration was in the form of a yen 100 bonus added to the yen 500 fixed as their fees.

Mr. KNAPP then proposed that the remuneration of the Directors be as before, yen 500.

Mr. COYE seconded and the proposal was carried.

On the motion of Mr. Howie seconded by Mr. Mottet Mr. E. B. S. Edwards was unanimously appointed auditor.

The CHAIRMAN took the opportunity to suggest that greater punctuality should be observed in the attendance at meetings. The custom had grown up, he said, of refraining from opening meetings at the proper time even though a quorum should be present.

This was all the business,

YOKOHAMA MEN'S READING ROOM ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of members of the above association was held at No. 82 on Tuesday. Rev. E. S. Booth, President, was in the chair and among those present were Rev. Dr. Dearing Messrs. M. Russell, E. J. Moss, Jr. (Hon. Secretary), R. Wallace, J. Macbeth (Hon. Treasurer), C. Griffin, L. Russell (Hon. Librarian), A. W. S. Austen, I. Bunting, S. Cameron, &c.

The CHAIRMAN said the report and accounts had been in the hands of members and might be taken as read. It was for the meeting to decide upon them.

The report and accounts were unanimously adopted.

The next business was the election of nine members of the Committee.

Mr. M. RUSSELL said that as the previous Committee had done so well he would propose that they be re-elected en bloc.

This was seconded, but Dr. DEARING expressed the opinion that it would be advisable to elect new members. He said this without any idea of depreciating the work of the old Committee.

A vote by show of hands was taken and resulted in a tie, three voting each side and the Chairman then in accordance with the rules decided that there should be a ballot.

The ballot was taken and resulted in the election of Messrs. E. J. Moss, Jr., C. Allen, P. L. Smith, H. W. Kilby, L. D. Tebb, J. Neil, L. Russell, J. D. Gray, and three tied for ninth place—Messrs. Austen, Lewis, and Nicolle. Messrs. Austen and Nicolle retired and the Hon. Secretary was on the motion of Dr. Dearing empowered to cast the ballot in favour of Mr. Lewis.

Rev. E. S. BOOTH having intimated his wish not to serve again, Mr. Russell was unanimously elected Honorary Chairman.

This was all the business and before separating Rev. E. S. Booth said to make the institution a going concern a hundred members were required. They had a present 85, and he was sure that if the members would rally about the new Committee the remaining 15 could be secured. The work the Association had before it was an exceedingly important one in which there were many departments of interest to the community and especially the interest that had been developed in the past year when they had secured men of repute on the lecture platform and had thus conferred a boon on the community. He urged the new Committee to keep their eyes open so as to secure this year such lecturers as they had last.—(Applause).

On the motion of Mr. Moss a vote of thanks was passed to the Literary Society for the loan of their piano during the summer months.

Dr. DEARING referred to the improved condition of the rooms which he said put them in a position to command the support of the community as they were not able to before.

The CHAIRMAN, endorsing Dr. Dearing's remarks, thought the retiring Committee deserved thanks for the excellence of their work (Applause). Votes of thanks to the Chairman and the officers brought the proceedings to a close.

The Committee of the Y.M.R.A. have much pleasure in presenting this the fourth annual report. The past year has been in most ways a very successful one, but chiefly owing to the lack of enthusiasm on the part of the members, the debates and other competitions which have been got up by the various sub-committees have not had the success they deserved, and we, the present Committee, trust that for the season 1906-7 things will go with a better swing.

Your Committee have had 13 meetings during the past year, at which matters relating to the welfare of the Association have been discussed. The general working of the Association continues, as during the past years, in the hands of several standing sub-committees.

The Rooms, thanks to the kindness of Mr. George Kennan, who gave an address at the Public Hall for our benefit and for that of the sufferers of the 3rd Army Corps, have been greatly improved and can be said to be in a fairly comfortable condition. One of the rooms has been lent to the Yokohama Chess Club for Monday and Thursday evenings.

The privilege of taking magazines and books home for perusal has been much taken advantage of by the members.

Several new books were added to the library last year.

The actual roll of members is 86. During the past year there have been 25 new members and 27 resignations.

The Debates still continue with great interest among a few of the members, and it is hoped that in the coming year the members will join in more enthusiastically than during the past season.

No more need be said about the condition of the Club, for, as you will see by this account, your Committee has been able to keep things going in spite of the heavy expenditure in improving the rooms and also a great rise in general expenses to which the club has been put.

During the past season we have had one concert and two lectures, which have been held at the Van Schaick and Public Halls. The first lecture was given by Mr. George Kennan on his experiences in Eastern Siberia and the second by Mr. Douglas Story on the Campaign with Kuropatkin, both of which were very successful, as was the concert, at which many local amateurs kindly assisted, and the very best thanks of the Association are due to all who took part.

For the Board of Direction,

E. J. MOSS, JUN.,
Hon. Secretary.

YOKOHAMA UNION CHURCH.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the congregation of the Yokohama Union Church was held last evening at the Van Schaick Hall, No. 178, Bluff. The Rev. E. S. Booth (honorary Pastor) presided, among those present being the Rev. J. L. Dearing, D.D., Rev. J. H. Loomis, Rev. A. Bennett, Messrs. James Macbeth (Hon. Treasurer), J. T. Griffin, D. H. Blake, Clarence Griffin, I. Bunting, Harris, C. Ellis, F. Pollard, Viloudaki, and a number of ladies of the congregation.

The reports of the various Church Committees were submitted and adopted by the meeting.

The election of officers resulted as follows:—Elders—Rev. E. S. Booth, Rev. J. H. Loomis, Messrs. Bunting, Pollard and Blake; Deacons—Messrs. Macbeth, R. Wallace and F. S. Booth; Sunday School Superintendent—Mr. C. Griffin; Organist—Mr. Karl Vincent; Ushers—Messrs. F. S. Booth, J. E. Gray, F. Bunting and V. Hearne; Board of Trustees—Rev. J. L. Dearing, Messrs. C. Griffin, Viloudaki, W. Harris, L. D. Tebb, F. S. Booth, and J. Macbeth; Church Supply Committee—Rev. E. S. Booth and Rev. Dr. Dearing.

Mr. MACBETH proposed that the Rev. E. S. Booth be asked to accept the post of honorary Pastor for the year.

Mr. BOOTH at first declined the honour, pointing out that it was impossible for him to accept the post for more than three months, and he thought a younger man should be asked to undertake the duties. At the urgent invitation of the meeting, however, Mr. Booth at last consented to accept and in doing so spoke of the interest he had always felt in the work of the Church and promised to do his utmost for its welfare in the future as he had endeavoured to do in the past.—(Applause.)

A lengthy discussion ensued with reference to the organ recitals given in aid of the Church Building Fund, several speakers objecting to the practice adopted of late of selling tickets of admission. It was, however, finally decided to leave the matter for decision in the hands of Mr. Vincent, the organist. A special vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Vincent, several speakers referring in terms of highest praise to the time given by him in preparing for the various recitals.

A vote of thanks to the Rev. E. S. Booth for presiding brought the proceedings to a close, the meeting having lasted nearly two hours.

TREASURER'S REPORT.

As will be seen by the Statement of Accounts, the year under review opened with a balance in hand of yen 1,480.32. At the Annual General Meeting held on February 7th, 1905, the Trustees were instructed to set apart yen 1,200 for the formation of a Pastor's Fund; a Church Building Fund; and a Manse Fund. Yen 800 was placed to the Pastor's Fund; yen 300 to the Church Building Fund and yen 100 to the Manse Fund. Later, when the Church secured a suitable building site, the Trustees handed over the amounts for the Church Building and Manse Funds to the Church Building Committee.

The gross offertories for the year are slightly in excess of those of the previous year, the figures being yen 1,860.63 and yen 1,773.00 respectively. On the other hand the Few Rents and Donations to the general funds of the Church show a decrease, the figures being yen 812 and yen 1,170.75 respectively. Owing, however, to the newly projected Church Building Scheme and the hearty manner in which it has been supported, any comparison made regarding the general funds of the Church is apt to be misleading. The year closed with a balance in hand of yen 1,168.83, of which amount yen 872.17 stands to the credit of the Pastor's Fund.

HELM BROS., LIMITED.

The seventh annual general meeting of the shareholders of Helm Bros., Ltd., took place on Thursday afternoon at the Masonic Hall, No. 78, Yamashita-cho. Mr. E. W. Frazar (Chairman of the Company), presided and there were also present Messrs. J. A. Harmssen, R. Schmidt-Scharff, J. Helm, H. Mahr, R. Steinsch, M. Russell, D. H. Blake, W. F. Page, F. Dietz, L. J. Healing, F. J. Abbott, and C. J. Helm, Secretary.

The notice calling the meeting having been read,

The CHAIRMAN said:

In submitting the Balance Sheet and Profit and Loss Account for 1905, your directors consider there is good cause for congratulation over the happy outcome of the year. Owing to the wonderful success of the Japanese Navy the mercantile commerce of this country has been maintained without interruption and our company, being well equipped, has been enabled to secure a good share of the volume of cargo which poured into Yokohama, especially during May, June and July, when the new Customs Tariff came into force, greatly increasing the import of foodstuffs. An extraordinary import of railway material by the War Office has also helped to keep our fleet and staff busy day and night. We think it well, however, to call attention to this condition as being of an exceptional character which cannot be expected to continue, and as prudent men we should approach the next year with caution. A reference to our past history will establish the fact that our company has had a steady and healthy growth and we believe the policy of the company should be to enlarge the fleet and plant in keeping with the needs of the port. For this reason we have been adding lighters, launches, floating cranes, the latter being especially required owing to the nature of the new reclaimed ground where heavy cargo has to be landed. The stone wharves are so high that it is extremely difficult to raise cargo to them from the lighters alongside. The increasing difficulty of securing coolies and the higher wages adds to the necessity of powerful mechanical appliances. Much care and thought have been given to each detail of the business with a desire that our company may be up-to-date and able to maintain our present efficiency. After many attempts we have at last solved the Tokyo lighter impasse and a portion of our fleet can now ply between the two cities with substantial gain to our income. A new and very favourable site for a ship-yard has been secured and our repairing and building work is being concentrated and economy effected. Continued praise is due to Mr. Julius Helm and his son Charles for their painstaking care of the company's interests while all the members of the staff, both native and foreign, are working harmoniously and effectively.

He concluded with the remark that he thought the prospects of the year were good but caution should be their password. He then put the report and accounts before the meeting.

Mr. H. MAHR called the attention of the shareholders to the amount of yen 15,500, special reserve fund to cover construction of new crane, amongst the liabilities of the company and recommended that this sum be added to Marine Insurance Fund since it was unnecessary to make provision for a new crane as its value would appear among the assets of the company.

Some discussion followed, in the course of which the CHAIRMAN said it was largely a question of bookkeeping and explained that the value of the crane was included in the value of the fleet as shown in the report.

Mr. MAHR thought that fact should have been clearly shown in the report, but withdrew his recommendation.

On the motion of Mr. Healing, seconded by Mr. Blake, the report and accounts were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN stated that there were two retiring directors, Messrs. Harmssen, and Schmidt-Scharff and as there were no other names nominated he asked that those gentlemen should be proposed for re-election.

On the motion of Mr. Russell, seconded by Mr. Abbott, the retiring directors were re-elected.

The CHAIRMAN said the directors recommended the re-election of the retiring auditors, Messrs F. J. Hall and W. Y. Showler, and he moved accordingly.

Mr. SCHMIDT-SCHARFF seconded and the motion was adopted.

Mr. HEALING thought a word of thanks was due to the directors for the excellent showing they had made and proposed a vote of thanks to them for their services, as well as to the members of the staff but for whose hard work such a report could not be shown.

The CHAIRMAN, on behalf of the Directors and the staff expressed appreciation of the vote of thanks accorded.

This was all the business.

The following are the report and accounts:—

The Directors have the pleasure to submit to the Shareholders the Balance Sheet and Profit and Loss account for the year ending 31st December, 1905.

The suggestion brought before the last annual meeting of creating a Reserve Fund has had careful consideration and as a result yen 20,000 have been set aside for the purpose.

In addition it is thought advisable to reserve a further sum of yen 5,000 to start a Marine Insurance Fund.

The increasing business of the company necessitates constant enlargement of the fleet and landing gear, which is being carefully attended to. Another launch, several lighters and Capt. Carst's floating crane have been acquired upon favourable terms, while a new pontoon steam derrick of latest design has been contracted for and is at present under construction, for which a provision of yen 15,500 is carried forward.

"The net profit for the year (including the sum of Yen 8,349.06 brought forward from 1904) after providing for the above special items, the payment of a 7½ per cent dividend of Yen 13,950 in July last and writing Yen 10,000 off fleet account; Yen 4,432.44 off House Property account, 1,283.00 off Drays and Horses account, Yen 780.80 off Gear and Furniture Accounts and providing for Directors and Auditors' fees, also a bonus to the foreign and native staff, amounts to Yen 24,835.70, out of which the Directors recommend that a Final Dividend of 10 per cent be declared, which will absorb Yen 18,600, leaving a balance of Yen 6,235.70 to be carried forward to New Account.

"BOARD OF DIRECTORS.—Messrs. J. A. Harmssen and R. Schmidt-Scharff retire by rotation from the Board, but offer themselves for re-election."

"AUDITORS.—The Directors recommend the re-election of Messrs. Hall and Showler."

THE FAMINE.

A meeting was held on Wednesday afternoon at 212 Bluff, to hear a report from Mrs. Van Petten of her experiences during a recent visit to Miyagi Ken.

The speaker said in brief that she had gone at the request of some Yokohama ladies who wished especially to know the exact conditions, and how best they could work to relieve the great distress; they and the five mission schools of Yokohama had provided her with yen 125 and four hundred kimono besides other garments, to take along. The clothing was passed free by permission from the Shiyakusho and checked as personal baggage by the courtesy of the railway officials. Mrs. Van Petten in company with Mr. Kawasumi and Mr. Davison of the Sendai Relief Committee, visited two villages, Osawa, ten miles, and Hirose Mura, twenty miles, from Sendai. The soncho (headman) was visited first in each case. He was very courteous, and furnished an exact description of every distressed family in his village; in Osawa, there were twenty in forty-six. Of these they visited twenty-three, or four families, finding the situation to be in every case, just as described by the Soncho. Many families had no futons and only thin and ragged clothing, though the snow lay deep all around, and icicles two to three feet long hung from the eaves in the middle of the afternoon. Some had no mats, and had only bundles of straw to help them resist the cold. The food was insufficient, and very poor; rice flour mixed with leaves, and daikon boiled with beans, being the kind they saw, the leaves recognized were fern leaves and daikon leaves, though everything not poisonous seemed to have been utilized. In one school, five children had no lunch, and five others could not attend school for lack of clothing and food. These ten were provided for one month, at the rate of fifty sen each (2 san a meal, being the amount deemed necessary). Five soldiers families were found, in one the soldier was very ill; two soldiers were wounded, one was well, had but just returned; one family consisted of an old father and mother, a young wife and little son to which the soldier would never return. In one family visited at half past eleven a.m. the baby was crying, the little one of three wailing and fretting and every member looking starved and hopeless; there a child of ten was just starting out to try to beg some rice, the only sign of begging seen on the trip. The accompanying official said to the mother "Can't you stop that child's crying?" And she replied, "I could if I had something to give her to eat, not without." Every family visited was helped sufficiently to enable them to live for one month and arrangements were made with the soncho to send a horse to Sendai for the clothing needed for other families; the snow being so deep that but little could be carried by jinrikisha. The speaker gave many pathetic instances. Four things, she said, had impressed her especially. First, the difficulty of administering relief, owing to the large area over which the people are scattered, and the deep snow; second, the magnitude of the work; they had visited two out of twenty eight villages in one section; there are eight sections in Miyagi Ken, and that is one of three Ken in the famine district. Third, the independent spirit and patient industry of the suffering people; fourth, the efficiency and trustworthiness of the organization; the volunteer relief committees working with the soncho of the villages being admirably adapted to distribute at practically no expense all that they have to distribute. The work is done largely by strong, young men, who walk ten or twenty or more miles, to visit the families. The help needed is, first, money for food; second, blankets or futons; third, clothing.

All present listened with most sympathetic attention to the narration of the above facts. At the close of the meeting, the suggestion was made that different persons should each assist one family to the extent of three yen per month, for six months, and six ladies at once responded. It is thought that this number can be greatly increased as some had already gone before the plan found expression.

The amounts received from the public by the Tohoku San-ken Kyujitsu-kwai (society for the relief of the sufferers in the three north-eastern prefectures), from January 21st to February 5th and already applied to relief purposes aggregate yen 60,688.55.

Mr K. Okura has donated five thousand yen towards the famine stricken people.

FIRST REPORT OF FOREIGN COMMITTEE OF RELIEF FOR THE FAMINE IN THE NORTH.

Knowing how great and how urgent is the need, as soon as our committee had one thousand yen in its treasury steps were taken to begin to relieve the suffering. The first official reports stated that about 700,000 people would be destitute (kyumin) but this number has increased so that it is now nearly a million. Although contributions were expected not only from foreigners living in Japan but also from foreign countries, it was very evident that all that foreigners might give to show their sympathy with the stricken people would amount to very little in the face of such great need.

The authorities projected and are carrying out millions of yen worth of public works that every day give employment to thousands of poor people. Our committee in its first appeal stated that "all funds will be administered in full consultation with the authorities of the three provinces." Believing this to be the desire of a large majority of the givers, we informed the officials that the foreigners wish to furnish food and clothing to those in greatest need. To this the officials of all three provinces heartily assented.

Three years ago, at the time of the Aomori famine, Japanese gave more than twice as much money as the total sum contributed by foreigners, and already for this famine thousands of Japanese have made contributions in sums ranging from the yen 50,000 of the Emperor, through the yen 10,000 of the Japan Railway Company to the yen and even sen of individual philanthropists. It is no small problem which the officials have to see that none are neglected and yet that none receive from several sources and thus get really more than is actually required.

In going about through the famine districts members of the committee have found sick persons and some that required immediate help, but, while later the committee as a committee will probably provide for such cases, so far all the money spent in such instances has been provided from private funds or with money sent "for immediate distribution."

On Jan. 10th arrangements were made with the authorities of Fukushima Province that ten of the most afflicted counties, or districts, of that province should be helped. The proportion of help was according to the need. Seven counties were omitted altogether and of the ten helped some received two or three times as much as others. Official letters of introduction were given the committee to the heads of these ten counties and members of the committee took to them the proper proportion of Y. 2500. Bank cheques were handed to the heads of the counties in the name of the foreigners residing in Japan. In all cases proper receipts were taken and are now in the hands of our treasurer. Our committee was the first agency to distribute systematic aid through these provinces, and this being in most cases the first money received so far the relief of those suffering from the famine it was appreciated accordingly.

The head of the county was asked to distribute the sum handed to him among the worst towns and villages in his district according to the need. Some villages might be omitted altogether, while those in greatest need might receive proportionately larger amounts. The request was made that this be done speedily and that as far as possible the aid be given in food and clothing and medicine to those worst off. In some cases at least, the money was in two days in the hands of the head-men of the villages (soncho) to be given as food to those in greatest distress.

To Iwate Province the same sum—yen 2,500—was voted as to Fukushima, but for various reasons this amount was handed directly to the Governor, to be used however according to exactly the same plan as already outlined for Fukushima. In Iwate four of the counties are omitted and the other nine counties and Morioka City receive according to the need. Here again some counties receive two three or even four times as much as others.

In Miyagi Province nearly a third of a million people were reported to be in need, but with a view to finding the most distressed the Vice-Governor recently sent out blanks to be filled in by the soncho giving details as to the most destitute. It was found that something over ten thousand people required immediate help to prevent them from starving. Our committee met and voted yen 4,000 to be used in Miyagi Province, but, as every corner of the province is in need, no county was omitted, although on the principle of the greatest need some received two or three times as much as others. Members of the committee took this and sometimes travelling over roads covered with snow several feet deep delivered it in the form of bank cheques to the heads of the counties in the name of the foreigners living in Japan. Here, as in the case of the two other provinces, the heads of the counties (guncho) distribute to the heads of the villages (soncho) to be given by them in turn in the cheapest suitable food to the persons who need it most.

We have thus arranged that the final distribution shall be in the hands of the soncho. Even were it advisable, it would be almost impossible to distribute in person to the thousands of sufferers. This was also the case with the money contributed by foreigners at the time of the Aomori famine in 1903. As to the responsibility and trustworthiness of these heads of villages we perhaps cannot do better than quote from the reports of the Rev. Walter Weston to the Trustees of the Famine Relief Fund three years ago:—

"The various soncho seem to have wonderfully detailed information of the circumstances of their people. As we have to rely in the main upon these soncho not only for information but also for practical help in the actual work of distribution of relief, I should like to state that they are usually very reliable and able men.

"I have in my country journeys in out-of-the-way regions invariably found them most civil, trustworthy and obliging, and I am glad to feel that the work which will, after we have left their districts, remain in their hands, may confidently be expected to be well and faithfully done by them under the ultimate supervision of the Governor of the province, to whom they will be actually accountable for whatever is entrusted to them.

"They are elected by the people themselves and are not petty officials from afar, and consequently, their lives and interests being bound up with those of the peasantry they represent, their knowledge of and sympathy with them are usually real and serviceable."

Later Mr. Weston wrote, "I should like to again emphasize my belief that all these officials are worthy of the most thorough confidence, and that the subscribers who have so generously contributed to the fund may rest assured that their gifts will have been dealt with in the way they would have wished."

Our committee has in this way used in the three provinces nine thousand yen of the amount so far received.

SECOND APPEAL FOR THE FAMINE SUFFERERS.

When we issued our first appeal to the foreign communities of Japan in December, the impending calamity was on so vast a scale that we ourselves could hardly believe the official statements of 680,000 people in starving condition out of a population of 2,821,557. Since then, the members of our committee have been through the provinces, especially Miyagi and Fukushima, have visited 29 counties and many villages; and have distributed 9,000 yen. And now we must say that the above figures are too weak to represent the existing misery, and that the wretchedness and suffering are simply appalling.

As to scores of villages, the conditions of all we have visited are pitiable in the extreme. There are able-bodied men, clothed in ragged thin garments, who have to face piercing winds and snows to bring in from the mountains the coal and wood, on the price of which labour their thinly clad families are trying to eke out a living. There are mothers giving their very lives to keep their babies warm, themselves exposed to stinging blasts that must rapidly shorten life. There are even cultured old men and women, who in former days were in comparative comfort, but now are reduced to physical destitution that no words can describe. There are children barefooted in the snow, whose scanty clothing and pinched faces tell the sad tale of only one meal a day, and that of straw and daikon leaves in which is mixed a little cheap rice flour.

If you bluntly ask, "Have any starved to death or frozen to death?" you will get the quick and almost indignant negative monosyllable for your reply. But if one approaches this sad condition of affairs with tact and sympathy, he will see tears in eyes as the hesitating reply comes, "Well, there may possibly be some cases. There was a woman found frozen to death under the steps of the village shrine a few mornings ago. She didn't belong to our village. She was a wanderer." Another reply was, "There have been no real cases of death from starvation or freezing but the other day a half famished woman failed to have strength enough to give birth to her child, and she froze to death in that condition."

Under such circumstances, is it strange that moral ties are weakening? Even mothers are known to leave their starving children, never to come back. The wanderer above referred to, was doubtless one such. Men desert their families in considerable numbers.

But there is no need of farther statements in this line. Rather, we rejoice that there is another side. Amid all this wide wretchedness there is a strong spirit of hope and helpfulness. There is a village, called Devil's Head, snowed under eight feet, leaving 166 people without a particle of food of any kind. Immediately the neighbours, but little better off, raised 60 yen by means of which pittance the lives of these 166 persons are insured for three weeks, until other aid can come.

An old man, aged 91, died, and his well-to-do son, instead of receiving the usual gifts of condolence, contributed for the poor twenty koku of rice, a royal gift that will sustain 1000 people for ten days.

Children in some schools are taught to braid straw and wood shavings, their finished work being sent to Yokohama. We ran across one school where the children make over 100 yen a week and this too where not a teacher has received a cent of salary since November, yet they all help with smiling faces.

Mrs. Harita, of Wakuva, who has taught the art of making two quarts of palatable food out of coarse stuff, so that four sen worth makes a meal for six people, whose recipes have been published for the benefit of all, and whose name has rightly been handed up by Viscount Hojo to the Emperor, is a specimen of these splendidly brave women who are fighting a bitter and prolonged battle for life, and who are thus an honor to womanhood everywhere. It is a privilege indeed to be permitted to send a grain of comfort to such people by our timely and sympathetic gifts, especially when such aid is so highly appreciated by all and so gratefully received by those who are losing hope.

Some people have wondered why rice was not shipped in huge quantities to these regions. It is. There is rice in comparative abundance all though this famine region. About 50,000 koku of foreign rice were landed at one railroad station in the interior of Miyagi Province during last year, enough to last 100,000 people four months. During the same period 175,701 bags of foreign rice entered the two harbors of this province. The godowns are full here in Sendai, with only a portion of the 42,000 koku contracted for, and which is now on sale at cost prices. Rice is within the reach of all the villages, even those buried in snow. There is rice enough. But no money to buy it with. The one great thing needed to save the lives of children and aged is money.

With these statements we confidently appeal a second time to all who take pleasure in extending a helping hand to these multitudes caught in this environment of irresistible misery. By the cordial cooperation of the authorities, your money can be turned into food and at once placed within the reach of the most deserving poor without a sen of cost for distribution. While we will do everything we can to hasten the distribution of funds entrusted to us, we do not urge that gifts be sent through our committee alone. All that we earnestly desire is that every sympathetic heart should know the facts and use any channel that promises to bring speedy relief to even a few among the hundreds of thousands who are in dire distress.

The silk and cocoon traders of Yokohama held a meeting on the evening of February 6th in the City Hall and decided to present a petition to both Houses for abolishing the extraordinary special tax on foreign cocoons.

THE LAW COURTS.

CLAIM OF A DRESS-MAKER.

The hearing of a case in which Wu-Kiansing, a Chinese dress-maker, claims twenty yen from Mrs. Eisenberg, No. 123, Yamashita-cho, was resumed on Feb. 2nd in the Yokohama Local Court.

Plaintiff was represented by K. Ono, a Japanese dress-maker.

Plaintiff's representative stated that Mrs. Eisenberg was about to leave for Singapore. In order to secure his claim the plaintiff, two days ago, asked a bailiff to seize a portion of the defendant's property, sufficient to cover the claim and costs.

Mrs. Eisenberg said that she did not know anything about the seizure and further that nobody came to her residence to seize her property.

In reply to the Court, Ono said that in making a tucked jacket and skirt with twenty yards of kenchu silk given by the defendant, plaintiff used lining, buttons, and other fixings, valued at seven yen. Thirteen yen of the amount claimed was wages for working.

The Court advised plaintiff to settle the dispute out of Court by receiving the foregoing seven yen from the defendant. The plaintiff refused to forego any of the claim.

Kin-Ra, and T. Iida, Chinese and Japanese dressmakers respectively, were examined as witnesses.

The Chinaman, being shown by plaintiff's representative a book containing illustrations of dresses, etc., and pointing out a specimen, said that Mrs. Eisenberg ordered the plaintiff to make a dress after that fashion. The plaintiff made the jacket and skirt after due trial.

Referring to the same specimen, Iida said that Mrs. Eisenberg had asked him to make the jacket larger in size. The coat was made by plaintiff.

At this stage, the Court declared that the hearing was completed and judgment would be given on Feb. 5th. Mrs. Eisenberg said that she was sick of being summoned so often and further that she would be unable to be present on Monday as she was leaving on Saturday for Singapore. The Court subsequently changed the date in favour of the defendant.

The same afternoon the Court sat again and delivered judgement, dismissing the plaintiff's claim.

NEARY v. GEORGE.

A case filed by Mr. J. Neary, No. 185, Yamashita-cho, claiming sixty-seven yen and twenty one sen from Mrs. George, No. 106, came up on Feb. 7th in the Yokohama Local Court before Judge Aoyagi.

Plaintiff was represented by Mr. L. Ideura.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that on April 12th 1905, the plaintiff lent thirty yen to the defendant on a promise that it would be paid back at the end of that month. During the period from May 12th to June 19th, 1905, the plaintiff sold to the defendant two cases of sardines and nineteen other kinds of merchandise. Defendant neither repaid the loan nor paid for the goods sold. Plaintiff's Counsel added that his client had temporarily seized a portion of the defendant's property in order to secure the present claim.

Mrs. George said that she borrowed fifty yen from the plaintiff and paid back twenty yen. Consequently there was standing a balance of thirty yen for which the plaintiff claims. She contended that she bought from the plaintiff whisky, port wine, gin, brandy, etc., which was valued at an amount between fifteen and twenty yen, but not to the extent of thirty-seven yen and twenty-one sen for which plaintiff claimed. Mrs. George further said that business was very dull at the present time and in consequence she had delayed payment. When business recovered she would have been willing to settle her debts. She asked the plaintiff to wait and she also asked the Court to sympathize with her awkward position.

While admitting the claim of the defendant, Mr. Ideura, plaintiff's Counsel, asked Mrs. George whether she admitted the amount due for the goods sold to her.

Defendant held that the amount—yen 37.21—was not correct. She purchased goods valued at a little over fifteen yen and not over twenty yen.

At this stage the plaintiff's Counsel produced a bill in which was specified the quantity and kinds of goods.

She refused to admit it and repeated her contention.

Plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine two Japanese coolies who carried the goods to the dwelling of the defendant. The Court decided to do so on Feb. 19th.

ALLEGED MURDER.

T. Okubo, who is alleged to have murdered two silk merchants from Yamanashi prefecture, was, together with his wife, removed on Feb. 7th to the preliminary examination section of the Tokyo District Court.

In connexion with the case, Public Procurator Miura of the same Court, on Feb. 7th, searched the dwellings of T. Inouye, a workman employed at the Military Arsenal, and two others.

The Hochi and six other Tokyo papers were prosecuted on Feb. 7th on a charge of having published detailed reports with regard to the murder case which is still under preliminary examination.

FOOTBALL.

The Rugby game on Saturday was between "Possibles" and "Probables." The teams were as follows:—

"Probables." (Colours.)		Possibles. (Whites.)

H. E. Hayward		B. C. Foster
J. T. Dixon	3/4 backs	L. D. Tebb
H. W. Kilby		L. Stornebrink
D. Weed		J. F. Drummond
B. C. Lambert	1/2 backs	J. E. Moss
G. K. Totton		T. W. Kilby
A. Kingdon		O. Strome
A. Hills		C. v. Fallot
R. C. Bowden		W. J. White
A. E. Cooper	For-	J. Williams
W. Worden	wards	W. E. J. Detmold
P. V. Mitchell		E. J. Moss, Jr.
A. R. W. Landon		A. W. S. Austen
W. S. Moss (Capt.)		W. B. White (Capt.)

Referee, Dr. Moon, R. N.

Colours scored first, Hayward securing a try which Dixon failed to convert, and Whites equalising later. In the second half Dixon dropped a neat goal and so Colours won by seven to three.

It is intended to entertain the Kobe visitors for the Interport game at dinner after the match. The dinner will be held at the Y. U. C. and the band of the Toyama Gakko will be in attendance. After dinner there will be a varied musical programme. Members wishing to be present at the dinner should communicate with the Hon. Secretary.

We are officially informed that the team to represent the Y.C. & A.C. versus Kobe on Saturday next is as follows:—

Back: B. C. Foster; 3/4 Backs: H. E. Hayward, H. W. Kilby, J. T. Dixon and D. Weed; 1/2 Backs: B. C. Lambert, G. K. Totton; Forwards: W. S. Moss (Captain), W. B. White, W. J. White, A. Kingdon, C. von Fallot, A. Hills, O. Strome, R. C. Bowden.

Dr. W. A. Moon, R.N., will act as referee.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Captain T. Kurokawa, of the Navy, has been appointed an attaché to the Embassy in St. Petersburg.

S. Tanabe, one of the directors of the Tokyo-Yokohama Fire Insurance Company, has been arrested in Tokyo on a charge of fraud.

It seems that we erred in stating the other day that the Leprosy Hospital at Kumamoto was established by Miss Riddell at her own expense. That lady assures us that though she had been responsible for the funds since its inception they were not her own. Her many friends will learn, with much regret, that for some weeks she has been very ill. She asks us to say how sorry she is to have been unable to respond to many letters and parcels, especially when so many kind congratulations have been coming in, but she hopes to be permitted to do so in a few weeks.

Leading rice merchants of Yokohama have held a meeting at the Hinko-kwan Club and decided to oppose the continuance of the import duty on foreign rice and to ask the Department of Finance to abolish it before the end of this year.

The trial of those accused in the Tokyo Disturbances will take place on Feb. 15th in the Tokyo District Court. The trial of Noguchi Osaburo, the alleged murderer of the well-known poet, Noguchi Neisai, which was fixed to commence on Feb. 8th is postponed till March 19th.

Mr. L. E. Lewis, Chief Clerk in the P. & O. Office, Hongkong, has gone to Singapore to take charge in the place of the late Mr. Choep. Mr. Lewis, by the way, succeeded Mr. Choep at Yokohama several years ago. The accident to the late Mr. Choep was due to a defective wheel in his carriage. He lingered for six days after the accident.

Kobe is going ahead. It rises to the dignity of an "Agony column" advertisement, as witness the following taken from the columns of the Kobe Herald:—

ANXIOUS.

Sorry unable to keep appointment Saturday. Snow prevented me. Kindly state details. Will exchange photographs.

February 5, 1906.

On the afternoon of February 1st, the various emigration companies of Japan met at the Hotel Metropole in order to discuss the feasibility of forming one association for controlling emigration. The meeting opened at three o'clock, and the Hon. Terutake Hinata, M.P., Vice-President of the Transoceanic Emigration Company of Tokyo, was called to the chair. An interesting address relating to the Government's favourable attitude to the extension of Japanese emigration was delivered by Mr. K. Ishii, Chief of the Bureau of Communications of the Foreign Department. Over thirty companies were represented.

One of the oldest foreign engineers in Japan has passed away in the person of Mr. E. M. Neale, who died in his residence on Saturday the 3rd, at the age of 84 years. Mr. Neale, who was an American by nationality, arrived in this country half a long lifetime ago. So far back as 1867 he was in charge of the engine-room of the steamer Dumbarton and many later years were spent by him on other vessels engaged in various employments. His last ship was the New York, after serving in which he retired upon the competence that he had secured. In common with many who came here prior to Restoration days he had some exciting and interesting experiences. The remains of Mr. Neale will be sent after being cremated to the United States where he has a sister alive.

The Victoria (B.C.) Colonist, of January 6th, reports that Miss Florence Wilson, an English nurse of considerable repute, will sail on the Tartar for Japan, where she is going by arrangement with the British and Japanese Governments to teach district nursing among the poor. Miss Wilson has had a wide experience in research work in different countries. She spent three years in India investigating conditions there, was three years in Brazil to study the yellow fever, and went through the Russo-Japanese war, first with the Red Cross nurses on the Japanese side and afterwards on the Russian side. She was also for some time in charge of Princess Christian's nursing home at Windsor, and had an excellent opportunity of becoming acquainted with the nursing methods of that accomplished lady, who, though a princess of the blood royal, has made a thorough study of modern nursing and is a recognised authority on the subject.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LEPERS IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")
 Sir,—Dans l'entrefilet du 25 Janvier, 1906, Miss Riddell, le Japan Mail donne le nombre des lépreux de l'Empire du Japon, d'après une statistique officielle. Si l'on s'en rapporte à cette statistique, le nombre total des lépreux serait, deux mille deux cent dix-neuf.

Or, voici ce que je trouve dans la revue mensuelle, Tokyo Shi Yoiku-in Geppo, du 25 avril, 1905.

"D'après une investigation faite par le Ministère de l'Intérieur, le nombre des lépreux dans tout le Japon est de trente mille trois cent cinquante neuf. Le nombre des personnes appartenant à cette lignée, est de neuf cent quatre-vingt dix-neuf mille trois cent.

Voici le nom des Préfectures ayant plus de sept cent lépreux :

Préfectures.	Lépreux.
Kumamoto .....	2,755
Kagoshima .....	1,654
Fukuoka .....	1,435
Oita .....	1,322
Aichi .....	1,004
Hyogo .....	1,054
Miyazaki .....	921
Nagasaki .....	873
Saga .....	833
Shizuoka .....	823
Gifu .....	813
Yamaguchi .....	803
Ehime .....	788

De ces deux statistiques, laquelle faut-il croire ? Pour ma part, je crois que cette dernière approche beaucoup plus de la vérité. Je dis, approche, car le nombre exact des lépreux ne sera probablement jamais connu. Ceux qui sont atteints de cette terrible maladie ont trop de raisons de cacher leur mal et leur parenté ne tient pas beaucoup plus à les faire connaître.

En tout cas, dans la statistique que donne le Japan Mail, 25 Janvier, le nombre marqué pour la Préfecture de Shizuoka est sûrement au-dessous de la vérité. Dans la léproserie fondée par le P. Tesewuide à Kôyama (près Gotemba), qui existe encore quoique ne faisant pas beaucoup parler d'elle, on compte ordinairement quatre vingt lépreux. On n'a qu'à parcourir quelques villes ou villages de cette même Préfecture, pour se convaincre que le léproserie de Kôyama est loin d'avoir tous les lépreux.

Veuillez agréer, Monsieur le Rédacteur, mes bien sincères salutations.
 Février 3, 1906. J. R.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")
 MONSIEUR.—J'ai l'honneur de vous prier m'accorder la permission d'écrire encore plus loin ce que j'ai déjà dit à Monsieur F. H.
 Je S'ai dit expressément que les missionnaires n'avaient pas la tutelle de Dieu non vrais Chrétiens.

Pour être complet, j'écris les principales de la religion interprétées par les missionnaires.
 Ils propageait, en fait, la doctrine que Jésus ne j'aurais proclamait.

La manière dont la doctrine, changée par quelques missionnaires obscurs, s'est répandue sur le monde.

Pour détruire une fausse croyance ou le culte des démons (c'est nécessaire de frapper de destruction de la dénomination du Christianisme—denominational Christianity. Cependant il me semble que pendant plusieurs siècles divers opinion a été demandé l'aide de la vue pour fixer et changer le caractère du doctrine de Jésus Christ. Dans l'épître de Saint Paul — Or je vous prie, mes frères, par le nom de notre Seigneur Jésus Christ, que vous parliez tous un même langage, et qu'il n'y point de divisions entre vous. Christ est-il divisé ? Paul a-t-il été crucifié pour vous ? Ou avez-vous été baptisés au nom de Paul ?

Dans l'église dont je sais, aussi bien que dans tout le Christianisme d'aujourd'hui les envies, les insolentes, les injustices ont étendues comme dans l'union Sociale.

L'est l'église tel qu'il exist en notre siècle. Cela ne m'étonne pas tout homme qui se dit chrétien ne sait pas Jésus Christ—mais Protestantisme, Catholicisme et l'arme du salut.

Je cherchais souvent à lui trouver quelque type du Christ, et en allant à l'église je me sentais battre mon cœur.

Y-a-t-il l'esprit du Christ ou celui du monde ?

On comprend sans de peine qu'est ce que ça—lar, les armes de note guerre ne sont pas charnelles, mais elles sont puissantes par la vertu de Dieu, pour la destruction des forteresses."

II Corinthiens 10 : 4
 Je ne veux pas faire à M. F. H. la discussion, je vais écrire à tous les missionnaires.

YOSHIRO OYAMA.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

THE NEW KING OF DENMARK.

London, February 1.

Prince Frederick has been proclaimed King of Denmark and has marked the occasion by ordaining an amnesty for prisoners.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

The German delegates at the Algeciras Conference maintain a sphinx-like attitude and refuse to be drawn into any discussion with regard to their intentions or policy. This coupled with the dilatory proceedings of the Moors, affords a poor prospect of an early settlement.

BRITISH POLITICS.

London, February 2.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, speaking at Bristol, said that education would be the question of the session. He hoped that Christianity, which all were anxious to impart to their children would not entirely disappear from the debates of Parliament.

THE FAMINE IN NORTH JAPAN.

London, February 2.

The Japanese Embassy in London has received upwards of £5,000 towards the Famine Fund.

BRITISH OFFICERS AND THE JAPANESE ARMY.

Arrangements have been completed whereby four British and three Indian officers will proceed annually to Japan, and will be attached to the Japanese Army for two years each; studying the language in their first year, and performing regimental duties in the second.

TO UNITE THE UNIONISTS.

February 3.

The London Daily Mail urges that a conference should be held between Mr. A. J. Balfour and Mr. J. Chamberlain with a view to uniting the Unionist Party under Mr. Balfour with Mr. Chamberlain's programme.

ACCIDENT TO LADY GREY.

Lady Grey, wife of Sir Edward Grey, was thrown from a trap yesterday and is still unconscious.

Later.

Lady Grey is suffering from concussion of the brain. Her case is very serious but not hopeless.

ITALIAN POLITICS.

The Italian Chamber has rejected a vote of confidence in the Government by 288 to 201.

THE CLERICAL DISORDERS IN PARIS.

Most serious disorders occurred in Paris yesterday at the Church of St. Pierre near the Chamber of Deputies. A crowd of three thousand collected outside the Church, barricaded the doors and hurled stones upon the firemen, who climbed upon the roof and turned on the hose while the troops stormed the doors. Finally the majority of the crowd was expelled, many being drenched and bleeding.

An enormous and excited crowd gathered outside the Church and incessant scuffles and affrays took place. The gendarmes repeatedly charged with drawn swords.

BRITISH POLITICS.

London, February 4th.

The question of opposing Mr. A. J. Balfour, the ex-premier, in the City of London, is still undecided. The Liberal organs urge the conquest of the seat to compel the Unionist standard-bearer to nail the Opposition to Protection, thereby excluding them from power definitely, or to break up the Unionist party and remove the fiscal question from practical politics.

AUSTRIA AND SERBIA.

Later.

The tariff war between Austria and Serbia is concluded. Serbia has agreed to yield to Austrian pressure and abandon the Customs Union with Bulgaria.

FRANCE AND VENEZUELA.

London, February 6.

Passengers from La Guayra report that President Castro is determined upon war and has issued orders that the forts fire on the first French warship sighted. He considers the whole French movement to be a bluff.

MOROCCO.

London, February 5.

The Cologne Gazette, in an inspired article, ridicules the idea of war resulting from the Algeciras Conference. It says that if the Conference should end only in a fiasco, the status quo in Morocco would be maintained.

AERONAUTS CROSS ENGLISH CHANNEL.

London, February, 6.

Two aeronauts named Pollock and Dale crossed from London to France on Saturday in four hours, during a gale. They landed at a place 20 miles inland, in a snowstorm.

RUSSIA.

The daily executions in Poland and the Baltic Provinces indicate that a policy of remorseless repression is being followed by Russia.

BRITISH POLITICS.

Later.

The newspapers are divided as to the leadership of the Unionists. The Standard, Morning Post and Globe are strongly in favour of Mr. Chamberlain: the others uphold Mr. Balfour.

The Times strongly deprecates any widening of the cleavage considering the condition of the party, especially as it is needless to formulate any definite policy in opposition.

It is noteworthy that the personal relations between Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain are of the most friendly character.

LONDON COUNCILLORS IN PARIS.

London, February 7.

The members of the London County Council have had a magnificent reception in Paris. A banquet was given them in the Hotel de Ville. Speeches of the most cordial nature were delivered.

CHINESE AND THE UNITED STATES.

The regulations for the admission of Chinese into the United States have been radically revised. The Bertillon system of identification has been discontinued as it proves unduly humiliating to the Chinese.

THE ENTENTE CORDIALE.

Later.

An enthusiastic feeling is shown in Paris in ovating the London County Councillors. The business of taking inventories of the Churches has been suspended during their visit in order to avoid disorders.

GERMAN DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENTS.

It is semi-officially stated that Count Rex, German Minister in Teheran, replaces Baron Mumm-Schwarzenstein at Peking, who replaces Count Arco-Valley in Tokyo. The latter has been appointed to Athens.

BISHOP HOARE ON THE YELLOW PERIL.

Bishop Hoare, of Hongkong, interviewed by Reuter, says that he does not place much faith in a warlike "Yellow peril," but he thinks seriously of the possibility of the yellow races swamping Australia and Canada. He regards the outlook in China as more threatening than it was just before the Boxer rising.

AUSTRO-HUNGARY.

The Hungarian Coalition have published a Manifesto enunciating their position towards the Crown; but it has met with a mixed reception. A strong tendency is manifested in favour of pacific action and reciprocal concessions.

IRISH AFFAIRS.

London, February 8.

The Privy Council in Dublin has revoked proclamations under the Coercion Acts.

RAISING HIS PAY.

A British Army Order increases the pay of Colour-Sergeants by six pence daily.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE.

There were further disturbances during the inventorying of the French Churches at Alençon, Cherbourg and Saint Cloud. The revolutionaries broke into a cathedral and burned the confessional and threw a statue of the Madonna into the river.

FRANCE AND BRITISH COUNCILLORS.

Later.

President Loubet received the London County Councillors most cordially.

A portion of the Edinburgh Corporation is to visit Paris in April.

The Lyons Municipal Council has accepted an invitation to visit Manchester.

DISTRACTED RUSSIA.

From various incidents it would appear that the Russian revolutionaries are only biding their time. Three accidental explosions of bombs, causing numerous deaths, have occurred in Sosonowic, Odessa and Viellostock.

The Russian writer Kowchewsky has been arrested at Tchentz, in a house which contained 200 rifles, 20,000 cartridges and 50 revolvers.

(By SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT AND THE CLERICS.

London, February 2.

In Paris at the Church of St. Clotilde, a body of clericals resisted the entry of some officials who had been deputed to catalogue the property of the church. The police and the Garde Republicaine stormed the church and expelled the rioters. There was blood-shed on both sides, and the church was damaged.

The Prime Minister declared in the Chamber of Deputies that the Government would not tolerate clerical agitation. A vote of confidence was passed.

ITALY.

London, February 5.

In Rome it is thought that Senior Tottini will probably be the new premier. There is a great public outcry against the confusion prevailing in the financial and other departments.

RUSSIA.

News from St. Petersburg says that the nobility predict a terrible agrarian crisis in the spring.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

London, February 7.

It is stated in Paris that the Kaiser Wilhelm has resolved that the Algeiras conference shall not lead to a quarrel with France. Probably in consequence of the British attitude a compromise is anticipated.

RUSSIA AND GREAT BRITAIN.

The St. Petersburg Slavo declares that an understanding has been reached with England. Serious concessions in Tibet, Afghanistan and Persia.

(Note—The telegram is vaguely worded. It is not clear which Power has made concessions to the other; whether Russia concedes or Great Britain. —Ed. J. M.)

PRESIDENT LOUBET.

London, February 8.

President Loubet, receiving the London County Council, declared that he was glad of his approaching freedom which he desired to enjoy.

BAD COMPLEXIONS

Dry Thin and Falling Hair and Red Rough Hands Prevented by

CUTICURA SOAP

MILLIONS use CUTICURA SOAP, assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT, for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes, itchings, and chafings, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes, for ulcerative weaknesses, and for many sanative, antiseptic, cleansing purposes which readily suggest themselves to women, especially mothers, and for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. CUTICURA SOAP combines delicate emollient properties derived from CUTICURA OINTMENT, the great skin cure, with the purest of cleansing ingredients and the most refreshing of flower odours. No other medicated soap is to be compared with it for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, scalp, hair, and hands. No other foreign or domestic toilet soap, however expensive, is to be compared with it for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. Thus it combines in ONE SOAP at ONE PRICE, the best skin and complexion soap, and the best toilet and baby soap in the world.

COMPLETE EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL TREATMENT FOR EVERY HUMOUR,

Consisting of CUTICURA SOAP, to cleanse the skin of crusts and scales, and soften the thickened cuticle; CUTICURA OINTMENT, to instantly allay itching, inflammation, and irritation, and soothe and heal; and CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS, to cool and cleanse the blood. A SINGLE SET is often sufficient to cure torturing, disfiguring humours, eczema, rashes, and irritations, with loss of hair, when all else fails. Sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: R. ## DEATH.

Died on the 9th inst., at 8.25 p.m., at No. 37, Ishikawa, Omarudani, the residence of his sister, Mrs. F. Abella, Mr. JORJINIO BERNARDINO ECA DA SILVA. Hongkong papers please copy.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

PRINCE Arthur of Connaught and the Garter Mission arrives in Yokohama on Monday.

THE death is announced of Viscount Itsutsuji. He was a descendant of one of the Court Nobles.

GENERAL SELIAN FF, Commander of the Vladivostok fortress, who is now undergoing treatment at Nagasaki, is reported to be better.

THE Chitose, flagship of Rear-Admiral Take-tomi, Commander of the South-China Squadron, left Sasebo on Feb. 16th for Shanghai.

A FUKUI telegram says that a number of the employees of the Naoyetsu Raw Silk Company have been arrested on a charge of fraud.

MR. T. KAWAMURA, Director of Posts, Yokohama, has been succeeded by Mr. S. Iida, a Secretary of the Communications Department.

THE Englishmen of Yokohama intend to celebrate St. George's Day with a Ball at the Public Hall. Mr. L. J. Healing has been elected President of the St. George's Society.

THE following appointments of attaches to embassies were made on February 8th:—Lieut.

Colonel Machida, of infantry, to France; Major-General Uchida and Major Muto, of infantry, to Russia; and Major Tanaka, of infantry, to America.

OWING to the heavy snowfall of Feb. 9th, eleven telegraph poles between Yamakita and Chigasaki fell, and traffic on the railway was interrupted for about three hours.

EARLY on the morning of Feb. 11th two coolies were found frozen to death in Tokyo, one at Yonezawa, cho, Nihonbashi, and the other at Tajima-cho, Asakusa, respectively.

A COOLIE named S. Nishimura (21) was arrested on the morning of Feb. 8th in Moto-machi, Ichome, Yokohama, while trying to escape after having stolen a purse from a foreign lady.

ABOUT 9 p.m. on Sunday, Feb. 11th, fire broke out in the dwelling of an old woman named Shidzu Uchida at Aoi-cho, Ichome, Yokohama. The flames were put out before they could spread.

MARQUIS ITO proceeded on Feb. 13th to Hayama on his way to Korea and had audience of the Crown Prince. About Feb. 20th, he will leave Shimomoseki by the cruiser Idzumi, being escorted by the Tatsuta.

OUNT NOZDU, formerly Commander of the Central Army, has been decorated by the Kaiser with a first class order. It may be remembered that Prince Carl Anton was at the front with General Nodzu's army.

A NAGASAKI telegram reports that on the morning of Feb. 11th snow fell there to a depth of about four inches. On Feb. 11th the Russian volunteer ship Kamichatka arrived at Nagasaki from Vladivostok to undergo repairs.

A TELEGRAM from Sapporo reports that a severe snow storm was experienced there on Feb. 9th. Many fishing boats capsized and twelve bodies of fishermen were washed ashore at Setana and two at Makishima the following day.

A TELEGRAM from Aomori says that K. Kawaguchi, a policeman, was murdered on Feb. 6th, being shot by a farmer named S. Kajima, in the district of Sannohe, while trying to arrest the latter for shooting without a permit. The culprit was arrested the following day.

A HAKODATE telegram says that at 4 a.m. on Feb. 12th, the steamer Kubo Maru (230 tons) went ashore off the village of Tsurikake, Okujiri, on her way from Otaru to Sakata. She sank at once. Twenty-one of the crew and passengers are missing and one was saved.

MR. JIRO HAMA (23), second son of Mr. K. Hama, an official of the Board of Auditors, and Sugi Muto (19), who was formerly employed in his father's house as a female servant, committed suicide on the evening of Feb. 9th, by laying themselves on the railway near Akabane.

CAPT. TRUMMLER, naval attaché of the German Legation, entertained General Baron Kuroki and military officers of high rank on the evening of Feb. 10th in the Oriental Palace Hotel, Yokohama. Marquis Oyama and Admiral Togo, who had been invited, were unable to attend.

MR. HARA, Minister for Home Affairs, has decided to hold a conference of local Governors. He has issued invitations for the Governors to assemble in Tokyo not later than Feb. 19th. The Shogyo says that the meeting is in connexion with domestic loan of two hundred million yen.

It is reported by telegram that owing to a serious snow-storm, several houses collapsed on Feb. 10th in the district of Kameda and fifteen of the occupants were killed. In the districts of Reibun and Shimamaki, five dwellings were destroyed and seven persons were crushed to death and two injured. Six fishing boats are missing off Sutsu and twenty off Reibun. The fishermen number about a hundred and fifty.

FEB. 12th being the first anniversary of the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, Mr. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs, entertained the British Ambassador and his staff at his official residence. There was an exchange of cordial addresses between the Minister and Ambassador.

S. TACHIBANA (52) a waste goods' merchant living in the small inn known as the Kosha-ya, Nagasumi-cho, Yotsuya, Tokyo, on Feb. 13th murdered his wife, Sei (36) by strangling her. The murderer subsequently gave himself up to the Yotsuya police station. Poverty was the cause.

THE Nichi Nichi says that since the end of October up to the present about half a million soldiers have returned from the front. There are still the 6th, 7th, and 8th Divisions, and the commissariat of the 4th, and Yalu armies. Their withdrawal will be completed by the middle of April.

NINETY-FOUR of the prisoners who recently returned from Russia by the Vancouver were examined on Feb. 12th by Court-Martial in the Second Division, Sendai. They were all released on the ground that they had been captured in the advanced lines while lying helpless through severe wounds.

FORTY Russians, including some military and naval officers, arrived at Nagasaki on Feb. 8th by a transport from Vladivostok. According to them, says a correspondent of the Kokumin, the disturbances at Vladivostok continue. Later news, however, is to the effect that order has been restored by the free use of Cossack methods.

THE Shogyo says that the representative of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha is conducting negotiations with a foreign capitalist for a loan of twenty million yen. The terms will probably be:—5 per cent interest; issue price, 93. The paper adds that the firm will use the loan as a fund for purchasing from the Pacific Mail the Siberia, Mongolia, Manchuria, China and Korea.

THE Russian transport Voronej arrived at Yokkaichi on Feb. 12th where 2,319 Russian prisoners from Hamadera and Nagoya were taken on board. She left on Feb. 14th for Vladivostok. There are still about 3,200 prisoners throughout the Empire. They will be embarked at Yokkaichi or Kobe by the British steamer Monarch, which will shortly arrive from Vladivostok.

PRINCE Tsai left Yokohama at 3 p.m. on Feb. 13th by the Dakota for America. At the English Hatoba, many officials of the Department of the Imperial Household, the Foreign Office, the Kencho, etc., saw him off. Previous to his departure, the Chinese prince donated five hundred yen to the Tai-tung School as a fund to maintain the institute and a hundred and fifty yen as a fund to encourage the education of pupils.

U. IWATANI, a soldier belonging to the 42nd regiment of the Fifth Division, one of the prisoners from Russia on board the Vancouver, is reported to have committed suicide on Jan. 31st on the way to Japan, by throwing himself into the sea. It is said by the Hochi that before leaving Russia he received a letter from his father saying that his conduct in being taken alive would spoil the reputation of the Japanese army and cast odium on the names of the family and the villagers and concluded by ordering him not to return home alive.

CHINA.

Saturday, February 10.

A correspondent of the North-China Daily News sends to that journal a translation of a circular sent out among Chinese Christians by Pastor Uang Häu-sheng of the Presbyterian Church in San Francisco. The object of the circular is to rouse in Chinese Christians a spirit of independence so that they shall be able to stand alone, unassisted by foreigners, and the Chinese Presbyterian Church of San Francisco has subscribed $12,000 towards that end. Mr. Uang (we presume that the name would be "Wang" according to ordinary methods of transliteration) heads his circular "A Trumpet Call to Self-dependence" and speaks in really stirring language which indicates profound earnestness and great ability. Inasmuch as the document fills two closely printed columns of our Shanghai contemporary we can not find space to re-produce it, but we quote a few passages which may be called the most striking portions:—

Can it be that the men who compose the Christian Church will not also resolutely recapture our ancestral land and not longer endure the insults and bitter poison of barbarians and outsiders?

* * *

What is already past cannot be recalled, but let us not again endure the past. The Church of yesterday, like yesterday, is past; the Church of to-day, like to-day, is alive. We men with only one day's life cannot but fulfil the duty of the day, and we desire our Christian fellow countrymen from to-day and onwards to bestir themselves, earnestly throwing off the fears and servile despondency to which they have been accustomed, rousing up the very honourable spirit of independence in order that the Church may have a self-dependent foundation.

* * *

Fellow-countrymen! As we hear of this let us each rise up, and to the full measure of our power and wealth, for the glory of God and the love of man, shoulder our burden. If thus the Church will act, what difficulty is there in our becoming independent; and if already self-dependent how will we again have international complications arising from disputes between the Church and people? Enduring prosperity and peace will be enjoyed by all, the Lord's kingdom will speedily come to China, the masses will be influenced, our nation, by this opportunity will turn from weakness to strength, and when our eyes have been rubbed awake, we shall behold a most happy path before the Church, and fortune's road before the Chinese nation.

The correspondent who sends this to our Shanghai contemporary calls it "a religious-political manifesto entirely in harmony with the present mood of our Chinese friends to free themselves from the foreigners." Certainly the passages we have quoted convey that impression, but they are the only portions of the lengthy document that bear such a construction, and, after all, we must not forget that the Chinese Christians are placed in a very difficult and dangerous position if the "rights recovery" propaganda of certain Middle-Kingdom publicists has any significance and if there be really a movement on foot to establish a purely Chinese China. For the Christian converts are flagrant evidence of foreign intervention in Chinese affairs. In almost all riots which have hitherto taken place in China popular rage has been directed against foreign missionaries or against their Chinese followers, and should the present mood of the nation assume really formidable dimensions, one of its practical developments might very possibly be a massacre of native Christians. At all events, to have stood aloof from the nationalistic revival would permanently disfigure the record of Christianity in China, and we can well imagine that every thoughtful Chinese follower of Christ must feel deeply perplexed at this juncture. Whether to oppose the popular movement and thus impair, if not destroy, the prospects of Christianity in China, or to fall into line with the movement and thus incur the reproach of the teachers who carried the Western creed to China and devoted their lives to its propagandism—that is the difficult choice which presents itself to-day to the leaders of the Christian Church in the Middle Kingdom.

It has been decided, according to the Asahi Shimbun's telegrams, that the Yeh-Han Railway shall be taken in hand by a joint-stock company, and so keen are the people to carry the project to completion that within three days after the opening of the lists of subscribers, no less than eight hundred thousand shares were applied for. It is not stated what the face value of a share is, but even if we put it at the low figure of 10 dollars, that means that 8 millions of dollars have been furnished at once. The telegram adds that the people, in their enthusiasm, are disposed to claim that even Chinese subjects in foreign countries should recognise the duty of subscribing. Possibly this very unusual earnestness on the part of the people is due, in some degree, to umbrage against the apparently arbitrary methods of Viceroy Tsen, who sought to obtain funds by means of taxation. Tsen has been denounced to the Throne, and the duty of investigating his case has been entrusted to Viceroy Chou, but we are inclined to think that Tsen's mode of procedure has at any rate stirred the somewhat sluggish pulses of his nationals although he himself may suffer eventually. The Chinese should be perfectly well able to build their own railways, and possibly the Yeh-Han line may mark an epoch.

Monday, February 12.

Among the demands said to have been formulated by M. Pokotiloff one relates to compensation for the destroyer Reshitelni, captured by the Japanese off Chefoo, and to compensation for the two (?) torpedo-boats which ran ashore in Yingching Bay in August, 1904, being closely pursued by Japanese ships of war. We can understand the Reshitelni claim, inasmuch as the incident inspired controversy in Europe at the time, but the case of the torpedo-boats which beached themselves to avoid pursuit seems an extravagant basis for indemnity. At all events, if the Russians are going to raise this question of violations of China's neutrality, they can scarcely expect to get much satisfaction, for they come into court with exceedingly dirty hands.

One is inclined to credit the rumour that China and Russia in these negotiations are both pursuing the policy of asking each other for impossibilities. Thus they will have a long and resultless controversy, which is the most that either expects.

The news of an attack upon the missionaries at Changpu is confirmed. This place is some 60 miles from Amoy. All the missionaries escaped from the station except Mr. Oldham, who is said to be lying concealed in the house of a Chinese official. The latest report is that the rioters have arms and that they are marching on Changchow. The outbreak is regarded in some quarters as an evidence of the anti-foreign feeling that exists in China, and a Washington telegram alleges that in view of this state of affairs the Powers are hesitating as to the expediency of withdrawing their troops from Pehchili. In connexion with this it may be mentioned that Viceroy Tsen is charged with opposing British interests in Canton and that the Governor of Hongkong is formulating strong protests.

In reply to the representations of the Chinese Government, M. Pokotiloff is said to have replied that it would be impossible to withdraw the Russian Railway Guards from Manchuria in view of the unsettled condition of the country. The Waiwupu has therefore gone over the head of M. Pokotiloff and has instructed its Representative in St. Petersburg to approach the Russian Government direct. The question of freeing Manchuria from the presence of foreign troops now rests solely with Russia, Japan having pledged herself by treaty to remove her railway guards so soon as Russia is willing to do the same.

Tuesday, February 13.

Newchwang telegraphs that the withdrawal of the Russian troops from Manchuria has virtually come to a standstill and that those stationed at Kunchuling and Changchun are suffering from want of provisions. The same telegram says that the Russians are busily making surveys of the country on the east of Changchun and that these operations are supposed to have reference to railway building, but unless the line from Kirin to Changchun be in question it is difficult to understand what road could be contemplated.

The Russo-Chinese Bank, which, since the capture of Newchwang by the Japanese, had its place of business in a German store, has now opened a branch in the Russian Consulate. The incident is said to have been marked by considerable ceremony.

The Mongolian King of Khalachi appears to be a man of great enlightenment. There have just arrived at Nagasaki three young ladies, daughters of one of his principal officials. They are under the care of a Miss Kawara, who, having originally gone to Shanghai as a teacher, was subsequently engaged as preceptress in the King's household. She describes His Majesty as being much attached to Western civilization. He endeavours as far as possible to introduce Occidental customs into his kingdom and is himself a devotee of lawn tennis, while, at the same time, he patronizes everything calculated to promote the spread of learning. Conservative Peking seems to be somewhat suspicious of his doings, so that the three young ladies—their ages are given as 15, 15 and 13—who passed through the Chinese capital en route for the coast, had to be disguised as Japanese and smuggled through the city. It will perhaps be remembered that this central Asian monarch visited Japan at the time of the last exhibition in Osaka.

Wednesday, February 14.

According to the correspondents of the leading Tokyo journals there has been held in Peking a meeting of the Foreign Representatives to consider the question of withdrawing the foreign garrison from Pehchili. No final decision was reached but the forecast is that all the troops will be removed except those stationed in Peking and Tientsin. The Hochi Shimbun's correspondent alleges that one of the Ministers accused Germany of having made this proposal in her own selfish interests and of having hoodwinked the other Powers. Of course it is not credible that any such accusation was preferred in open conference. That version of the initiative in the withdrawal scheme is now comparatively ancient history. It received prominence in a communication made by the Peking correspondent of the Journal and quoted by the Paris correspondent of The Times, namely:—

All Germany's efforts to secure a footing in Shantung have signally failed. Neither intimidation nor conciliation has availed. In order to obtain the concession of a railway line from Tien-tsin to Cheng-kang, on the Yang-tze, and to be authorized to construct branch lines from the trunk line of Shantung, Germany finally made an offer to the Dowager Empress to withdraw the troops from Kiao-chau and the neighbourhood. Germany likewise took the imprudent initiative of proposing the total evacuation of Chi-li. The offer of evacuation was received with pleasure and vague promises were formulated, but that was all.

It is not from French sources, of course, that we can look for sympathetic versions of German doings, but at the same time it must be confessed that, as the old saying is, Germany gets all round more kicks than half-pennies now-a-days.

Friday, February 16.

London telegraphs to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun that an influential Chinese resident in the United States has warned the Washington Government that a project is on foot in China to put all the foreigners in the Settlements to a cruel death. The telegram adds that the warning is credited and that precautions are being adopted accordingly. There is no doubt that Chinese mobs, were they cleverly organized and resolutely led, might perpetrate some terrible outrages before armed assistance was available to defend the settlements, but happily mobs never are cleverly organized or resolutely led.

It appears (Nichi Nichi's Peking correspondence) that a complication has arisen between the Waiwupu and the British Minister. The former, in the sequel of the recent affair at the Shanghai Mixed Court, asked that the Court be deprived of its collegiate character, there being no longer any occasion for the attendance of a foreign assessor. The Chinese Government takes the view that the trial, punishment and imprisonment of Chinese subjects should be absolutely and entirely in Chinese hands. But instead of replying to these proposals Sir Ernest Satow preferred three demands on his own account. The first was that a sum of 80,000 taels should be paid by China as compensation for injuries done to foreign buildings during the riots; the second, that all the Chinese officials concerned should be reprimanded or punished; and the third that the leaders of the disturbance should be searched for and severely dealt with. The Chinese are said to have been much perturbed by this unexpected counter-blast.

From the China Times of the 22nd January, we learn that a "Chinese and Foreign Mutual Improvement Society" has been formed at Newchwang. The inaugural address was delivered by Lieut.-Col. Yokura, and the other speakers were U. S. Consul-General Sammons, Mr. Bandinel, esq., prefect Kueihsing, and Messrs. H. A. Bush, and three Chinese gentlemen. Mr. Webster wound up the proceedings with an impressive appeal in Chinese.

The Peking Government has wired to all Viceroy and Governors to arrest Kuo Chung and Yen Chung-yen, the two leaders of the Patriotic Society in Shanghai who were the promoters of the recent riot.

Mr. Rockhill has presented to the Waiwupu a proposal for the employment of Chinese labour on the Panama canal, on terms similar to those on which coolies have gone to the Rand.

Says the N.-C. Daily News:—Mr. Sinclair, the manager of the Eastern Java Trading Company, has not been seen since China New Year's Eve, and it is reported that an examination of the firm's books and safe shows a shortage of some $60,000. Mr. Sinclair was said to be an American citizen, at any rate he claims that nationality, and the money—some $700 odd—found in the safe is in the possession of the American Consul-General, who has also placed the Marshal of the Court in charge of stock and fittings of the offices and godown.

The Nanfangpao is informed that, on the 11th January, a somewhat serious accident happened to the Ching-Han line. A freight train, consisting of thirteen heavily-laden cars, was derailed at Chengchou in the Honan province. Fortunately, no persons were injured, but the damage done to the cargo is alleged to have been very great. The Engineer-in-chief in charge of the line, immediately on receipt of the news, sent twelve engineers to the scene of the accident to make the necessary repairs to the derailed train. It is stated that the station master concerned was dismissed for what appears to be no fault of his, the natives asserting that it was the locomotive driver being asleep at the time of the accident which caused the disaster.

The Nanfangpao says that the Waiwupu declines to pay indemnity for the property destroyed in the recent Shanghai riot unless Chinese troops are hereafter stationed within the Settlement, and that the Foreign Ministers recognising this difficulty have abandoned the demand.

The situation at Canton is still very critical, and unless Viceroy Tsên alters his attitude towards the gentry and merchants, serious consequences may ensue. It is stated that Viceroy Yunnan Shih-k'ai and Chou Fu have been asked to interpose their good offices to induce Viceroy Tsên to recede from his present antagonising position. The Chinese Telegraph Office at Canton is still closed to those who wish to dispatch telegrams referring to the present difficulty.

The North-China Daily News publishes the following letter:—

SIR,—In to-day's issue of your paper we notice an extract from the Japan Daily Mail in which some anonymous correspondent gives it as his opinion that "the business of the Russo-Chinese Bank is in a very unprosperous condition."

Kindly permit us to flatly contradict this report. The Bank has had a very satisfactory year. The Shanghai office and its sub-branches have alone made a net profit of over £500,000, and the Bank has never before been in such a prosperous condition as at present.

We are, etc.,

Russo-Chinese Bank,
W. DROSEMEIER,
J. BERGENDAHL.

February 1st.

It is of interest to note from an official Chinese report which has just been issued that there are now no less than eight hundred and twenty-four foreign schools in China, with 150,000 students and over two hundred foreign and 1,000 Chinese teachers. Most of the schools are supported by Missions. The most flourishing is said to be the American Mission College at Amoy, which has a very high reputation, its graduates being welcomed in every part of the Empire. Its students numbered 314 at the end of December last.

The Acting Governor of Hunan has notified the Waiwupu that the two assassins of the late Superintendent Kelly at Changsha have been executed; they represented themselves to be Turks.

The Shanghai General Hospital has just received a very handsome legacy from a patient who had been treated there and subsequently died. The legacy consists of a very large and valuable collection of jewellery, and silver and gold ornaments, and ware.

TOURISTS.

It is an old subject of speculation among the Japanese what amount each foreign tourist spends on an average in Japan and consequently what contribution these tourists make en bloc to the specie reserves of the country. The Nichi Nichi has an article on this theme. Not that our contemporary directly discusses the probable amount of expenditure. It assumes the figure of a thousand yen per traveller as a sufficiently close approximation, and on that hypothesis concludes that the 13,513 tourists who visited Japan in 1904 brought some 13 million yen into the country, while the 15,256 who came in 1905, brought 15 millions. It is an exceedingly difficult matter to form any accurate estimate on this point. Twenty yen a day would amply cover all travelling expenses and hotel charges for the average tourist and if he spends a month in the country, there results an average of 600 yen per capita, which, in our opinion, must be considered a very liberal figure. But then we have to do with the question of purchases, and here there are almost no data. If the guides kept any statistics they could doubtless furnish some valuable information, but whatever knowledge the guides have on such subjects they keep to themselves, for their account lies in discouraging competition. Even if we suppose however, that, including purchases, the tourists spend on the average one-half of the Nichi Nichi's figure, namely 500 yen, still their contribution to the country's stock of money is nearly as large as that earned by one of the principal staples of export, the match trade, for example. Means of encouraging them are consequently of the greatest importance. The war has been pre-eminently a factor of that kind. While it lasted its effect was undoubtedly deterrent, but now that it is over, and so gloriously over for Japan, an unprecedented influx of tourists may be expected. Our Tokyo contemporary thinks that the great desideratum is improved means of communication and that good hotels and competent guides are secondary considerations. We need not discuss that view further than to say that, in our opinion, the most vital reform of all should begin with the guides. But in truth not much reform seems necessary. The tourists will come henceforth in ever-increasing numbers. Nothing will check them except an outbreak of plague or cholera in Japan, so, after all, hygienic precautions suggest themselves as the most important step.

GROWTH OF JAPANESE INDUSTRIES.

In consideration of the Government's proposal to create a union of all the match factories throughout the Empire, it is very interesting to note the development which has taken place in what may be called the essentially modern industries of Japan. Examining the customs returns of exports during the past few years, we find the following figures:—

	1891. Yen.	1905. Yen.
Figured Matting .....	656,122	5,086,987
Matches .....	1,843,636	10,360,752
Habutay .....	1,445,639	28,057,980
Silk Handkerchiefs .....	2,811,820	4,893,611
Cotton Yarns .....	7,872	33,246,462
Cotton Tissues (including towels) .....	375,407	13,100,171

This is a very remarkable development. Were the ratio of increase to continue unchanged the export of these eight staples alone would reach more than a thousand million yen in 1919. We have not included in the table such things as lacquers, enamels, ivories, umbrellas, lanterns and so forth, for it would appear that although some development is taking place in these directions, it is not very significant.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The Budget Committee had a great struggle over the Australian Service item of 470,000 yen. As we have already stated, the three parties are divided in opinion as to the time for which the subsidy should be granted. The Daido Club favour one year; the Progressists, 2 years, and the Seiyu-kai 3 years. In the Sub-Committee on this section the Daido Club, being unable to gain currency for its own views, went over to the Progressists and a majority was secured for the two years' proposal. But when the Bill came before the whole Budget Committee, fresh difficulties were experienced. In the sequel of a warm debate a closed ballot was taken, and 16 voted for one year, 19 for two years and 24 for 3 years. As none of these numbers represented a majority of the 59 members present, a committee of 5 members was appointed to reconcile opinions, but its efforts proved unavailing, for when a ballot was again taken, 16 votes were cast for one year, 15 for two years and 26 for three years, out of 57 present. Yet again a committee of compromise was nominated and yet again it failed, as did also a subsequent attempt on the part of the Seiyu-kai to open negotiations with the Progressists. This item in the Budget will consequently be reported as not having come into existence, so far as the committee is concerned, and the House of Representatives will have to take the matter into its hands.

It is commonly said that the Government contemplates a State Monopoly of the match-manufacturing industry but the statement does not appear to be correct. What the Government has in view is a union of all the manufacturers, and the conferring of a monopoly on such a union. The reasons influencing official action are in the main, that if the industry be left in its present non-coöperative and hand-to-mouth condition the great prospects which would certainly lie before it under proper management will be marred. That is the broad line of argument. There are doubtless many details, but they have not been made public. The manufacturers, however, object to the proposal. They claim that the industry is in a most healthy condition of growth and that it only needs to be left alone. It is admitted that European competition has proved very formidable in the Indian market, but, on the other hand, that is precisely the market where competition is most to be apprehended and against this comparative failure in one direction has to be set signal success in others. The data available do not suffice for forming a definite judgment on this subject, but we notice that one argument of very doubtful economic value is attributed to the opponents of the bill. They say that union on the proposed lines would deprive several localities of an important means of bread-earning. Such a contention would sacrifice the interests of the industry on the altar of charity.

The Treasury recently placed in the hands of the Committee for the Consolidation of the National Debt—that is to say, the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to examine and report upon the programme of redemption according to which a sum of 110 million yen is to be set aside yearly for the purpose—a detailed arithmetical statement of the payments of interest and principal to be made annually and of the conversions to be effected. The table can not possibly have been intended for publication, but it has nevertheless found its way into the hands of two or three newspapers, fortunately in such a mutilated form, however, as to be of little practical value. The gist of the calculation may be briefly stated. The scheme, going into operation from the year 1906, extends over a period of 33 years, so that the whole debt arising out of the war—a debt amounting at one time to 1,822,796,700 yen—is paid off completely by the close of 1939. During that interval there are seven operations of conversion, but these, of course, do not affect the regular yearly appropriation on account of the debt, namely 110 million yen.

It is stated that the Government will immediately introduce in the Diet two measures, one called the Kido Ho-an (law of tramways), the other the Kido Teito Hoan (law of hypothecation of tramways). The law now applicable to tramways was promulgated in 1890 and had reference solely to the horse-tram then operated between Shimabashi, Ueyeno and Asakusa. It is of course quite unsuited to the case of electric trams and moreover it is a terribly obstructive law. Under its provisions jurisdiction is given to four sources of authority, the Home Department, the Communications Department, the Police Bureau and the Tokyo Municipality. Frequently they all interpret the law differently, and even in the absence of that kind of confusion, it is a labour of infinite patience and heart-rending delay to obtain their consent to any measure. The need of a new law is thus obvious. The second of the above Bills is an equally necessary measure. When the Diet last session passed a Bill authorizing the hypothecation of railways as security for debts every one understood that the electric trams should have been included, and that they were not so included merely because the Authorities had not completed the necessary investigations. That difficulty no longer exists, and doubtless the Diet will deal expeditiously with the measure when it is submitted.

THE SHIP-OWNERS' UNION (SENSHU DAI-GODO).

The ship-owners of Tokyo and Yokohama who are interested in forming a big combination, held a meeting on the 10th instant to consult about the preliminaries of their project. They came to a unanimous resolve to club their interests, and to open on the 21st instant in Osaka another large meeting which should be attended by representatives of the East and West Osaka unions. Briefly stated their ideas are: (1) that although they desire the association of all ship-owners throughout the Empire, they will found the union with such owners as belong to the Senshu Domei-kai; (2) that with the exception of cases which form the subject of special requests, no steamers of less than a thousand tons (burden or register?) shall be admitted; (3) that if the vessels now actually belonging to the Nihon Senshu Domei-kai be all enrolled, they will form a fleet of 32 ships aggregating 283,747 tons; (4) that the union shall be a joint-stock company, and that its capital shall be calculated at the rate of 60 yen per ton, the total being 20 million yen. (This is at the rate of 70 yen a ton. Ed. J.M.); (5) that the promoters shall be civilians of high reputation, business-men of influence and ship-owners, who will take up the whole of the unsubscribed shares; and (6) that the profit may confidently be reckoned at 10 per cent. of the capital, inasmuch as the fleet will burn 750,000 tons of coal annually and must be insured for 20 million yen, so that if due economy be exercised in these two items a large addition will be made to the earnings. The details of the steamers expected to form the new fleet are:—

Vessels of 1,000 tons and over .....	56
" 2,000 " .....	55
" 3,000 " .....	18
" 4,000 " .....	3
Totals .....	132
Aggregating .....	Tons. 82,871
" .....	128,445
" .....	60,563
" .....	11,868
Totals .....	283,747

If it be assumed that out of this total 12 vessels will be constantly laid up, undergoing repair or inspection, there will remain 120 available for service, and of these ninety will be put on fixed lines and 30 will act as intermediary vessels. At present the only regular lines indicated are those between Yokohama and the Philippines and between Japan and India, for both of which it is expected that a measure of Government aid will be forthcoming under the Navigation Encouragement Law. It can not be doubted that if the ship-owners organize their combine cleverly and work it with some measure of adroitness their running expenses will be much smaller in the aggregate than they are under the present dislocated system.

THE FISHING PRIVILEGE.

Some Tokyo journals allege that the Russian Government is behaving in a very shifty manner—in fact they use the word sagi (fraud) with reference to the transaction—in dealing with the fishery privilege nominally secured for the Japanese by the Portsmouth Treaty. They say that the plan adopted by Russia will, if permitted, have the ultimate effect of reducing this privilege to a vanishing quantity. Russia claims, in the first place, that in accordance with recognised privileges of international law she can not be supposed to have signed away any private rights possessed by her subjects in the ceded territory of Saghalien. These rights must be recognised and protected by the Japanese authorities. In the next place she points out that many extensive grants of fishing privileges in the Saghalien waters were made to her people for long terms, some just before the war, some actually while the war was raging. These grants now hold good, she affirms, and as they cover practically the whole of the fruitful areas and are for long periods, the Japanese fishermen see themselves threatened with complete exclusion from the territorial waters of their own country. A similar device is being practised with regard to the privileges named in the Portsmouth Treaty. That document, in the abbreviated form that it took while passing through the Conference chamber, pledges Russia to grant to Japanese subjects the same fishing facilities as to her own subjects in certain littoral waters. But she has made haste, or is making haste, to sign away all these privileges so that no Japanese subject shall be able to profit by the Treaty. The Hochi Shimbun and the Nippon publish these statements. They are probably much exaggerated. In the Shogyo Shimpō we read that there is a difference of opinion among Japanese jurists on the subject.

THE "KINSHU MARU" PRISONERS.

The Japanese prisoners who have been returned from Russia via Germany, reached Kobe by the Vancouver on the 8th inst. They numbered 795, including 87 non-combatants. The highest in rank is Colonel Murakami. There is said to have been great excitement as the ship neared Japan, and one man, declaring that he could not endure the shame of returning to his country under such circumstances, threw himself over-board and perished. Several others fell sick from nervous prostration.

The return of these prisoners has again evoked comment on the case of the Kinshu Maru. It is recalled that in the official report of the sinking of that vessel, the five officers who were with the troops and the Sergeant-Major were all said to have perished, whereas it appears that all are returning alive. In the case of Naval Superintendent Commander Mizoguchi, a court of inquiry has been ordered, and it is expected that a similar step will be taken with regard to the military officers. The fact seems to be that the fog was too thick at the time to permit accurate observations, and the military authorities concluded that all who did not return had perished.

Until the return of Commander Mizoguchi and Captain Shiina the exact facts as to the Kinshu Maru will not be known, but in the meanwhile some interesting details have been ascertained from the officers who reached Kobe by the Vancouver. They say that at 11 p.m. on the 25th of April the Russian cruisers were sighted from the steamer, the distance being about 400 metres, so closely had the fog permitted the enemy to approach. An order to stop the engines was at once given in answer to signals from the Russians, whereupon Commander Mizoguchi, the naval superintendent, Captain Yagi, who commanded the steamer, and Chief Paymaster Iida went on board the Russians. Shortly afterwards the non-combatants and the naval men on board lowered boats and made preparations for escape. Captain Sakurai of the staff, accompanied by an interpreter, also proceeded to the Russian cruisers. Presently Captain Yagi returned, saying that the Russian instructions were for all to leave the steamer and Captain Shiina then gave orders to the men to remain below and exhorted them to sink with the ship. The Captain himself, accompanied by two lieutenants, an Ensign and Sergeant-major Washi retired to one of the cabins and were consulting together when suddenly a party of 14 or 15 Russian headed by an officer surrounded them, tied them up and carried them off by force. What happened subsequently to the men on board the steamer is not known, or, at any rate, is not related, but the presumption is that the greater part of them perished. This of course would account for the fact that all the officers are alive, and it is easy to conjecture that as nothing was subsequently seen or heard of them by the Japanese, they were supposed to have perished. The Russians, on their side, may have supposed that by carrying off the officers they would induce the men also to leave the ship, but had that been their idea they would have given more publicity to the proceeding. On the other hand, it seems very strange that the doings of this detachment of Russian soldiers should be heard of now for the first time, and yet it furnishes an easy explanation as to the saving of the 4 officers and the sergeant-major. When the fact became known that these officers were returning alive, the general disposition was to imagine that they had been picked up by the Russians after the sinking of the Kinshu Maru, but that solution was hard to reconcile with the circumstance that all the five were saved. Of course the whole affair will be made the subject of rigid inquiry. Evidently it has created a profound impression in Japan, though if the statement as to the seizure of the officers be substantiated, the only really ugly feature of the incident will disappear. There appears, however, to be a strong inclination to blame Commander Mizoguchi for not using the armament of the steamer, such as it was, and he too will doubtless be summoned before a naval court as soon as he reaches Yokosuka. It may be added that these returning prisoners complain bitterly of the treatment they received at the hands of the Russians. When carried off forcibly some of them were only partially clad, yet no clothes were subsequently furnished, and they say that in the matter of food and general usage they fared as badly as in that of clothes. It is evident that the conduct of the Russians towards prisoners varied considerably.

THE NATIONALIZATION OF THE RAILWAYS.

We read in the Asahi Shimbun that the Bill for State ownership of railways will certainly be introduced in the House of Representatives at an early date. The Diet has now shown itself complacent with regard to the projects which were expected to cause most trouble, namely, those connected with the Estimates. There remain now six questions to be disposed of, namely:—

1. The Nationalization of the Railways.
2. The Monopoly of Matches Manufacture.
3. The Bill for establishing a uniform System of Surfacing Habutaye (Habutaye seiren toitsu).
4. The Bill for amending the system of Urban Land Taxation.
5. The Bill for extending the Operation of Law No. 63 in Formosa.
6. The Silk-conditioning Bill.

It is predicted that the first of these measures will be laid before the Diet on the 16th or 17th instant, and that the terms of purchase will be based on the average nett earnings of the railways during the three years immediately prior to the war. The Government is represented as anticipating no difficulty in making a bargain on that basis, but the press is by no means equally confident. It is pointed out that the revival of trade consequent upon the restoration of peace has set in, and that one of its results has been such a large movement of goods and passengers as to open very bright prospects for the railways and greatly enhance the market value of their shares. They will be unwilling, therefore, to sell at prices determined by the conditions existing before the war when the country lay under a serious menace. On the other hand, the recent appreciation of their shares is doubtless due in part to the prospect of State purchase, and it will be very difficult to differentiate the factors that have made for appreciation. Hence, even if the Bill passes the Diet, insuperable difficulties may arise in attempting to carry it into operation.

Tokyo newspapers allege that the details of the railway nationalization bill have now been settled and that the measure will be at once submitted to the Diet. Seventeen railways in all have to be purchased, namely, the five principal roads and the twelve secondary. They are to be bought—we quote our vernacular contemporaries—on the basis of their average nett profits during the two years immediately prior to the war, namely, 1902 and 1903, and the first year of the war, namely, 1904. Such, at all events, is the statement now made, but all the forecasts previously published spoke of the three years antecedent to the war, namely, 1901, 1902 and 1903, which would seem a juster method. The average figure thus obtained is to be multiplied by 20, and the product will be regarded as the purchase value. Thus a road paying 7 per cent. will receive a sum of 140 yen for every 100 yen of its paid-up capital. The Seoul-Fusan line is also to be included, and the assessment in its case is said to be on the assumption that 15 millions have been actually subscribed, that 5 millions of debts have been contracted and that 5 millions should be paid for the right of property.

THE BUDGET.

We may now assume that the whole Budget will be adopted by the House of Representatives with only trivial alterations and that the almost unprecedented event will be witnessed of accord between the Cabinet and the Diet from the outset. Hitherto the Budget has invariably been a bone of contention and has barely "found its way into existence," as the phrase goes, through the medium of compromises more or less extensive on the part of the Government. But on this occasion appearances indicate that the only concession which the Cabinet will be asked to make is a matter of five million yen in the extraordinary expenditures for the Army and Navy under the heading of "restorations of material," and even that reduction is to be left to the discretion of the Ministers concerned. This constitutes the nearest approach to government by party yet witnessed in Japan. The Ministry has the support of the Seiyun-kai and thus the nation has the satisfaction of witnessing an unprecedentedly smooth administrative and legislative spectacle. Possibly this may do more for the cause of party cabinets than all the struggles of the past have accomplished. At the same time it is most noteworthy that so far as the strength of any one party is concerned no legislatively stable Ministry could be found. The Seiyun-kai and the Progressists alike are very far from possessing strength sufficient to carry any measure through the Houses. It is in the hands of the Daido Club that the balance of power lies, although the Daido Club, as an independent organization is weaker than either of the two great parties. This is a curious situation. Are we to regard it as an accidental grouping of politicians, or is it the course that Japanese politics might have been expected to take, or does it represent a very clever manoeuvre on the part of those statesmen whose faith in the efficiency of party cabinets is weak and who believe, at any rate, that Japan is not yet prepared for that kind of administrative machinery? When the Daido club was organized people showed a disposition to ridicule it as a congeries of heterogeneous elements which would split up into fragments at the first impact with practical affairs, and its alleged promoters, Barons Sone and Kioura, came in for a share of the criticism. But the Daido Club is now an unequivocal power in the State and it has been able to demonstrate its competence in a very striking manner.

THE ZIETEN AFFAIR.

Baron Suyematsu and his party have reached Nagasaki and have been interviewed by press representatives, the result being that the Zieten affair becomes more mysterious than ever. The Baron is now said to have declared that the treatment he received on board was humiliating, and that to this day not the smallest apology has been tendered to him. He adds that he felt much sympathy with the Chinese Minister who experienced the same treatment. How is all this to be reconciled with the explicit assertion of the Agents, published in several newspapers, to the effect that Baron Suyematsu had authorized the statement to be given out that he was convinced that no discourtesy was intended by the officers of the Zieten towards him and that he was "quite satisfied with the arrangements provided," while the Chinese Minister also was quoted as "expressing full satisfaction." There is some mistake somewhere. We have no doubt that it will be cleared up, nor have we any doubt that whatever error the officers of a German steamer may have made in such a matter, the company employing them will certainly not endorse it. The incident has assumed undue importance owing to all these asseverations and denials.

The mystery of this business increases. Mr. Ishikawa, correspondent of the Hochi Shimbun, sends to that journal a precis of statements obtained direct by him from Professor Takakusu and Baron Suyematsu on board the steamer at Hongkong. Both speak in the strongest terms of the rude treatment extended to them as well as to the Chinese Minister who was returning by the same vessel. They allege that the officers of the ship evidently regarded the Japanese and the Chinese as altogether inferior races and herded them together in positions conspicuously lower even than that accorded to a Malay woman who happened to be the wife of a German subject. The Chinese Minister was not less exasperated than were Baron Suyematsu, Professor Takakusu and Captain Kaburagi, for he felt, as they did, that to submit tamely to such a humiliating discrimination would be to expose their countrymen to similar insult on future occasions. A remonstrance was addressed to the Captain—in what form the report does not say—but he paid no attention whatever to it. Subsequently a document was compiled on board, bearing testimony to the courtesy of the captain and officers of the steamer, declaring that everything had been managed properly and that the complaints made by some of the passengers were groundless. The American and British passengers refused to sign it, but the Russians and Germans did so readily. Can it be that this document inspired the telegram recently addressed to the Company's agents in Yokohama and communicated by them to the press? At all events up to this moment Baron Suyematsu does not appear to have made any such retraction as that attributed to him by the telegram.

On the arrival of the Zieten in Kobe a representative of the Asahi Shimbun waited on Baron Suyematsu and learned from him that his protest had been inspired less on his own account than on the account of his nationals generally and on that of all Oriental peoples, inasmuch as the latter are habitually discriminated against when travelling by foreign steamers to and from the Occident. There is, however, one point calling for special notice in the Baron's remarks. He is quoted as saying that on the ship's arrival at Colombo the German Consul came on board. He had read the Reuter's telegram relating to the complaint, and he desired to explain that there was no intention on the part of the steamer's officers to show any want of due courtesy. He also asked whether Baron Suyematsu desired to be placed in a better seat. The Baron replied that he had himself had his place altered (mizukara seki-i wo aratamete) and that he did not wish for any higher place. Probably this is the origin of the Company's announcement that the Baron was satisfied. We agree with Baron Suyematsu that in the interest of Orientals generally his protest may be of much value, but possibly the alleged discrimination is due, not to any discourteous estimate, but rather to the consideration that passengers are happier and more comfortable when they find themselves among their own nationals with whom they can converse in their own language. It is hard that the German Company should have been so unfortunate as to be the corpus vile of the complaint, for the Norddeutscher Lloyd's civility to passengers is proverbial.

We learn that Baron Suyematsu, after his arrival in Tokyo, had a conversation about the Zieten incident with the German Minister, Count Arco-Valley. The Baron confirmed what he had said to the German Lloyd's Agent in Colombo, namely that he was satisfied as to the Agent's assurances of the absence of any intentional discourtesy on the part of the Company or the Captain or any one on board the steamer. He declared that for him the incident is now closed. So far as we have been able to ascertain, the explanation of this affair is simple. When Baron Suyematsu joined the steamer no intimation of his rank had been conveyed to the captain and consequently no special arrangements had been made on his account. Thus the seat falling to him at table was naturally that which remained vacant, and it happened to be a seat which would not have been assigned to a traveller of his social and political status had the latter been known and had there been opportunity to distribute the seats ab initio. Doubtless had the Baron made complaint to the captain a remedial step would have been taken, but he referred the matter to the steward, who appears not to have treated it very seriously. It is now admitted fully, however, that no discourtesy of any kind was intended, and the matter may very well be suffered to pass into oblivion. We do not doubt that the Baron's action will be found hereafter to have usefully served his nationals in their over-sea journeys by foreign steamers.

KOREA.

The Korean Prince who recently visited Japan by way of returning the compliment of Marquis Ito's visit to Seoul, returned to the Korean capital on the 9th instant, and is said to have presented a report expressing much appreciation of the treatment extended to him by the Japanese during his stay in Tokyo. The Prince further declares that he was greatly struck by the equipment of Japan for all useful enterprises, by the universality of education, and by the excellence of the country's husbandry.

It is stated that the 13 divisions of Korea will be reduced to 9 for administrative purposes, and that the change will be promulgated on Marquis Ito's arrival in Seoul. The British Legation in Seoul was closed on the 8th instant and the duty of protecting British interests in Korea devolved on the Consul-General.

Rumour says that in connexion with financial reforms in Korea some three thousand of the five thousand odd officials in the Imperial Household will be dismissed. This will add three thousand new names to the list of the reformers' enemies, and the reformers are the Japanese.

Mr. Hayashi is to leave Seoul on the 18th instant. He will meet Marquis Ito at Bakan and then return to Tokyo.

Mr. Douglas Story, according to telegrams from London, has sent by wire from Chefoo, at the special request of the Emperor of Korea, an appeal against Japan. The Monarch addresses himself to the Powers of the West, declares that he has never consented to the establishment of a Residency-general, denies that any convention in that sense was concluded between his country and Japan, and entreates that he and his empire be taken under the protection of Occidental States for a period of five years. This remarkable appeal is published by the Tribune, and the Hochi Shimbun's London correspondent sends the news to Japan. He adds that the publication has produced no manner of effect in England. People there take the matter quite coolly. Probably they regard it, as all well-informed on-lookers must regard it, simply as a device to exploit Korea in the interests of foreign adventurers. An attempt of a similar nature made in America by Mr. Hulbert appears to have fallen equally flat. We do not desire to suggest that either Mr. Story or Mr. Hulbert is deliberately lending himself to a trick, or that either of the two is inspired by unworthy motives. But we do emphatically say that both are taking a very silly line. Mr. Story may possibly be actuated solely by journalistic considerations. It would distinctly be what American correspondents elegantly call a "scoop" to convey such intelligence, by way of monopoly, to a London journal. Mr. Story, therefore, has some excuse and besides he can not be practically well versed in Far-Eastern affairs. But Mr. Hulbert has made a study of Korea. What future does he foresee for that country if it be removed from Japan's protectorate? Does he imagine that it can stand alone or does he desire to see Seoul once again restored to its old welter of international intrigue? Does he care anything for the welfare of the Koreans themselves, and does he imagine for one moment that their happiness would be better promoted by remaining under the administrative sway of the Min's and the Li's who have hitherto edified the world by their corruption and oppression, than by passing under the direction of a statesman like Marquis Ito and by being brought within full range of the enlightenment represented by Japan? We can not but call the action of these agitators simply mischievous interference calculated to work incomparable mischief did there not stand between their giddiness and practical results that fortunate bulwark, the solid common-sense of Europe and America.

The Official Gazette publishes the facsimile of a flag which is to float over the Residency-General in Seoul and to be flown by the ship that carries the Resident-General to his post. The flag has a blue ground and one fourth of its face is reserved in white enclosing a rising sun in red. It is stated that the Resident-General is to be treated exactly like a Field-Marshal in the matter of salutes and guards of honour.

THE DOMESTIC LOAN.

The bankers of Tokyo, Osaka and Nagoya met on the 13th instant at 6 p.m. in the official residence of the Minister of Finance. Marquis Saionji was present, as was also Count Inouye. Mr. Sakatani explained the purpose of the meeting. Peace, he said, had been conventionally restored but until all the troops had been brought back from the field a state of war must be considered to exist so far as finance was concerned. It thus became necessary to raise a domestic loan of 363 million yen, partly for the repatriation of the troops and other military purposes, and partly for rewards to the Services. The sum required was 363 millions in all, but of that amount the money needed for rewards aggregated 150 millions, and this would be met by the Deposits Bureau of the Finance Department. Thus the assistance of the banks was sought with regard to 213 millions only, and while the Government did not press for any special consideration, they trusted that the question would be approached in a patriotic spirit. After a brief address by Marquis Saionji, the party repaired to dinner, after which the Minister of Finance took occasion to call attention to the highly meritorious services rendered by Mr. Takahashi, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, who had successfully achieved the difficult task of negotiating the foreign loans (Mr. Takahashi had returned from Europe that same afternoon). Count Inouye also spoke, urging the bankers to respond liberally to the country's call. Baron Shibusawa, speaking on behalf of all the bankers present, said that he and his colleagues did not yield to the men of the Army and the Navy in loyalty to the country, and that they would exert themselves on this occasion to the utmost of their ability. After dinner Mr. Takahashi gave a most interesting account of his experiences in Europe and the party broke up. Nothing was said as to the terms and conditions of the loan; those points were to be settled later. But Tokyo papers allege that there is mutual agreement as to the questions of interest (5 per cent.) and rate of issue (92 or 93).

On the 14th instant the principal bankers of Tokyo, Osaka, Kyoto and Nagoya met at the Mitsui Club in Tokyo. Count Inouye was present and after a speech by him dinner was served. Mr. Matsuo, President of the Bank of Japan, then spoke, and Baron Shibusawa replied on behalf of the bankers. It was finally decided that a loan of 200 million yen should be floated at once, and that it should be underwritten by the banks at 95, the interest being 5 per cent. and the period of redemption 30 years. The exact date of issue and the amount of commission are to be settled subsequently. It is alleged that these bonds will enjoy the special privilege of being exempt from income tax which, in the case of such securities, is usually 2 per cent. of the interest. Rumour alleges that there are many foreign subscribers. One is spoken of as applying for 30 million yen worth of bonds. The Nichi Nichi Shinbun notes that the time is especially favourable for floating this loan. The Bank of Japan's note issues totalled, on the 14th instant, only 244 million yen, and it has a reserve of note-issuing power amounting to one million. Of its loans 50 millions were to the Government and 47 millions to the public. Its deposits are 24 millions and it has a specie reserve of 125 millions.

CELEBRATIONS IN TOKYO.

Five thousand soldiers were entertained by the Tokyo Municipality in Hibiya Park on Friday. The detail shows that they all belonged to the First Division, the Guards having been entertained on a previous occasion. The troops paraded in Ueno Park at 6 a.m., and marched thence to Hibiya, reaching it at 1 p.m., moving by the main street, and turning from Shimbashi towards Hibiya. The cars of the Electric Tram were stopped throughout the forenoon. There was an address read by the chief manager—Baron Shibusawa—and Field Marshal Nozu replied, after which the booths were opened for the guests to eat luncheon.

The great festival of worship is to take place at the Yasukuni Shrine from the 3rd to the 5th of May. General Nogai is to be President of the Committee of Management. It is stated that prayers will be offered for the spirits of thirty thousand men, and as the act of worship last year was for nearly the same number, it would appear that the deaths in battle or from wounds on the Japanese side totalled about sixty thousand. Those that died from disease are separate: there is to be a later ceremony on their account. Our readers are aware that the grand review is to take place on the 30th of April. Tokyo papers state that one feature of the day will be a parade of weapons captured from the Russians. The place of the display will be the park outside the Niju bridge of the Palace, and there will be from 300 to 400 pieces of artillery, from twenty to thirty thousand stand of small arms and an immense number of swords and bayonets. A very interesting feature will be witnessed in the vicinity of the equestrian statue of Kusunoki Masashige. A trench is to be dug round the pedestal and wire entanglements as well as machine-guns will be placed in position, the whole being illuminated by search-lights at night. Of course everything used in these exhibitions will have been taken from the Russians.

THE BUDGET FOR 1906-7.

To complete the synopsis of the Budget which was commenced in our issue of the 10th instant, we add the following:—

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET FOR 1905-6.
This Budget provides for the appropriation of a sum of 7,200,000 yen as extraordinary expenditure arising out of the situation (i.e. the war). The money is required to pay interest on loans in excess of the sum allowed in the Budget of Reserves against Extraordinary Expenses arising out of the situation. N. B.—Speaking in the Diet on the 25th of January, the Minister of Finance said:—"The 80 million yen set aside as Reserves against Extraordinary Expenses arising out of the Situation for the fiscal year 1905-6, proved insufficient by 36 millions owing to developments in the situation which involved the payment of interest and principal of loans. Out of this deficiency of 36 millions, a sum of 28,800,000 was paid out under the authority of Imperial Ordinance, and the remaining 7,200,000 yen has to be provided by means of a supplementary Budget, the funds for which it is proposed to take from the Treasury's surplus."

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET NO. 2 FOR THE YEAR 1906-7.

This Budget provides for appropriations totalling 416,712,767 yen, the purposes being as follow:—

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE.
Interest and Principal of Loans, and Fees.	43,350,000
Pensions to military men.	1,359,887
Expenses of handling Treasury Funds and investigating the state of the Money market.	575,820
Repayments of various outlays.	460,238
Total.	45,745,945
Appropriations for other Departments.	966,822
Total.	46,712,767

Funds to meet these outlays are provided by taking 43,350,000 yen from the loan of 50 million pounds sanctioned by Imperial Ordinance No. 241 of the year 1905, and by drafting 3,362,767 yen from the surplus of the preceding year.

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET OF EXTRAORDINARY WAR OUTLAYS.

This Budget provides a sum of 450,450,000 yen, which is to be applied (1) to meeting extra outlays resulting from the appreciation of prices; (2) to repatriation of the troops; (3) to defraying expenses in Manchuria and Korea; and (4) to rewards. The Minister of Finance, speaking on the 24th of January explained that a sum of 510 millions in all would be needed for supplementary purposes, but that as 60 millions had already been spent under the authority of an Imperial Ordinance, only 450 millions remained to be dealt with by the Diet. The whole of this sum (450 millions) was to be found by means of loans, but as 88 millions had already been floated, only 362 millions more have to be provided.

In addition to the total of the above "Supplementary Budget of War Outlays," there is a sum of over 84 million yen assigned to the Department of Finance. We give the details of these expenditures below, but it is convenient to explain here that means to defray them are to be found from two sources, namely, 16 millions from the sale of unrequired properties held by the Army and Navy, and 68 millions from loans. If we add this 68 millions to the 362 millions shown in the preceding paragraph under the heading "Supplementary Budget of Extraordinary War Outlays," it results that the total to be actually raised by domestic loans is 430 millions.

PRINCE ARTHUR.

The Tokyo Municipality will entertain Prince Arthur in the Hibiya Park on the 26th instant. The nature of the fête is not yet absolutely fixed, but there will probably be Horohiki, Dakin, Daimyo Gyoretsu and Jidai Gyoretsu. Evidently the idea is to show the Prince something of the life of old Japan. Other interesting items are a geisha dance, a song by the school boys of the capital, athletic sports, wrestling, Jujutsu, fencing (including Kawarake-jiai), daikagura, acrobatics and fireworks.

The entertainment at the Palace on the 20th instant in honour of Prince Arthur is to be an exceptionally great affair, according to Tokyo journals. They speak of it as though an evening party were contemplated, but we believe that it is merely to be a banquet. A great deal is said about the preparations which are in progress for the Prince's welcome, but there is no information that differs from what has already appeared in our columns on the subject.

OFFICIAL PROGRAMME.

Prince Arthur of Connaught is reported to have left Shanghai on the evening of the 13th by the cruiser Diadem, and is expected to arrive at Yokohama on Monday the 19th inst. at 10 a.m. An hour later, he will proceed to Tokyo by special train, and on arrival will immediately drive to the Kasumi-ga-seki Detached Palace, where he is to be accommodated during his stay in the Capital. In the evening a dinner will be given by H.I.H. Prince Arisugawa in honour of the Prince and his suite.

On the morning of Wednesday the 20th inst., the Prince will proceed to the Palace, where he will be received in audience by the Emperor and personally present the Order of the Garter to His Majesty. In the evening a grand dinner will be given by the Emperor at the Imperial Palace.

On the morning of the 21st inst., the Prince will receive the Corps Diplomatique and Japanese officials at the Kasumi-ga-seki Detached Palace. At noon, lunch will be given by Lieut.-General Terauchi, Minister of War, in honour of the Prince and his suite at the Koraku-en, Koishikawa-ku. In the evening a grand ball will be given at the British Embassy at 9 p.m. A special train leaves Shimbashi for Yokohama at 1.30 a.m.

On Thursday the 22nd instant, the Prince will visit Yokosuka Arsenal and Dockyard, where a lunch will be given in his honour by Vice-Admiral Kamimura, Chief of the Naval Station. In the evening at 7.30 p.m., Mr. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs, will entertain the Prince and his suite and the members of the British Embassy at his official residence.

On the morning of the 23rd instant, a duck hunt will be given at the Imperial preserve at Niihama, after which the Prince and party will be entertained to lunch by Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household. In the evening a dinner will be given at the British Embassy in honour of the Prince and his suite at which H.I.H. the Crown Prince, Princes and Princesses of the Blood, and high dignitaries will be present. After the dinner there will be a small reception at the British Embassy.

On the 24th inst., Prince Arthur will lunch with H. I. H. Prince Fushimi and in the afternoon will proceed to Ueno where under the patronage of Prince Arthur, Prince and Princess Arisugawa, and Prince Kanin a concert will be given in aid of Japanese charities. Prince Arthur and the Imperial Princesses will be present at the concert. In the evening the Prince will dine at the Kasumi-ga-seki Detached Palace and afterwards proceed at 9 p.m. to the Kabuki theatre, where an entertainment will be given by the leading business men of Tokyo and Yokohama.

On Sunday the 25th inst., the Prince will attend divine service at St. Andrew's Church, Shiba.

On the afternoon of the 26th, an entertainment will be given by the Mayor of Tokio at the Hibiya Park, and in the evening the Prince will be present at a Dinner given by the German Minister in celebration of the Silver Wedding of the German Emperor.

On the 27th the Prince will leave for Kioto and Kyushu, returning to Tokio on the 13th of March. On the following day he will visit Nikko and will leave Yokohama on Friday the 16th. Before the Prince's departure a lunch will be given in his honour by the British residents of Tokio and Yokohama.

A telegram from Singapore to the Hongkong Daily Press said the visit of H. R. H. Prince Arthur of Connaught to that Colony was marked by the greatest success. February 3rd was a public holiday and immense crowds were present at the reception. H.E. the Governor, the Rajahs, and the Chinese community presented addresses in silver caskets. The procession through the streets was a gorgeous affair, and the celebrations in honour of the visit were uninterrupted by the mourning into which the Royal Family has so suddenly been cast.

The N.-C. Daily News prints the following:—

Hongkong, February 9.

The P. & O. S. Dongola with Prince Arthur arrived at ten this morning. The harbour was ablaze with decorations.

This Prince landed at eleven in the government launch, passing between two lines of launches decked out with flags, the men-of-war, with the white ensign at half mast, firing a royal salute.

One hundred Baluchis formed the guard of honour at Blake Pier, where the Chief Justice presented an address of welcome on behalf of the colony. The Chinese and Japanese communities also presented addresses.

The route to Government House was lined with troops, including the Volunteers. The Governor gave a garden party in the afternoon, and introduced the leading residents.

The Prince attends an official dinner at Government House to-night.

The Chinese have erected several arches in the streets, and extensive preparations are being made throughout the colony for illumination.

The Asahi has a telegram from Hongkong to the effect that Prince Arthur of Connaught left there at midnight on Feb. 14th by the cruiser Diadem for Japan. A crowd of British residents saw His Highness off at Blake pier.

ROJESTVENSKY'S DEFENCE.

Rojestvensky's method of defending his own reputation in the face of the crushing defeat suffered by his squadron in the Japan Sea—a battle to which European newspapers persistently apply the name "Tsushima"—is most difficult to appreciate. He declares that Admiral Togo blundered signally in his report about the initial stages of the fight. Togo described the Russians as coming into action in a double column, line ahead, whereas Rojestvensky declares that his ships moved in single column line ahead. The Russian commander further maintains that he knew how and when the Japanese would engage, inasmuch as he succeeded in intercepting wireless messages sent by Togo, whereas the latter was misled into delivering his first attack against the strongest Russian battle-ships, imagining them to be the weakest. Apparently Rojestvensky intends by these allegations to rehabilitate his reputation. But to any dispassionate reader they convey an opposite impression. If for some reason now unexplained the Russian Admiral had moved in the apparently dangerous formation adopted by Nelson at Trafalgar; if his adversary—whose arrangements for scouting and signalling must necessarily have been more complete than those of the Russians—had contrived to out-manceuvre him so as to deliver the brunt of his assault against comparatively weak vessels, and if there was any element of surprise in the matter, then indeed a defence of more or less validity, or at any rate an extenuating plea, would be set up for the vanquished. But when Rojestvensky alleges that his formation was faultless, that he deceived the enemy instead of being himself deceived, that he knew exactly what was going to happen, that it did happen precisely as he had anticipated, precisely in the manner he could have wished and precisely in the manner his adversaries would not have wished, yet, after all, he was smashed incontinently, then where does the blame of defeat rest? Apparently his object is to shift the onus from himself to his officers, his men and his material. That is a way of clearing his own skirts, but what a way! As for Togo having been mistaken in his description, we can not easily forget that Togo gave the name and position of every important Russian vessel, and that at the range of the cannonading such blunders of observation as Rojestvensky attributes to a veteran naval captain and to all the Japanese officers are quite inconceivable. Into this strange story the canard about the British admiral's concentration at Weihaiwei with deadly purpose fits with excellent consonance.

THE TRANSPORT SERVICE.

The Jiji Shimpō has a highly appreciative article on the incalculable value which the country derived from its mercantile marine during the recent war. Some one (whose name we can not at the moment recall), among the many writers whose pen the great contest inspired, has related that alongside the splendid pier built by the Russians at Dalny, he saw no less than six big Japanese liners moored simultaneously all discharging or embarking soldiers. It is indeed a fact which can not be too often repeated that an efficient transport service is just as important a feature of national armaments as are well trained troops and effective weapons. The Nippon Yusen Kaisha was able to place at the Government's use for the purposes of the war no less than 15 steamers of over 6,000 tons burden and 4 of over 5,000. Each of these big vessels could carry a battalion with all its equipment and impedimenta—a complete military unit. Any one without being an expert can appreciate what that means for the objects of an over-sea campaign. Mr. Shimada Saburo and his fellow-thinkers are doubtless perfectly sincere in their belief that the country should abstain from subsidizing steamship services or encouraging ship-building as a domestic enterprise, but it may be greatly questioned whether these publicists pause to think of the position in which their country would now stand had not the post-bellum programme of Marquis Ito and the Elder statesmen included a bold scheme for the rapid development of the Empire's merchant marine.

THE COUNTRY'S DEBTS.

We have already alluded to the Government's programme for the payment of the Empire's war debts, or "debts arising out of the extraordinary situation" as they are euphoniously termed. Correspondents ask us to make the matter clearer and we therefore add a few words. In 1907, by which time all installments of the monies borrowed abroad will have been paid in, these debts will aggregate 1,822,796,700 yen. For the service of this large figure a sum of 110 million yen is to be appropriated annually, and thus the whole of the encumbrance will be discharged by the year 1939. That is plain enough, but we must supplement it by saying that in the course of the transaction, six operations of conversion or special redemption will take place in addition to the operation which is to be effected during the current year (namely, the conversion of the foreign six-per-cent. loans into four-per-cent. and the conversion of the domestic six-per-cent. into five-per-cent.) The years for these six conversions or special redemptions are 1908, 1910, 1911, 1924, 1925 and 1930, and the amounts of the several sums involved are, in round numbers, 52 millions, 49 millions, 57 millions, 207 millions, 279 millions and 224 millions.

Turning now to the domestic debt unconnected with the recent war, we find that its present total is 575,468,221 yen, and that the programme is to discharge the whole of this by the year 1942. The annual appropriations for the service of the debt are not of uniform dimensions, as is the case with the war debt, but, speaking approximately, the figure is 40 millions until 1923, whereafter it steadily declines until 1942 when it is only 20 millions.

Summarizing the above, we arrive at the result that the country's total indebtedness is 2,398,264,921 yen, and that, according to the present programme, this will be reduced to 16,834,350 yen by 1940, and will have disappeared altogether by the close of 1942.

It should be added that this programme has obtained the approval of the Lower House without any amendment whatever, and that it will assuredly command the approval of the Upper House also. So far as the service of the war debts is concerned, there can be no change of programme without fresh legislation, for the yearly appropriation of 110 yen is to be placed in a special account. But that is not the case with the ordinary Domestic debt. The programme, though mapped out clearly and definitely at present, will depend for its operation on the passing of each year's budget.

RELIEF FUNDS.

It is announced that Mr. Furukawa Toranosuke has subscribed a sum of ten thousand yen for the relief of the sufferers from the famine in the north-eastern prefectures. We find difficulty in ascertaining exactly what amounts have been subscribed in Tokyo, for in addition to lists opened by several newspapers, some of which do not state any totals but simply publish names from day to day, there is an association called the San-ken Kyūjutsu-kai (relief society for the three prefectures) which appears to be receiving constant contributions. Apart from special donations of great magnitude—as twenty-five thousand each by the Mitsu Bishi and Mitsui Families, fifteen thousand by the Japan Railway Company and fifty thousand by the Emperor and Empress—the sums immediately distinguishable are:—

	Yen.
Jiji Shimpō's Fund .....	22,870
Asahi Shimbun's Fund .....	7,025
Nichi Nichi Shimbun's Fund .....	135
San-ken Kyūjutsu kai's Fund .....	62,077
Total .....	92,107

If we add the donations mentioned above, the total becomes 217,107 yen, and a considerably larger aggregate would be reached if the funds from all private sources were added.

The Executive Committee of the Yokohama and Tokyo Foreign Residents' Association for the Relief of Sufferers by the War gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums and promises towards the Famine Relief Fund now being collected:—

	Yen.
Amount already acknowledged .....	3,762.49
Rev. H. Loomis .....	20.00
Collection English Church, Tokyo, February 4 .....	132.00
Messrs Doelwell & Co. Ltd. ....	500.00
Sojourner .....	20.00
A. Meier & Co. ....	50.00
Messrs. Adet, Campredon & Co. ....	50.00
Miss E. T. Dawbarn, per Rev. W. P. Buncombe .....	25.00
"Japan Gazette," additional collections ...	225.00
Miss Hope Payne .....	10.00
Mr. N. F. Smith .....	50.00
Proceeds of Ball at Public Hall, per Japan Gazette .....	1,200.06
Second contribution from "Nara," per Japan Advertiser .....	75.00
W. D. Townsend, Chemulpho .....	100.00

Marquis Saionji, Premier, has distributed three hundred yen among the famine sufferers and other members of the Cabinet have given two hundred yen each.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Field Marshal Marquis Oyama has presented to the Arms Museum at Kudan a fowling-piece of great historical interest. It is the identical gun which was sent by the Hungarians to Napoleon Bonaparte praying him to shoot the Eagle of the North, namely, Russia. By some process not yet publicly explained, this fowling-piece came into the possession of Mr. Ignatius Schwartz, and he sent it to Field-Marshal Oyama as a token of appreciation of the latter's victories in Manchuria. The gun is an old-style double-barrelled muzzle-loader. The barrels are finely inlaid with silver, and what enhances the appropriateness of the present from the Japanese point of view is that the rising sun with the motto Ex oriente lux appears in two places among the decorative designs. The Field-Marshal has sent also to the Museum the bed used habitually by General Kuropatkin. It is said to be a very sumptuous affair.

There is to be a great religious ceremony at the Yasukuni Shrine during 7 days from the 1st to the 7th of May. Those highest in rank whose spirits will be prayed for are Lieut.-General Matsumura and Vice-Admiral Togo, both of whom died of disease contracted during the war. The senior officers who fell in actual fight were Major-General Yamamoto and Major-General Maeda. It is stated that the Emperor and Empress and the Prince Imperial will all worship at the Shrine, and the representatives of the Army and Navy will be summoned from all parts of the Empire, so that the capital will be full of troops. The order of events has been arranged so that the Yasukuni Celebration shall follow immediately on the heels of the great review which is to take place on the 30th of April, when fifty thousand men will parade under the command of Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama.

On Sunday the Emperor, as is usual on the occasion of celebrating the Jimmu Tenno festival, gave audience to his principal subjects and to the Foreign Diplomats. Luncheon was served after the Audience, covers being laid for 402 persons. Marquis Saionji, on behalf of the Japanese Government and people, replied to the Sovereign's words of greeting, and the British Ambassador replied for the Corps Diplomatique.

It appears to be settled that a big club will soon be started in Tokyo under the name of the Kairikugun Kyodo Club—a term for which some more convenient equivalent will probably be found. At present the Naval men have the Suikosha and the Army men have the Kaikosha, but this separate system tends to accentuate distinctions which have existed between the services since early Meiji days, and which are founded more or less on clan affinities. It said that the Emperor has signified his intention of subscribing a sum of 300,000 yen towards the building of the new club.

It is not without extreme reluctance, we may be sure, that the Russian Government sees itself unable to enter upon any programme for the immediate replacement of its crushing naval losses in the recent war. Russia, from having been a strong naval Power, finds herself now reduced to a vanishing quantity in that respect, and her natural instinct would be to set aside a large sum for the construction of a new fleet. But out of a revenue of two thousand million yen, only thirty-eight millions stand in the Budget for 1906 as a naval fund, and no part of that amount is to be devoted to the building of new ships. Some means of correcting this state of affairs will doubtless be found in 1907, but at present no resource is in sight. The sum estimated as necessary for the cost of maintaining and repatriating the Manchurian Army as well as paying the expenses of the prisoners taken by Japan, is 400 million yen, which is to be raised by issuing Treasury bills. Such an amount seems inadequate. Probably the re-embursement on account of the prisoners will not be large, but considering the vast number of the troops to be repatriated, the great distance they have to be carried and the tardiness which which the operation appears to be conducted, three hundred odd million yen can scarcely be enough.

The following specimen of Anglo-Saxon deserves to be embalmed:—

"Kinzika" Musk Soap is comprehend the most useful Ichthyolum for the skin therefore it has a great effectual point for the scene, freckles on the face, and the skin-disease.

This soap is specially made with the good trial for the materials and it will be used long time because it is very hard.

If you once used it, it has the peculiarity of imparting its desirable Violet and noblest odor of Musk to other objects, and at least for the five days, it may be used to scent clothing gloves, towel, handkerchief, summer—garment, and bed.

Also, if you always used, it has a great economic, effectual point, not to used perfumes, artificial musk, water, etc.

Its style is no adornment and the materials are made with great attention, therefore it is far superior than foreign made and its price is very lower.

It is certainly a very striking fact that Roman Catholic France proposes to place in the safe-keeping of Protestant England the fund with which it is intended to re-endow the French Church. The scheme for forming the fund is sufficiently interesting in itself. Its basic idea is that the lives of a number of clergymen shall be insured, and as the policies fall due, their amounts will be gradually amassed until they reach a total of eighty millions of francs annually after a lapse of 15 years. But the money is all to be lodged in English banks for safe-keeping. The scheme may not mature, but the projectors says:—"It is not in France that Catholics can lay up the treasure of their public worship. We wish to place ourselves under the protecting and liberal ægis of a Great Power." Surely this will not add to the popularity of the Church in France.

Mr. McLeavy Brown, who left Tokyo for Kobe on the evening of the 13th, has contributed a sum of 500 yen for the relief of the sufferers by the famine in the north-east prefectures. The money was handed in to the Foreign Office.

The first of a series of four destroyers to be built at the Mitsu Bishi Docks in Nagasaki was launched on the 12th instant. This was the Shiratsuyu (white dew) and the three others are to be named the Shirayuki (white snow), Shirotai (white form) and Matsukaze (pine wind). Some difficulty was experienced in the launching operation owing to the oil on the ways having become frozen, but the vessel finally took the water. Tokyo newspapers state that the number of war-vessels to be constructed at these docks is eleven in all. The keel has also been laid of a fifteen thousand ton vessel for the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, and the activity at the docks is increased by the presence of the resurrected Russian battle-ship Pobieda (Suo) which is undergoing repairs. The Pobieda's condition is described by correspondents of our Tokyo contemporaries. On her port side astern she has a heavy injury caused by a self-inflicted explosion, and on her starboard bow there is a rent caused by a Japanese torpedo. Most of her woodwork is destroyed by fire, but it is expected that repairs will render her entirely serviceable.

In 1891 Japan's revenue from customs duties was 4,728,471 yen; in 1905 it had grown to 34,293,519 yen. The former total was levied on the whole trade, exports and imports alike, though not in quite the same proportion. The latter was levied on imports alone. In order then to compare the burdens that were imposed on the trade in each case, we must consider the imports only, and we obtain the following:—

	Imports. Yen.	Duties. Yen.	Per-centage of duty.
1891 .....	62,927,268.....	2,401,238.....	3.8
1905 .....	488,538,017.....	34,293,519.....	7.0

In next year's budget the Government has estimated the yield from customs duties at only 30,787,165 yen, the hypothesis being that the import trade during 1905 was abnormally swelled by war materials. The Budget for last year estimated this source of revenue at only 23,697,346 yen, so that the Treasury obtained some ten millions more than had been expected. It may be doubted, however, whether next year's return will come up to the estimate of over 400 million yen.

Invitations are out for an At Home at the American Legation on February 22, Washington's Birthday, when the American Chargé d'Affaires and Mrs. Huntington Wilson will receive from three to six o'clock.

Reports of vessels returning to Nagasaki from Vladivostok confirm General Linévitch's telegram to the St. Petersburg Government that order has been restored in Vladivostok. Evidently the Cossacks under Mischenko were the instruments by which the insurgents were quelled. They had no sooner made their appearance on the scene than the enroute was quelled by the surrender of its leaders. The Cossacks have certainly rendered signal service to Russia in her recent troubles. Without their loyal aid it is difficult to estimate the condition in which the Empire would now be placed. But what a debt of hatred the people must have contracted toward them!

Prince Tsai, who left Yokohama on the 13th instant, is said to have expressed himself in very warm terms to the Editor of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun on the subject of the extremely courteous reception given to him in Japan. He also spoke with strong appreciation about Marquis Ito's valuable advice on the subject of the movement now on foot in China for the recovery or assertion of the Empire's foreign rights. It appears that Marquis Ito visited Prince Tsai at the Detached Palace, and spoke to him at great length on this topic, urging the necessity of the utmost circumspection on China's part and indicating the serious dangers that would be incurred were this spirit of self-assertion suffered to be turned to unwise uses. Prince Tsai seems to have been much impressed by the veteran statesman's counsels. He describes them as of a most illuminating character, and says that they will prove of the utmost service.

The Government's project for improving the landing and customs facilities at Yokohama appears to be a very extensive affair. The total sum to be expended is 8,180,000 yen spread over a period of six years. It is not the intention that the Treasury shall find all the money. Yokohama is to put up 2,700,000 yen out of the total, its contributions being assessed at half a million annually during the first three years and four hundred thousand yen annually during the next three. The Government offers various inducements to the Yokohama folks if they undertake a part of the work without assistance from the Treasury, and for the rest the scheme appears to be that the profits shall be divided in the ratio of the respective expenditures. The consummation of the enterprise depends, of course, on the Budget passing the Upper House, but since the approval of the Lower has been obtained, there is not much fear of a hitch.

A gallant Japanese has fallen a victim to his spirit of enterprise. Lieutenant Uyemura, a graduate of the Literature College of the Imperial University, and a distinguished pupil of the priests of the Engaku temple at Kamakura, went to Mongolia during the war and fell into the hands of the Russians, who put him to death. No particulars are given, nor is the pretext for his execution stated. We must assume that he was treated as a spy.

It is stated in Tokyo that a commercial treaty is likely to be soon concluded between Japan and Turkey. This matter has been under discussion, more or less intimate, for several years but, accordingly to rumour, the Turkish Government showed itself somewhat difficult to deal with and has assumed a more reasonable tone only since the Russo-Japanese war.

THE PLAGUE.

The Governor of Hyogo prefecture reports that a case of bubonic plague has appeared in Kobe. The patient is a young man, K. Takasaka, an employee of a transportation agent, at No. 34, Nunobikicho, in the city.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE MR. WONG KAI KAH.

The funeral of His Excellency the late Mr. Wong Kai Kah, Chinese Trade Commissioner in Yokohama, took place on Feb. 14th. The mourners assembled at deceased's residence, No. 184, Bluff, before noon. H. E. Mr. Yang Shu, Chinese Minister, Mr. Wu Chung Yen, Chinese Consul-General, and their staffs, Mr. T. Sing Jang and many prominent Chinese traders, as well as some foreign ladies and gentlemen were present. On the arrival of the Chinese Minister from Tokyo, two young sons—Wan Meng Lo and Deijei—were introduced to him and the family then welcomed His Excellency in Chinese ceremonious style. Subsequently the Minister proceeded to a room where he performed mourning rites before the altar of a small shrine containing the tablet describing the posthumous name and rank of the deceased. He offered several kinds of gifts, a number of beautiful flowers, lace, etc. The Minister inscribed by his own hand in red, in the upper part of the posthumous name tablet, four Chinese characters, Wan-Chin-Ko-bo, meaning that the deceased was revered by his sovereign as a loyal servant. Meanwhile Mr. Lutz Men, a secretary of the Chinese Consulate, read a mourning address in which he eulogised the meritorious services rendered to his country by the deceased. The Minister also briefly spoke. The Minister having saluted the Manes, all the company repeated his salutations. Immediately after noon the services concluded and the visitors dispersed, after which the cortege left the dwelling, being escorted by a number of relatives and friends. The coffin was conveyed to the Cantonese Guild House near the Race Course. There the remains were cremated. The ashes will be sent to Shanghai by the first steamer.

The deceased was educated in New York together with Mr. Wu Chung Yen, now Consul-General in Yokohama. After he returned home, he devoted himself to encouraging foreign education and he paid close attention to developing foreign trade. He was also an earnest reformer. At the St. Louis Fair he was Vice-President of the Chinese Commissioners. After the close of the Fair, he removed from America to Yokohama with the view of starting in business. Here he was appointed by his government an Imperial Trade Commissioner. His death was the result of an accident. On the morning of Jan. 24th, Chinese new year eve, he went into a bath-room where a brazier with red charcoal was placed. The fumes of the burning charcoal caused him to fall to the floor and incidentally he overturned a kettle of boiling-water, by which he was severely scalded. He was at once removed to the General Hospital, but passed away on the following morning from shock to the system. He is survived by a wife and four children, namely two sons and two daughters. The deceased was forty-two years old.

THE NIPPON RAILWAY CO.

The semi-annual general meeting of the Nippon Railway Company was held on Feb. 8th in Tokyo. The accounts submitted to the shareholders were as follows:

	Yen.
Net profits .....	4,257,765.53
Subsidy .....	46,108.60
Balance, from previous accounts .....	510,319.50
	4,814,193.63

The above total was disposed of as follows; yen 212,888.28 was set apart as legal reserve; yen 53,872 as a fund to redeem debentures and to pay interest; yen 15,679.50 for adding to machinery in the workshops; yen 29,682.28 as a special reserve to make good losses; yen 300,000 as a further special reserve; yen 110,000 was to be given employees as a bonus, and yen 120,000 as special bonus; yen 3,276,000 to shareholders as dividend at the rate of 13 per cent. annum; yen 20,000 as a fund to relieve employees in distress; and the remainder was carried to next account. The government subsidy to the railway will expire at the end of this month.

LIFE ASSURANCE.

VERY nearly one year has elapsed since the first sensational reports began to appear concerning American Life Assurance Companies. The first company to be singled out for attack was the Equitable, and the rumours gathered as they rolled until fears were entertained and freely expressed that the solvency of the great companies was open to question. The sensational journals of America magnified the situation, always exaggerated, and in many cases distorted the true facts, and made out that the officers of the Equitable had been guilty of neglect of duty, and plainly hinted at malversation of funds. The Society has a large number of policyholders in China, comprising people in the highest diplomatic, official and mercantile positions; and its policies are also widely held by Japanese of high standing and by foreign residents.

It must have been with a sense of great relief that the policyholders received the letter signed by President MORTON, which has also been advertised in the principal foreign journals published in Japan and China. Reviewing this letter, it appears that President MORTON adopted the bold, straightforward and honest course of substituting for the annual audit of the Superintendent of Insurance of the State of New York, an independent report prepared by two eminent firms of public accountants; Messrs. PRICE, WATERHOUSE & Co. of London and New York; and Messrs. HASKINS & SELLS of New York. The lines on which the investigation was to be made were clearly defined by President MORTON, and in the result the accountants certify that the assets of the Society, as claimed, were all found to be on hand, September 30th, 1905, and amounted in value to yen 867,013,541.88, as shown by the balance sheet; while the surplus over and above all liabilities amounted to yen 139,880,969.64. These valuations have been reached after re-appraisal of all the real estate owned by the Society and covered by mortgages held by the Society, which resulted in a reduction of certain values adopted in the Society's last annual report chiefly in real estate and in stocks of certain financial institutions. It thus appears, beyond all manner of doubt, that the account published 31st December, 1904, was substantially correct; the only change being a revaluation, dictated by prudence and not by necessity, of certain stocks and real estate.

The letter further states that the assets are all of high grade; that economies have been effected in the cost of management; that in ten years the Society has lent more than yen 250,000,000 on real estate mortgages and had to foreclose in six cases only, in each of which the property was sold at a profit. The President properly says that every policyholder may be certain that there is no cheaper way to have sound life insurance than by retaining and increasing his policy, and that those who allow their policies to lapse are doing themselves an injustice, which may be remedied by application to any of the Society's managers or agents, who will do everything necessary to bring about restoration; that the interests of policyholders are now cared for by a Board of Trustees empowered to appoint a majority of policyholders on the Board of Directors; and, finally, it may be said, upon the authority of President MORTON and responsible statements in American insurance journals, that the assets are invested in the best class of securities, returning excellent rates of interest, and that every credit is due to the old officers of the Society for the care shown in the management of the funds on behalf of the policyholders.

The Equitable has undoubtedly held a foremost place in life assurance in the Far East during the past fifteen years. Its careful manner of doing business, its well-known solicitude for policyholders' interests, its prompt payment of claims, and its satisfactory bonuses on maturing policies, have all tended to raise it in popular estimation; and it is gratifying to find that the Society emerges from the most searching investigation that has probably ever been made of any company's affairs with a balance sheet showing the assets to be intact, and the surplus to be a reality.

Many policyholders who have visited New York carrying letters of introduction, will learn with great pleasure that Third Vice-President G. T. WILSON retains his position in charge of all foreign branches. His extensive experience and knowledge of the business, and especially of the requirements of foreign countries, render his presence as one of the principal executive officers a great advantage to policyholders. And under the new constitution it is confidently believed the Society will for ever retain its high position in public estimation. We desire to bring all these facts to the attention of policy-holders in Japan, for they must naturally have felt considerable uneasiness during the progress of the inquiries which have resulted in so signally rehabilitating the great company.

CHRISTIANITY IN JAPAN.

IT has always been remarked that great diversity characterizes the opinions expressed by foreigners concerning Christianity and its prospects in Japan. Some, considering arithmetical results only and observing that fifty years of religions propagandism have produced only about a hundred and fifty thousand Christian converts among a population of over 46 millions, conclude that the foreign faith will never be a power in this land. Others claim that the actual number of baptised persons is of slight importance compared with the influence they exercise, and that the soil is being steadily prepared for a broad-cast sowing of the Nazarene's creed. And yet others insist that the Japanese are not at all a religious people, nor are ever likely to become so. This last view is sometimes taken by Japanese themselves. Thus a recent writer in the Roman Catholic paper Koye declared that the religion of the Japanese is confined to their worldly affairs, and in proof of this conclusion alleged that no Japanese prays when he is at the point of death since to do so "would be regarded as cowardice and weakness." This last is a dictum hard to endorse. For every reader of Japanese annals and every student of Japanese ethics knows that the conventional formula on the lips of even the bushi in the hour of death is namu amida butsu. Yet it is certainly true that religion does not seem to enter as largely into the life of the Japanese nation as it does into the life of an Occidental nation. One fact alone need be recalled in proof of this assertion: there is little church-going for the mere sake of periodical worship. Church-going was not one of the original conventions of Christianity, so far as we know, but the church, by whatever process, has come to be a far more prominent adjunct of Occidental religion than the temple is of Buddhism. There are hundred of thousands of educated Japanese who, while leading lives quite as free from reproach as that of the average churchman in Europe, never enter the gates of a temple from year's end to year's end. Then, again, opinion is absolutely free, in Japan. Agnosticism or even atheism brings not the faintest reproach. In fact no one concerns himself about his neighbour's religious convictions. In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred the nature of a man's beliefs is a matter of total indifference to his friends and acquaintances. All these things are very difficult to reconcile with any prevalence of religious zeal or any depth of religious conviction according to Occidental standards. Yet what multitudes of Japanese there are who in seasons of storm and stress have unfailing recourse to the temple? It may indeed be doubted whether the Christian Church presents itself in so helpful a light to its parishioners as does the Buddhist temple to its danka. When we come to the question of prayer, it is more difficult to speak with any assurance. The morning and evening orisons of the Christian believer probably possess more fervour and are inspired by a loftier faith than the comparatively brief formulæ and the rolling of rosaries in Buddhist worship. Yet who can tell? To make accurate comparisons it is necessary to have been a devotee of both creeds and that kind of evidence is almost unprocureable. It has been said that the purpose of the Buddhist prayer is narrower than that of the Christian: that the disciple of the latter creed carries a larger range of petitions to the Throne of Grace and lays a heavier burden at its feet. Is that so? Is it not to obtain mercy for himself or blessings for those he loves that the Christian puts up his petition, and does the Buddhist ask for less? Discrimination is exceedingly difficult. But it has always seemed strange that so much importance should be attached to this particular obstacle in the case of the Japanese. We have not heard it urged as an impediment to Christian propagandism in the case of any other nation; the Chinese, for instance, who like the Japanese believe in Buddhism, though the progress of Christian propagandism has been even slower in China than in Japan. PASTOR OSWALD, writing in the Christliche Welt of Marburg, seems to admit, or at any rate does not explicitly contradict, the view that religion is a comparatively imponderable factor in the life of the Japanese nation, yet he quotes with apparent acquiescence the conviction of many missionaries that the war has produced a quickening of the religious spirit in Japan and that Christianity has sensibly progressed. The former analysis is based chiefly on the occasional allusions to the help of heaven which appeared in official reports of victories, and the latter on the facilities that Christian ministers and Christian associations were allowed to enjoy in the field. But if we turn over the pages of history, we are at once confronted by evidence not of greater but of conspicuously smaller reliance on supernatural assistance in the recent war than on the occasion of the Mongol invasion, for example. The menace of Kublai's armada threw the Japanese Court into a veritable paroxysm of prayer, and the sums that were disbursed on account of Buddhist ministrations reached an enormous figure. Had the missionaries lived in that era they might have spoken in much more glowing terms of the intensifying of the people's religious life. Nor can real importance be attached to the liberal facilities granted to Christian ministers and associations by the Japanese military authorities. That was virtually a matter of course, for the spirit of fairness which unquestionably animates the Japanese in their public dealings is strongly re-inforced by their habit of courtesy. That was the spirit and that the habit which secured for the Greek-Russian Church in Tokyo immunity in the discharge of its religious functions all through the war; a very striking spectacle which history will not fail to place to Japan's great credit. We can not but think, unwelcome as is the conviction, that the extreme bigotry, the most uncharitable intolerance and the racial prejudice displayed by the Russian Church under the influence of its notorious Procurator General did much to discredit Christianity in the eyes of the Orient, and that the evidences of Japanese sympathetic tolerance which afforded so much satisfaction to certain observers were in large part a politic answer to that unsightly Russian display. Several years ago many foreign onlookers professed profound amusement at what they called "consummate conceit" on the part of the Japanese in seeking to modify Christianity in accordance with their own needs. Yet it is doubtful whether Christianity will ever make large strides of progress in this country until it undergoes some special transmutation at the hands of the Japanese themselves.

CHINA.

THE Shanghai correspondent of The Times certainly takes a very pessimistic view of the Chinese. He has now wired to London that the expedition of Prince TSAI and his colleagues to the West is not really for its alleged purpose, namely, the investigation of constitutional government, but has for object to enlist the sympathy of foreign States in favour of the abolition of extraterritoriality in China. That seems to be a somewhat extreme interpretation. No Chinese politician, be he ever so ill-informed, can suppose that there is the least chance of Western Governments agreeing to entrust the lives and properties of their subjects and citizens to Chinese jurisdiction so long as all the conditions which dictated exemption from that jurisdiction remain unchanged. The Chinese are not wanting in intelligence. Quite the contrary. They are among the foremost nations of the world in point of moral endowments. Their eyes are fully open to the fact that Consular jurisdiction is absolutely unremovable except by processes leading to the enactment of good laws in China and the organization of a competent judiciary to administer them. They have done nothing toward compassing either of these ends, and the plain inference is either that they do not regard the abolition of the extraterritorial system as an object worth working for with real earnestness, or that they find themselves powerless to effect the essential reforms. Everything goes to show that the former is the more reasonable hypothesis. No doubt there are some leading statesmen in Peking and elsewhere who regard the continued existence of a foreign imperium in the Chinese imperio as more or less humiliating, but if there be any trait that specially distinguishes Chinese character it is a disposition to bow to the lesser of two evils. The recovery of judicial autonomy might be a very fine thing and a very flattering achievement, but the gratification attending it would be a poor compensation for the perpetual complications which must inevitably ensue if foreigners were subjected to such laws and such methods of administration as those now existing in China. Shanghai, indeed, is doing whatever lies in its power to supply object lessons calculated to bring the extraterritorial system into disfavour and to incite Chinese animosity against it. Shanghai is circumstanced somewhat as Yokohama was fifteen years ago, only that in Shanghai's case the objections to being placed under native jurisdiction are incomparably stronger than they ever were in the case of Yokohama. Shanghai must therefore fight with all its ability and resources against such a consummation, which, for the rest, can not truly be counted among the practical contingencies of the time. But there is no evidence, so far as we can discern, that any wide-spread or powerful movement has commenced in China against consular jurisdiction, nor will it be extravagant to say that the initiative of such a movement may be hastened rather than retarded by the insistence with which some foreign critics impute it to the Chinese. If China is ever to cease being a source of grave international uneasiness it must be by frank emergence from her conservative shell and by liberal conformity with such elements of Western civilization as have received the cachet of the world's intelligent approval. Can that end be in any degree consummated by reading irrational purposes into all her doings and obnoxious aims into all her efforts?

COMMERCIAL REPORTS.

Hokkaido Colliery and Railway Co.—This company held a general meeting on Feb. 12th in Tokyo. The accounts of the last half-year were submitted. The net income was yen 1,914,109, to which the balance, yen 20,848, from the previous half-year was added, making a total of yen 1,934,957. Of this sum, yen 96,000 was set off as reserve; yen 47,850 was to be paid to employees as bonus; yen 1,271,280 to shareholders as an interim dividend at the rate of 15 per cent per annum; and the remainder was carried forward to next account. A proposal to construct a branch of thirty-four miles between Kashiwa and Robetsu was introduced and passed.

Foreign Trade.—During ten days ending Feb. 10th, the foreign trade of the Empire was as follows:

	Yen.
Exports .....	8,889,000
Imports .....	10,837,000
Exports of good .....	546,120
Imports of good .....	9,184
Exports of silver .....	101,089
Imports of silver .....	725,088

The Proposed Domestic Loan.—In connexion with the proposed issue of Exchequer Bonds for two hundred million yen a conference was held at 6 p.m. on Feb. 13th in the official residence of the Minister for Finance. The Ministers of various departments, the leading bankers of Tokyo, Yokohama, Osaka, Kyoto and Nagoya, etc., were present. The Yiji says that the prospectus will be issued about February 20th and subscription will be received on March 1st. The price will probably be similar to that of the 4th and 5th issues of Exchequer Bonds.

Tokyo Share Market.—According to the monthly report issued by the Tokyo Exchange, transactions during January totalled 322,380 shares.

Consular Reports.—The Japanese Consul-General in New York wired on Feb. 6th to the Foreign Office that there was no remarkable change to be noted in raw silk. The price of Japanese filature, No. 1, was between $3.95 and $3.97½. The yield of cotton is less than the Government estimate, consequently prices which were going up fell slightly. The stock throughout the country was 15,623,000 bales.

According to a Bombay telegram under date of February 10th the cotton market is still inactive. The stock was estimated at 870,621 bales.

A CANADIAN VALENTINE.

Through the weary, weary, weary
Sighing of the winter dreary,
Through the drifting, drifting, drifting
Of the snow,
Falling deeper, deeper, deeper,
While the earth, unconscious sleeper,
Lieth silent, silent, silent,
Far below,
Go there flying, flying, flying,
Thoughts begot of love undying,
Love that groweth, groweth, groweth,
Strong and true.
If you hearken, hearken, hearken
While the twilight shadows darken,
They will whisper, whisper, whisper
This to you.

THE BOOKSHELF.

"The Re-shaping of the Far East," by B. L. PUTNAM WEALE: MacMillan & Company, Limited., Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

MR. WEALE'S ultimate conclusion is that until China develops sufficient power to manage her own affairs and to assert herself conclusively against foreign exploitation, she will continue to be the seed-plot of intrigues dangerous to the peace of the East. He does not believe that Japan can control China. He does not believe that whatever be the issue of the Russo-Japanese war—his book was compiled in June, 1905, and therefore he had no knowledge of the peace subsequently concluded—Russia will be thrust out of the arena. In fact his conviction is that unless China can help herself, she is doomed to be the battle-field of the near future. He tells us these things in his preface, but the text of his two portly volumes is not systematically addressed to establishing the truth of his creed. Nor, indeed, can we find, after close perusal, that the title of the work is fully justified by its contents. The title suggests a political treatise in which the forces modelling the destiny of the Far East are exposed, estimated and weighed against one another. The contents take the form now of history, now of narrative, now of local description, and now of political analysis. Thus we rise from the reading with a certain sense of disappointment. Nevertheless the book is extremely interesting. Its style carries one along without any sensible concentration of attention, and the author marshals his opinions and arguments in a delightfully lucid manner, free from all fine writing or flowers of rhetoric. He shows himself a keen observer, a close reasoner, a diligent student of history and a careful collector of statistics. We follow him with never palling pleasure from place to place of his journeyings through China and Korea until he leads us to the threshold of the war, and we follow his descriptions of the leading events of the war with a consciousness that at least his own thoughts are luminous. But it must be confessed that this part of his work is greatly marred by constant intrusions of the wisdom that succeeds the event. He falls into the pit which has already engulfed so many civilian writers, the pit of military omniscience. We gather very clearly that had he himself been director of either the Russian operations or the Japanese, events would have shaped themselves very differently. He would have landed a Japanese army upon the Liaotung Peninsula within a month after the outbreak of war; would have sealed in Port Arthur the handful of Russians then garrisoning the fortress; would have carried the place by escalade without any delay; would have marched to the immediate capture of Liaoyang and Mukden, and in the course of three months would have grasped Harbin. It is not to be denied that these things might have been accomplished. Every war inscribed on the pages of the world's history may be dismissed as a more or less tame and halting affair if actual achievements be judged by the light of subsequently ascertained potentialities. There is nothing to prove that had Japan been content to place a small garrison in Korea, the Russians would have taken advantage of this weak spot in their assailants' armour. There is nothing to show that had two hundred thousand men been carried over-sea, leaving their maritime communications exposed to the assaults of a squadron so powerful as that assembled at Port Arthur in February 1904, disaster would have ensued. The Russians might perhaps have showed themselves paralytic even in the face of an enemy who offered them these tempting chances. But such risks are not run except in the pages of romance. No nation consisting of human beings as we know them, would have deliberately essayed Mr. Weale's programme. And indeed to mention only two of his suggestions—two of the sins of omission that he tabulates against the Japanese—, one is that steamers laden with cement were not lying in Port Arthur "before the outbreak of hostilities" so that, on the night of February 8th 1904, namely, simultaneously with the first act of war, these steamers might have been sunk at the neck of the harbour. Another is that in order to utilize the East-China Railway without altering the gage, the Japanese did not lay in a stock of locomotives and duplicate bridges during 1903. In a word, to do what Mr. Weale suggests at the time when he says it ought to have been done, the Japanese must have been super-humanly wise and super-humanly daring, to say nothing of the character for treachery that would have clung to them after the war. Sometimes we think that just as Mr. Weale blames other folks for lack of almost divine perception, so he assumes for himself an excessive degree of insight. What is to be said, for instance, of his assertion that "the Japanese themselves, placing a greater value on the Chinese press than it as yet really possesses, have boldly bought a large number of publications and openly subsidized many others; or that General Oku flung his men on frontal assaults with extraordinary disregard for losses? Surely the former is an exaggeration, and as to the latter, the fact is that statistics, which do not lie, demonstrate the ratio of losses to have been smaller in Oku's ranks than in those of any of the other field armies. These, however, are minor blamishes. They detract little from the remarkable and very striking character of their surroundings which, we venture to predict, will attract many readers. One of Mr. Weale's assertions has been made by ourselves though not in quite such wholesale language. "It can be stated quite honestly," he writes, that except in two or three noticeable cases, every Frenchman, Belgian, German, Austrian, Italian, Dutchman, Swiss, Spaniard and Portuguese in the Far East is absolutely on the side of Russia, and that all hold the false creed that this is the culminating war between White Europe and Yellow Asia." That is so, but, with larger reservations, we think, that Mr. Weale is disposed to grant. The war has distinctly differential Continental Europe from Anglo-Saxondom, and by Anglo-Saxondom we mean Great Britain and the United States. Let any one resident in the Far East frankly consult his own experience and he will admit that Mr. Weale is right in the main. Another allegation made by him is that "Germany in the Far East feels far more bitter at the results of the war than any other nationality." We shall not pause to endorse or to traverse that assertion. Our object in quoting it is merely to indicate the downright character of Mr. Weale's writing. His book certainly ranks as one of the most interesting and suggestive of all the volumes inspired by the war.

"The Development of Diplomacy."

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN, & Co., are publishing at their New York office, a "History of Diplomacy in the International Development of Europe," by David Jayne Hill, LL., which promises to be a valuable contribution to a special branch of literature, and which will doubtless appeal to a goodly number of readers in this country when they learn that such a work is available; for, although there have been many books of greater or less importance written upon special questions relating to the official intercourse between States and upon particular periods of diplomatic history, there has been, until now, no general history of European diplomatic history in any language. We have not yet seen a copy of Volume I. (the only one published) of Dr. Hill's work, but it is so favourably commented upon by The Dial, one of the leading journals of literary criticism published in the United States, that a precis of that review, coupled with some original impressions based upon an acquaintance with the author's other books, and an appreciation of the importance of the present subject, will doubtless be found interesting by the readers of the Japan Mail. To supplement his former knowledge of the subject, Dr. Hill has examined carefully the archives of European capitals, and has received assistance from the American embassies and legations, as well as from eminent scholars of Europe! There were two practical problems which confronted the author of this work at the very beginning of his task: the first was the embarrassment of riches which came from the immense amount of material that has accumulated in the libraries of Europe, which—by reason of the systematic indexing that has been followed assiduously in nearly every country for several decades—is now at the command of investigators as it never was before; yet even with the careful segregation and cataloguing that has been done, there always seems to be something to reward the diligence of each new delver. The second point that Dr. Hill felt called upon to determine was a definite point of departure. He does not accept, as many—perhaps we should say most writers—have done, the Peace of Westphalia as the starting point of diplomacy. That treaty was signed on the 24th of October, 1648, and by its terms France acquired Alsace; Sweden obtained Upper Pomerania, the Isle of Rugen, and some other territory; the sovereignty and independence of the different states were recognised; the Calvinists were placed on the same footing as the Lutherans and the independence of the United Provinces and the Swiss Confederation was acknowledged. It was an agreement of such magnificent dimensions, such wide influence, and of such stupendous potentialities, that no wonder the date of it has usually been looked upon as establishing the beginning of diplomatic relations in the sense of recognising plenary power vested in the representatives of the several Powers that took part in the conference. As to its immediate effect, in checking the aspirations of some, and changing the national weakness of others into recognised strength, it is not our province just now to discuss. Dr. Hill throws back the story of diplomacy to the organisation of Europe under the old Roman Empire. He describes at some length the system of government at that time, because it furnished the model for the organization of the empire of the Church, which was the next power to aim at universality of political control, for even amid all the confusion of the barbaric invasions this idea of universal empire never lost its hold upon the imagination of thinking men at the head of the Early Church. The significance of the so-called fall of the Roman Empire (476 A. D.) lies in this, "that it serves to fix in the mind the substitution of local and racial authority in modern Europe in place of the warring influence of universal imperial rule." It separates the period of the old Empire from that long period of change and effort to secure order through the organization of the Barbarian Kingdoms, the revived Empire, feudalism, the influence of the Church, which finally resulted in the great national States of modern times. This realisation of nationality, although a slow and painful process, gives to diplomatic relations an importance which has hardly been generally recognised, and establishes a point of departure that has more to commend it than the date twelve centuries later. When Papal diplomacy had its birth under Gregory II. (715-731), who wished neither to destroy the Lombard power, when Liutprand (from about 712 to 744) was seeking to unite Italy in one kingdom, nor to annihilate the influence of the Roman Emperor, we find an early instance of diplomacy in the Pope's effort to increase his own prestige by playing off the one against the other. Later, when Irene usurped the imperial chair of Byzantium, nominally acting as regent for her son, Constantine VI., from 780 to 790, there seemed to be a fitting opportunity to revive the empire of the west. But disorder ruled in Italy, and in the hope of checking this, the Pope crowned Charlemagne, on Christmas Day, A. D. 800, and invested him with the diadem of the Caesars, only it was now the "Holy Roman Empire." In the struggle for supremacy between Empire and Papacy—should the Popes be allowed to make and unmake temporal rulers, or should they be subject to the civil power?—there was much of its diplomacy in its highest, as well as in lowest, sense. Passing over the growth of nationalities through the custom of dividing kingdoms by inheritance, as if they were so much real estate, and the special interest of Rome in this evolution, for Rome was by no means an indifferent spectator, there appeared, in the 12th century, another factor, Venice. Here, in May, 1177, met "the first European congress in which independent civic communities had ever freely represented their own rights in the presence of princes—the prototype of the great international congresses of a later time." Venice was careful to select men of eminent qualification to represent her interests, to instruct them in the arts of diplomacy, and consequently that city soon became "the school and touchstone of ambassadors." Secrecy and urbanity were the cardinal principles of Venetian diplomacy, and this system was soon to be put in practice by all the Italian States, the numerous city-states so heterogeneous in character and inspired by motives so diverse. Can we say that this model has yet been greatly departed from? In spite of the announced determination of some statesmen to act otherwise, is not the secret of modern diplomacy pretty much the same as that which governed the Venetians more than eight hundred years ago? "To know the intentions of one's neighbour, to defeat his hostile designs, to form alliances with his enemies, to steal away his friends, and to prevent his union with others, became matters of the highest public interest. Less costly than war, diplomacy now, in large measure, superseded it with plot and counterplot." It reads very like an epitome of twentieth century proceedings! Out of this system was born the conception of equilibrium as a necessity of defence. The transitory alliances and counter-alliances of the Italian princes and republics give us the real "prototype and epitome of what all Europe was soon to become upon a grander scale." The natural correlate of all this would have been a code of public law to regulate the intercourse of those States with each other, but such a thing was not yet possible. The moral sense did not demand it, but its birth was witnessed on the sea, where the demands of commerce made it imperative. The customs of the sea were reduced to writing in the "Tables of Amalfi," which later gave place to the "Consolato de Mare"—the "first example of law international among the nations of Europe."

The succeeding volumes will be received as they are ready for distribution, and will be noticed as they come to hand. Much may be expected of them, for they will deal of a period when diplomacy was coming into its own.

Shanghai, its Sights and Scenes: Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Ltd.

MESSRS. KELLY and WALSH deserve hearty thanks for the dainty booklet which they have issued under the above title. To most folks in the Far East the commercial aspect of Shanghai is so insistently brought beneath their notice, that one is apt to forget that in developing its trade the great entrepôt has not forgotten to beautify its plain and unattractive site to the best advantage. The pictures comprised in this book give an excellent idea of what the Model Settlement has become during the last decade, how it has continued the excellent work of the founders of the place in keeping up public gardens, a magnificent race-course and other amenities which tend to make Far Eastern residents reconciled to life in their distant quarter of the globe. All the photographs, which are reproduced by the half-tone process, are beautifully clear, a credit to the photographer and the printer.

Martin's Tables, by ALFRED J. MARTIN; London, Mr. Fisher Unwin.

NOTHING displays in a clearer light the obstinate conservatism of the large majority of the British people than the continued use throughout the empire of the ancient systems of weights and measures. True these have the authority of accustomed use and historical wont behind them, but they are so muddled, so unscientific, so hampering to trade that the wonder is a nation so frankly given up to the pursuit of commerce should still continue to use them. Of course many attempts have been made to introduce the metric system. Royal Commissions and Parliamentary Committees have been convened times without number to consider the matter, but so far their reports and suggestions have been treated as so much wastepaper. The little book which Mr. Alfred J. Martin, Hon. Member of the Incorporated Society of Inspectors of Weights and Measures and Member of the Decimal Association, has compiled is an earnest of better things to come, however. So great was the demand for it that it quickly ran into a second edition, and this success is well deserved. The book is a vast store house of information for students and business men alike, its varied information being marked by clearness of arrangement and considerable research. As the School Government Chronicle remarks, "it is doubtful whether any question could be raised on the subject of weights and measures to which an answer could not be found in this book." Mr. Martin's indefatigable labours should do much towards impressing John Bull with the imperative necessity of falling in line with all progressive nations and cause him to abandon his present antiquated system of weights and measures by adopting the international metric system and decimal coinage.

Pictorial Compendium of Japanese Scenery, published by KOIZUMI BOKUJO, Tokyo.

This album comprises some 400 pages and contains a wealth of charming photographs capably reproduced. The publishers have spared no expense while the utmost discrimination has been exercised in the selection of the pictures. The result is one of the most unique collections of photographs of Japanese scenery, famous buildings and historical monuments we have seen. Many places little known even to those who have travelled extensively in Japan are here depicted for the first time, affording delightful surprises by their freshness and novelty. We have one criticism to offer. The publishers have spoiled their magnificent work by that too common failing in Japan, the failure to ask a foreigner to revise the English letterpress which accompanies each picture. The result is the most distressing solecisms are found on every page, solecisms that might easily have been avoided. The album sells at 10 yen, with a richer cover for 15 yen, and the profits will be given to a fund for relieving the distress of maimed and wounded Japanese soldiers and sailors.

IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.05 on the 10th instant, the Order of the Day being:—

1. Second Reading of the Bill for amending the Railway Construction Law. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th.)
2. Second Reading of the Bill relating to Expenses of Experiments and Instruction in the matter of Productive Enterprises. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th.)
3. Second Reading of the Bill relating to Appropriation for the Maintenance Fund. (Vide Japan Mail, January 26th.)
4. Second Reading of Government Bill for amending Law No. 29 of 1902. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th, section of House of Peers.)

5. General Budget for the 39th Fiscal Year.

6. Supplementary Budget of Extraordinary Expenditures arising out of the Situation.

7. Supplementary Budget No. 1 of the 38th Fiscal Year.

8. Supplementary Budget No. 2 of the 38th Fiscal Year.

9. Supplementary Budget relating to the Special account of the 38th Fiscal Year.

10. Supplementary Budget relating to obligations incurred by the Treasury in accordance with agreements, extra to the Budget for the 39th Fiscal Year.

11. First Reading of the Private Bill for amending the Law of Finance. (Vide Japan Mail of January 26th.)

12. Private Bill (first reading) relating to changes of Juridical Limits, in the sense of altering the jurisdiction of the Nara Local Court to that of a District Court. Presented by Mr. Kubo Ichiro and others.

13. Representation relating to Maritime Subsidies. Presented by Mr. Omitani and others. (Vide Japan Mail of 7th inst.)

14. Representation relating to Development of National Resources. Presented by Mr. Tada Sakubei and others. The gist of this is that whereas many enterprises await prosecution in the interests of the nation's resources, and whereas a Representation in that sense was adopted by the Lower House last session, no legislative steps have yet been taken to give effect to it.

Mr. Ooka reported in favour of the first Bill in the name of the Committee, and explained that the Committee recommended an addition, namely, the insertion of the line joining the Northern Echigo and the O-U systems in the Second Construction Period.

Mr. Fukui Samuro asked whether the Government intended to introduce during the present session a Bill for the Nationalization of the Railways. To this the Minister of Communications replied that the matter was under consideration by the Cabinet and that no definite answer could yet be given.

After a few questions the Bill was passed as amended.

The three next Bills having been passed without comment or opposition, the House passed to the fifth item, namely, the General Budget for 1906-7.

Mr. Kuribara Ryoichi, on behalf of the Budget Committee, reported favourably on the main part of the Estimates with slight alterations. The only important points in his report were that the Committee had asked for and obtained the Government's promise to reduce the Extraordinary Situation Appropriations by 5 million yen in the Army and Navy Sections, the money thus economized being devoted to productive purposes; and that the subsidy for the Australian S. S. Service had been cut out, the Committee not having been able to arrive at any lawfully recognizable decision.

The Foreign Office section of the Budget was then passed nem. con., but on taking the Home-Department Section considerable controversy arose with reference to the Metropolitan Police Bureau. Mr. Tsunoda Shimpei argued strongly against retaining the Board. He claimed that it was an old-fashioned institution such as had existed in France during the 18th century; that no metropolis in an enlightened Occidental country had such a police system; and that the Bureau had shown itself not only incompetent to prevent such crimes as the murderous assaults upon Okubo, Mori and Okuma, but also actually pernicious as on the occasion of the September riots. He moved that the appropriation of 165,265 yen for the new buildings of the Bureau be struck out of the Budget.

The Minister of Home Affairs declared himself radically opposed to abolishing the Bureau, and said that if individual policemen proved themselves incompetent, the fact did not affect the usefulness of the system. He had explained his views fully to the Budget Committee.

Mr. Shimada Saburo contended that the police, as now organized, were infected with a pernicious old custom. They had been employed in the 10th year of Meiji to do battle with the Satsuma insurgents, and they retained the notion that it was the function of a constable to cut down a rioter.

Messrs. Moriya and Hanoi argued against the Bureau and Messrs. Arai Shogo, Arakawa Goro and Tetekawa Umpei supported it.

Mr. Hara, Minister of Home Affairs, spoke a second time. He said that if any abuse of power could be proved against the police while the present Cabinet was in power, the Ministry would accept the responsibility. But he pointed out that the opponents of the Bureau were acting in a most contradictory manner. They left untouched the appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau, on the ground that it formed part of the "Fixed Expenditures," but they proposed to expunge an item for the construction of new police offices, and they sought to pervert this proposal into a motion for the abolition of the Bureau. How could they abolish the Bureau by merely withholding funds for the construction of new offices when they voted funds for the same Bureau's maintenance? Such procedure was obviously meaningless and inconsistent.

Mr. Hanai Takuzo made a sarcastic speech, retorting that the Seiyu-kai had become a strange creature, half constitutional, half despotic.

The closure was moved and the appropriation was voted by a large majority.

On passing to the Finance Department Section some question was raised as to whether one Division each would not suffice for the garrisoning of Manchuria and Korea, but the Government Delegate replied in the negative. Concerning the uses to which the 5 millions retrenched in this section would be put, Mr. Sakatani said that a supplementary budget would be submitted when due investigation had been made.

The House passed the Section, as well as the Sections of the Army, the Navy, the Education Department, the Department of Agriculture and Commerce and the Department of Justice. But on taking the Section of the Communications Department the question of the Australian subsidy came up for discussion, and it was decided to take this matter in conjunction with the Bill No. 10 on the Order of the Day. After a very brief debate, Mr. Haseba Junko announced that the Seiyu-kai, in view of the petty character of the appropriation, had decided to sacrifice their own three years' contention and to vote for the two years of the Progressists. Thus this appropriation was passed by a large majority, the Daido Club alone constituting the Opposition. The Rumoye Railway appropriation was also passed and the Communications Section having then been voted en bloc, the adoption of the Estimates became an accomplished fact.

On the motion of Mr. Haseba the Bill for amending the Loan of the Bank of Formosa, as sent down from the Upper House, was taken out of the Order and passed through all its readings.

Mr. Tsunematsu moved that the last four Bills on the Order should be handed to Special Committees nominated by the President, and the House having voted in that sense, rose at 5 p.m.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.05 a.m. and having acceded to some applications for leave of absence, proceeded to the Order of the Day.

The first Bill was that relating to the special financing of the national debts (sent up from the Lower House); namely, the measure providing that a sum of 110 million yen should be set aside yearly for the service of the debt. The Minister of Finance having explained the object and necessity of the Bill, it was handed to a special committee of 15.

The second measure—also sent up from the Lower House, was that for continuing the war taxes. Mr. Sakatani explained that the Bill had a close connexion with the last. Apart from the service of the national debt a sum of 1,030 million yen had to be found. Of this total 83 millions had been furnished last year under the authority of an Imperial Ordinance and 947 millions remained, in which were included 130 millions of continuing expenses. It thus became inevitable that the war taxes should be continued. The measure was of vital importance and the Lower House had passed it without any amendment whatever, the Government agreeing to the House's suggestion that a Zeihō Chōsa-Kwai (committee for investigating the tax law) should be organized.

Baron Date observed that this was a measure which had emanated from the last Cabinet, when Mr. Sakatani had been Vice-Minister of Finance, and presumably the measure had taken shape under his hand. Did he earnestly support the Bill as the last Minister of Finance had done, or did he merely accept a responsibility passed on to him by the latter?

Mr. Sakatani replied that he believed the measure to be essential to the establishment of the national finances on a sound basis. He was not called upon to shoulder any responsibility on account of a former Minister of Finance, but he was fully prepared to accept his own responsibility.

Viscount Soga asked whether the terminology "Extraordinary Special Taxes" was to be adhered to perpetually. If the taxes were to be perpetual this nomenclature was obviously defective.

Mr. Sakatani replied that until the taxes became actually permanent they must continue to be called by the original title.

Viscount Tani dwelt on the great importance of the Bill. It differed altogether from ordinary questions. When these extraordinary taxes came up for discussion originally, the members of the Diet had all agreed in spite of themselves, and the Government, promising that the imposition was to be for a limited time only, had urged the nation to suffer the hardship however great. The nation had in fact been told to speak no word of protest but to bow to the inevitable. There had been faithless assurances on the Government's part. He proposed to prefer various questions in the Committee Room, so he would now confine himself to this comment.

Mr. Nishimura Ryokichi had been of an easy mind, being quite persuaded that the war taxes would be abolished at the end of 1906. He had voted for them on that hypothesis. And now the House was asked to make them permanent. Moreover, some of these taxes involved duplication of the ordinary taxes. What were the Government's intentions and views?

Mr. Sakatani declared that the Bill had been the subject of the greatest care on the Government's part, and everything relating to the expenditure of the funds it provided might be learned accurately from the Budget now lying before the House. The only point was that taxes imposed for a limited time could not be regarded as permanent revenue, and therefore the time limitation had to be removed.

Baron Ozaki considered that before making the taxes permanent their nature should be subjected to most careful examination, and he therefore approved of the appointment of an investigation committee as suggested by the Lower House. But it appeared to him that the personnel of the committee might very well consist of officials only. What occasion was there to include civilians?

Mr. Sakatani replied that in view of the importance of the measure the Government wished to consult as wide a range of opinions as possible.

Viscount Tani observed that a verbal promise had been given as to the appointment of a committee to finish its labours within two years. But verbal promises could not be relied on. Besides, who was in a position to say that the Saionji Cabinet would last for two years? It might fall long before that. Fifty millions of people were anxiously awaiting the rescinding of this taxation measure. Nevertheless, looking at the Budget he found appropriations for new undertakings. The Government, relying on the hackneyed formula "development of the age," launched out in various routes of expenditure. Necessary outlays and the cost of keeping up the national armaments must be borne, but it seemed to him that the Ministry was acting with bad faith towards the people, and he trusted that if explanations were possible they would be forthcoming.

On the motion of Count Okimachi the Bill was handed to the same Committee as that entrusted with the examination of the former measure, and the House rose at 10.55 a.m.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

WEDNESDAY, 14TH FEBRUARY.

The House met at 1.08 p.m. the Order of the day being:—

(1) The General Budget for the year 1906-7 and the Special Accounts Budget.

(2) Items requiring Agreements which involve extra-Budgetary responsibilities.

(3) Supplementary Budget of Extraordinary War Outlays.

(4) Supplementary Budget No. 1 for the year 1905-6.

(5) Supplementary Budget No. 2 for the year 1905-6.

(6) Supplementary Budget No. 1 relating to the Special Accounts for 1905-6.

(7) Supplementary Budget No. 1 relating to extra-Budgetary Expenses.

(8) Government Bill for amending a part of the Railway Law sent up from the Lower House. (Vide Japan Mail January 26th.)

(9) Government Bill relating to State Aid for Expenses of Experiments and Instruction in the matter of Productive Enterprise. (Sent up from the Lower House; Vide Japan Mail, January 26th.)

(10) Government Bill relating to Appropriation of the Capital Fund for Supplementing War-vessels and Torpedo-craft (sent up from the Lower House.)

Bills No. (8), No. (9) and No. (10), were epitomized in the Japan Mail of the 12th instant.

The President suggested that the items on the Order from (1) to (7) inclusive should be taken en bloc, and the House having agreed, the Minister of State for Finance said that in view of the financial statements made by him on the preceding day, it did not now seem necessary to add any explanation. On the motion of Count Okimachi it was decided that the Budget Committee be asked to report upon these Bills within 20 days, namely, by March 5th.

With regard to No. (8) the Minister of Communications offered an explanation, whereupon Mr. Chisaka asked for a statement of the reasons which suggested that the railway from Shibata (in Niigata) to Yonezawa (in Yamagata) should be put into the First Construction Period in order to be rapidly built, and further asked whether the change would not affect lines already determined. The Minister of Communications replied that this addition had been made to the Bill by the House of Representatives and that the Government approved it. Other lines would not be affected. The Bill was then handed to a Committee of 9.

When the tenth Bill was read the Minister of Finance explained that while a Capital Fund for maintaining the strength of the Navy was undoubtedly necessary, the Government, in view of other heavy outlays necessitated during next financial year, deemed it better that the Fund should be applied to other purposes. The Bill was handed to a committee of 9 and the House rose 10.40 a.m.

"MONNA VANNA" AT THE MEIJI THEATRE.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Mr. Kawakami is on the war path again, and he has taken the field against his old enemy, Conventionality, with a courage and persistence which should win for him the sympathy of all lovers of true drama. To take Maeterlinck's 15th century Italian play and adapt it to the requirements of a Japanese audience is no light task; the obstacles must have been very serious. Artists and the spirited actor manager and his followers, may be heartily congratulated on the result.

Maeterlinck's story is profoundly dramatic and full of the most poignant as well as subtle situations. A fierce war is waging between the rival cities of Florence and Pisa; the Florentines have been roused to fury by the treacherous murder of one of their captains. Pisa is in the last throes of a disastrous siege. Reduced to extremity, decimated by fighting, the populace clamours for surrender; the ruler, Guido Colonna, holds out inflexibly, but consents to send his father, Marco, to the enemy's camp, to explain the Pisans' innocence of Reno's murder. Marco returns, bringing a strange message from Prinzivalle, the Condottiere leader of the Florentine forces. Prinzi-alle offers not only to spare the town, but to supply it with abundant provisions and to throw himself, with his six hundred mercenaries, over to the Pisan side, if Guido's wife, Monna Vanna, will come alone to his tent and remain there for one night. Guido is outraged—he reviles his father for delivering such a message; he would let all his people die by inches rather than consent. But his consent is not asked. The people, aware of the terms, clamour for Vanna's sacrifice; Marco, wise and old, declares it necessary; Monna Vanna herself decides to save her city and obey. Guido orders her incarceration—the beautiful faithful woman is the one deity of his heart—but no one stirs to carry out his orders. Bowed down under his scathing fury and contempt, Vanna departs, and comes alone to Prinzi-alle, who receives her with passionate triumph, for he has loved her all his life.

He reminds her of days in childhood when they played together, and her woman's wit leads him on from one sweet pure memory to another, until his storm of passion is calmed and he treats her with all chivalrous reverence. The dawn breaks on their converse, and Prinzi-alle confides to Vanna that his life is in danger from the Florentines, who have grown jealous of his fame. He will return with her to Pisa, where now he will surely be received as not only a friend but a saviour, since, during the night, the long trains of provisions and cattle have been moving into the starving city. Together the man and woman return to the town, where she is received by the populace with the wildest acclamation. They come into Guido's presence—Vanna flings herself on his breast, melting for joy in her double triumph.
But Guido is turned to stone. He throws her off as if her touch defiled him; her assurances that their mutual honour is safe appear to him as the wildest falsehoods. For a moment he thinks Vanna, desiring revenge, has brought Prinzi-alle to Pisa for execution, but when she cries out in horror at such barbarity Guido is convinced that she loves the Condottiere and instantly condemns the latter to torture and death. Then a change comes over Vanna. She lies, fiercely, desperately, tells Guido that he is right, that this man has robbed her of her honour, and demands that he be given into her hands alone that she may kill him by inches and have the joy of revenge.
The poor, sweet, noble woman knows that only so can she save him from Guido's wrath. But her strength is at an end. As Prinzi-alle is led away to prison she staggers after him, crying out that she alone must have the key to his dungeon. But Vanna is dying. As she sinks down, Guido eyes her with cold fury, while the people she has saved are still rejoicing noisily in the street. Her sacrifice is complete.

Madame Sada Yakko's acting in this part is full of the most exquisite womanly tenderness and strength. She radiates purity. Kawakami, as the old father, gives a piece of perfect character acting such as I have only seen equalled by Coquelin and Beerholm Tree. Voice, gesture, movement—the sad understanding of age—its wise patience with the heats of youth—all is before us, and our hearts ache for the old man's sorrow. As for Guido, heaven has bestowed on Mr. Fujisawa the traditional face and figure of the splendid historical race whose latest descendant in Rome to-day might be taken for a brother of this Japanese actor. Fujisawa interprets the part of Guido with fine pride and fire, and Prinzi-alle is almost equally convincing. The tremendous length of the speeches translated into Japanese (Maeterlinck will make one character speak for ten minutes) is a serious drawback for foreigners;
but if they will keep their impatience in hand, and also overlook the glaring discrepancies of costume, which constitute no defect in Japanese eyes (equally unfamiliar with all European periods) they will be rewarded by as fine a piece of dramatic art as could be seen on any European stage.

INTERPORT RUGBY FOOTBALL.

It is some ten years since an interport football match was played in Yokohama with hummocks of snow marking the confines of the playing-field;
and then as now Yokohama came out the winners.
On Saturday everything was done by the Committee of the Y. C. & A. C. to get the ground in order, but the fall of snow on Friday had been so heavy and the thaw so persistent that do what they would puddles and swamps were the chief characteristics of the field, making the ball slippery and the foothold treacherous. At the close it was difficult to recognise at first sight either victors or vanquished, so much of earth's kindly soil were they carrying about, brought there, of course, by frequent falls, and it speaks well for both teams that the game was fast and evenly contested all through.
The home fifteen played better than in any practise game this season, and Kobe certainly put up a magnificent exhibition, especially in tackling. Indeed, till long into the second half it looked as though the match would result in a draw, Yokohama being baffled again and again in their attempts to score: what the result would have been with the ground in decent order it is hard to tell. There was a good attendance of spectators, including many ladies, for whose better protection against the cold and damp the Committee thoughtfully provided seats as well as planks to stand upon. The band of the Toyama Military Academy discoursed music before and during the game. The line up was:—

Dr. J. A. Moon, R. N., referee. Linesmen: Mr.
Warren (Kobe) and Mr. L. S. Hudson (Yokohama.)

Yokohama kicked off from the settlement end and Kobe began very well, their forwards taking the leather well down the ground before they were checked. Then Totton secured the sphere and returned it into the visitors' territory, only to be collared. In the scrum Bowden and J. E.
Moss got on to the ball and rushed for the line, which was only just reached in time. The wet and slippery state of the ball prevented Stanley Moss from converting the try, but with 3 points to their credit Yokohama tossed their heads high and started in afresh. Kobe was by no means dispirited, however, and scrums became very frequent while the condition of the players grew dirtier and dirtier. Neither side made much progress, the forwards finding it impossible to break away on the treacherous ground and matters were looking rather tame when Hayward received a nasty blow in the face, and had to retire. Play stopped for a few minutes, but Hayward soon recovered, after a visit to the Pavilion, and on the game being resumed, Kobe worked the ball down into their opponents' territory. It did not stay there long, Dixon, Weed and Kilby securing and giving Jeffrey a fine chance to clear the line. Jeffrey followed this up by carrying the leather well down the ground, where he was forced back, but Kobe's chance was not far off. A minute later Lucas and Carst took the ball into Yokohama's territory, where it was kicked behind by one of the home fifteen. Jeffrey attempted to convert the try, but was unsuccessful, the angle and the state of the ball being dead against him. From now on till half time was nip-and-tuck, both sides doing their level best to get the lead; but all attempts, however well-conceived and boldly carried out, proved unsuccessful.

Half time, then, saw the two teams with an equal score of a try (3 points) and with a fixed determination to win out if possible. The sun was still shining brilliantly and the thaw still continued merrily, but the spectators were getting chilled to the bone notwithstanding all precautions over and above the fun of the game.

Yokohama pressed from the outset, while a great number of penalty kicks characterised the play. Time and again Yokohama swept into the Kobe lines, but the defence was too strong and not to be borne down by weight alone. The passing of the Yokohama three-quarters and halves was very good and improved all the time, but Reynell proved a tower of strength for his side and muscle and science seemed powerless to help the home fifteen. At length from a throw-in Yokohama worked the ball along the ground and a mix-up on the Kobe goal line ended in Strome securing a try. Stanley Moss again took the kick, but again was unsuccessful.
Time was now nearly up and Kobe made desperate efforts to equalise. But the luck was not with them and the whistle blew, leaving the score thus:—

Y. C. and A. C. .... 6 (two tries).

K. R. C. .... 3 (one try).

In the evening the teams dined together at the Yokohama United Club under the genial presidency of Dr. Wheeler. The usual complimentary speeches were made, healths proposed and drunk, and songs contributed by several of the company, a most enjoyable evening being spent.

The Association football match with Kobe is fixed for March 10th, at Kobe. Yokohama expects to get together a very fair eleven this year. On Saturday a match will be played at which the play of the younger members will be keenly watched, as many are showing good form and are in fine condition.

CUSTOMS PROTESTS.

Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama
Customs, delivered a decision on Feb. 9th on a protest filed by Messrs A. Oestmann and Co.
No. 76, Yamashita-cho. It appears that the firm imported "iron putty" manufactured with sulphuric calcium, powdered iron, carbon, clay and sulphur, on which composition the appraiser imposed 10 per cent ad val. duty and 5 per cent
ad val. war tax in accordance with No. 166 of the tariff. The importers contended that the goods should be dealt with under No. 472 of the tariff. The director decided to deal with the goods under No. 497 on the ground that the article is a kind of "cementing material" and not a kind of putty.

The same day another decision was given on a protest brought by the American Trading Co.
which firm imported an "initial perforator."
The appraiser placed it under No. 298 of the tariff. The importers held that the article should come under machinery classified in No. 17 of the tariff. The director decided to impose duty and war tax in accordance with No. 271 on the ground that the article is used to print initials on the lining-leathers of hats and that it is neither a machine nor stationary in nature.

The director of the Yokohama Customs has given a decision in a protest brought by Messrs.
L. J. Healing and Co., No. 22, Yamashita-cho.
The firm imported a "traction engine" on which the appraisers imposed 10 per cent ad val. duty under No. 24 of the tariff, which classifies steam engines, boilers, etc., including "traction engine." The importers contended that the article was a kind of locomotive engine and consequently should be dealt with in accordance with No. 43 of the Japan-German Conventional tariff, imposing 5 per cent ad val. duty. The director decided to impose 10 per cent ad val.
duty under No. 17 of the tariff and gave an explanation that the machine is neither a steam engine or a part of a locomotive.

The Chinese Minister at Paris, says the Nanfang-pao, has wired to the Waiwupu stating that Portugal, being in want of funds, is willing to sell Macao to England and France, and that the French Government is quite anxious to accept the offer.

YOKOHAMA GENERAL HOSPITAL.

The annual general public meeting to receive the report and accounts of the General Hospital was held on Monday at the Masonic Hall.

Mr. E. W. FRAZAR, Chairman, presided and there were also present Messrs. L. J. Healing, Vice-Chairman; M. Russell, Hon. Treasurer; M. Schellenberg, A. M. Knapp, Mrs. Manley, Mrs. E. W. Frazar, Senr., Rev. E. S. Booth, Mrs. Neville, Miss Kilby, Mrs. C. K. M. Martin, Mrs. E. J. Moss, Mrs. W. K. Tresize, Mr. D. H. Blake, etc.

At the request of the Chairman Mr. Schellenberg, as acting Secretary read the notice convening the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN then said:

I think the results of the past 2 years have pretty conclusively demonstrated that the Yokohama General Hospital is a useful and necessary institution; also that with a reasonable subscription it is possible to run it on a sound financial basis. The daily average of patients has been at least 10, of whom a good proportion were Yokohama residents.

It has been the constant aim and endeavour of the committee to make the hospital as comfortable and efficient as possible at the same time keeping the expenses down to the lowest figures. We have welcomed suggestions, comment and criticism, and if we have failed to give satisfaction to all, it has not been for want of earnest care or good intent.

We appreciate that much remains undone, and many things might have been done differently but it must be remembered that the Hospital covers much ground, and our funds are limited. Again the demands upon the accommodation are most irregular and sudden, which makes it doubly difficult to keep everything in such a state of perfection as we would like.

Nurse Gray and Nurse Peacock have fulfilled their duties to the entire satisfaction of the committee, and we are indeed fortunate in having their services. Mr. and Mrs. Ellis have paid close attention to their work, and deserve great credit for the good order and cleanliness of the premises, besides the economical conduct of the kitchen, general stores, native staff and collection of accounts.

To Dr. Wheeler special thanks are due for his steady attendance and interest in the welfare of the Hospital and patients, in which he has been ably assisted by Dr. Ishiura.

The new Operating Theatre has been in frequent and successful use, scarcely a case having been lost, even though some of the operations have been of the most delicate and serious nature.

As chairman, I feel privileged to take advantage of this opportunity to testify to the splendid backing I have received from the entire committee, particularly Mr. Neville, who has spent hours, yes, days, of his time over the accounts and improvement of system and order. Also Mr. Russell, who has guarded our finances with minute detail.

We have been greatly helped by the Ladies' Advisory Committee, who have at all times been ready to help in those particulars which rightly belong to a woman's supervision. Much of the success of a well ordered Hospital depends upon the hearty co-operation of two such committees.

In closing I desire to call attention to a slight omission in the report on page 2 under the heading of Fees. There should have been added a clause to the effect that Room Patients may be treated by their own Doctors in which case yen 2 per day will be deducted from the regular charges. We desire to encourage in every way the use of the Hospital by all medical men, the sole restriction being that their patients should be classed as Room Patients.

After the CHAIRMAN'S speech Rev. E. S. Booth who alluded to the debt the community owed to the Committee moved that the report and accounts be adopted.

Mr. D. H. BLAKE seconded and the proposal was carried.

On the motion of Mr. Blake, seconded by Rev. Mr. Booth the old Committee were re-elected en bloc.

An informal discussion then took place as to the accommodation for insane patients, the Chairman stating that to construct an isolated building for such patients would cost about yen 4,000, for which they would have to make an appeal to the public.

This matter with the question of maternity rooms was left to the incoming committee.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to the auditor, Mr. E. B. S. EDWARDS.

On the motion of Mr. KNAPP a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman, who cordially responded and the meeting terminated.

During the period covered by the report now presented, statements have from time to time been published by the Committee through the kindness of the local press. The Community has thereby been kept informed as to progress made.

Commencing with a deficit of yen 3,533.83, brought forward from the previous year, the period for which accounts are now submitted ends with a balance of yen 2,814.02 at credit of Profit and Loss Account.

During the Year, disbursements have been made, for Surgical Instruments and Medical Appliances, yen 1,265.74; for Furniture, yen 1,067.88; for Alterations and Repairs, yen 3,942.20; and for the outward passage of the new Nurse, yen 434.34.

The Working Account for the period shows a profit of yen 3,321.07 after supporting the Infectious Ward at Nakamura, which has been entirely unproductive.

Wages paid have amounted to yen 9,852.02, which sum includes nearly yen 4,000 for "special" nurses employed by desire of patients or their Medical Men. The outlay is regained through Earnings Account. The regular salaries payable amount to yen 460 per month (exclusive of the Matron's, which is paid by the Ladies' Committee).

Patients treated gratuitously have numbered 18 at a cost to the funds of yen 1,446.70. Other cases, regarded as doubtful, involve a further sum of yen 707.53, but it is hoped that part, at least, of this amount will be recovered.

The number of patients treated during the 14 months has been: Room 146, Ward 134, Total 270, of whom have been discharged Room 130, Ward 100, Total 230. Deaths have been: Room, 9, Ward, 13, Total 22. Number remaining on Dec. 31, Room, 7, Ward, 11, Total 18.

The fees for General Ward Patients have been reduced to yen 2.50 per diem. For Room patients they remain as before i.e. yen 6.50 and yen 7.50 per day. These fees cover treatment by the Hospital doctor, and the services of the regular nursing staff, but no special nurses employed at request of the patient or doctor in charge of the case. The charge for these special nurses, which ranges from yen 3.00 downwards per day, must be paid in addition to the regular Hospital fees. Patients are in all cases charged only with sums actually paid by the Hospital.

Among other improvements the upper floor of the main building has been entirely remodelled, providing five additional rooms and rendering the General Ward much more healthy and attractive.

Some 30 Russian ex-prisoners of war were admitted during the months of November and December. On their departure General Daniloff, the Commissioner, expressed himself, by letter to Dr. Wheeler, in extremely appreciative terms concerning the treatment accorded them. All extraordinary outlays connected with the reception of these men were paid by the Russian Red Cross Society, which furthermore presented to the Hospital a quantity of bedsteads, blankets, sheets, towels, &c., for which the Committee begs to express grateful thanks.

The Committee regrets to have to report a growing necessity for more accommodation for mentally afflicted patients. The present ward, arranged for one person, is quite inadequate. At the present moment there are four cases under treatment, some at times requiring restraint. The fact that the accommodation in the above ward is insufficient renders treatment much more expensive than need be, involving, as it does, the employment of extra watchers.

Two of the above mentioned cases may, it is feared, become a permanent and heavy charge on the community.

Donations, since last report, have amounted to the sum of yen 11,709.18, which includes yen 1,625.28 the balance of the funds of the Standing Committee of Foreign Residents of Yokohama, which we have received through the kind influence of Mr. Jas. Walter. By the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. McWilliams, assisted by other local amateurs, the Hospital benefited by the proceeds of a Dramatic Performance, to the extent of yen 519.95. The generous anonymous donor of the operating theatre apparatus sent, through Mr. Frazar, a further donation of yen 362.57, being the balance of cost of the instruments over and above his former gift.

In addition to above sums all the Banks and prominent Firms subscribed most liberally, the total from all sources, being as above mentioned, yen 11,709.18.

The urgent need of an up-to-date ambulance becoming known, a good friend of the hospital undertook to raise a collection from members of the Y. U. Club with the result that yen 220 were handed to the Hon. Treasurer which sum is amply sufficient to furnish a first class Ambulance. After examining all models, including that of the German Naval Hospital, plans were drawn up and approved.

The ambulance is expected to be delivered within a few days. The Committee takes this opportunity of thanking all connected with this fund, and assures them that their efforts are appreciated.

The accounts have been audited by Mr. E. B. S. Edwards, to whom the Committee tenders sincere thanks.

To the members of the Ladies' Advisory Committee the General Committee is indebted for much valuable assistance and advice. Under their auspices a most successful fete was given at the Hospital during the month of June last, when the Operating Theatre was thrown open for inspection.

The members of the Committee now tender their resignations, with a strong recommendation that the most urgent matter presently affecting the welfare of the Hospital and the Community is the need of providing new and proper quarters for the care and detention of mentally deranged patients.

E. B. S. EDWARDS, Auditor.

Notice is given by the Department of Communications that a lighted buoy will be moored off Mutsure-jima, western entrance to Shimonoseki Strait, to mark the position of the wrecked No 3. Ikuta Maru. The Buoy is of iron, frustum of a cone in shape, painted green, and surmounted by a lattice work supporting a lantern. The light, occulting green, is elevated 10 and 2/5 feet above the water, and is fed by Pintsch's gas.

ST. GEORGE'S SOCIETY.

The annual general meeting of the St. George's Society of Yokohama and Tokyo was held at the Masonic Hall on Thursday afternoon, Mr. Jas. Walter presiding over a large attendance.

The minutes of the last meeting having been confirmed, Mr. V. A. CAESAR HAWKINS proposed and Mr. M. BEART seconded that the report and accounts be taken as read and adopted. Carried unanimously.

The report issued to members over the signature of the President, Mr. James Walter, was as follows:—

On the 23rd April (St. George's Day), 1905, the Roll of the Society contained the names of 140 members including absentees.

The Society celebrated the anniversary of its Patron Saint with a Ball at the Public Hall on the 28th April, which was very largely attended and greatly enjoyed. Your committee wish particularly to thank Mr. E. Curgel for his invaluable assistance, it was largely due to his efforts, so generously granted, that we were enabled to decorate the Hall in such a truly English manner.

It is not one of the objects of this Society to accumulate funds, the subscription being only nominal and the raison d'être of the Society being only to celebrate St. George's Day. As will be seen by the accounts annexed there is a credit balance of yen 236.54.

The Royal Society of St. George, with headquarters in London, placed a wreath on Trafalgar day on Nelson's column, the card of our Society was attached thereto, thanks to the courtesy of the Honorary Secretary of this Institution. It is hoped that arrangements may be concluded shortly enabling us to affiliate with the Home Society.

Your committee in conclusion urge all those whose privilege it is to claim England as the land of their forefathers to become members of this Society. All particulars will be cheerfully furnished by the Hon. Secretary or any member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN said that he had now been President of the Society for several years and greatly appreciated the honour, but he thought that as the Society was increasing a change should be made and a new President elected every year. He was not a candidate for office this year, but he would give the Committee all the help he could, for his interest in the Society was very keen.

The election of officers and Committee was then taken by ballot, and while the votes were counted,

The CHAIRMAN said that the St. George's Society of Great Britain had written out to them suggesting affiliation. They would see by the report that the London Society had attached the Yokohama Society's card to the wreath placed on Nelson's column on Trafalgar's day. He would like to hear an opinion regarding the disposal of the Society's surplus funds. After discussion it was resolved to keep the funds in the Society's hands.

Mr. SHOWLER next proposed that St. George's Day, Monday, April 23rd, be celebrated as usual with a dance.

Mr. E. C. DAVIS seconded—carried unanimously.

The result of the ballot was declared as follows:—President, Mr. L. J. Healing; Vice-President, Mr. V. A. Caesar Hawkins; Hon. Secretary, Mr. H. J. Sharp; Hon. Treasurer, Mr. E. C. Eddison. Committee:—Messrs. F. L. Elliott, M. Beart, C. Thwaites, E. C. Davis and A. Bellamy Brown. Votes of thanks to Mr. Sharp, as Hon. Secretary, and Mr. Eddison as Hon. Treasurer were passed on the motion of the Chairman.

Mr. Walter, the retiring President, was accorded a very hearty vote of thanks for his services for the past three years and the meeting separated.

THE FAMINE BALL.

A subscription ball was held at the Public Hall on Thursday evening, under the auspices of the Charity Club of Yokohama, for the benefit of the Famine Relief Fund, and proved highly successful. Fancy dress was optional, but fully one half of those present availed themselves of the opportunity to display costumes of varied designs. The hall was nicely decorated for the occasion, and the scene was very bright while dancing was in progress, the attendance numbering about 250.

The fancy costumes of the ladies were in every case most charming to the eye, and only a lady's pen could deal with them in detail: There were several dresses reminiscent of "The Sleeping Beauty," then there were Pierrots and Pierrettes, Swiss, Turkish, Chinese, Pompadour, a Puritan maiden and many others that could not be exactly identified by a member of the male sex. Among the gentlemen the Georgian era was represented, and there were huntsmen, clowns, sailors, a nigger of sorts, a jockey, a baker, a Japanese hussar, a coolie, Mephistopheles, and many others including some which were very grotesque.

Among the most striking costumes were Miss Thomas as the Baroness and Mr. Skrimshire as Baron Fitzhardup in "Sleeping Beauty"; Miss C. Meuriman in a very original dress as a lamp-shade, in pink crepe; Mrs. Ritter in an Alsace-Lorraine costume; Miss Irwine as "Night"; Miss Woodward as a "Chinese Lady" in pink satin beautifully embroidered; Miss Johnstone as "Juliet" in pale green satin with gold brocade covered with sequins and pearls; Mr. R. Jamin as "La belle Fatima" Mr. J. M. Mollison and Mr. W. B. White in costumes of the Georgian period; and Mr. Brady who was amusingly disguised in a costume by no means new to him, supplemented by a large mask. As the Nigger Mr. S. Smith was most striking.

A substantial supper was provided, and dancing kept up with much spirit until the small hours, everyone present having a very happy time.

W. B. WHITE.

The committee of the Charity Club wish to express their thanks for the generous help they received in connection with the ball, and their special thanks are given to the patronesses, to the gentlemen who acted as stewards, to the local press for free advertising, to the Box of Curios for free printing, to Mrs. Box, the Public Hall Committee, to Messrs. Boyd & Co., the Japan Brewery Co., Ltd., North and Rae, Ltd., Lane, Crawford and Co., Ltd., J. Curnow and Co., Ltd., Mr. M. Dentici, Mr. Hunter and all those whose subscriptions and donations so greatly helped toward the success of the ball.

The Charity Club is an organization formed by young ladies of Yokohama with the object of relieving cases of distress among sufferers from the war and from other causes. The present committee consists of the following:—President, Miss Mendelson, Vice-President, Miss Lloyd Thomas, Hon. Sec., Miss Meuriman and Hon. Treas. Miss Copmann.

THE LAW COURTS.

PETITION FOR DEPRIVATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS.

The hearing of a case instituted by Mr. Jules Dubois, No. 26, Yamashita-cho, against Mrs. Julia Dubois, No. 64, Bluff, wife of the late Mr. Charles L. Dubois, petitioning for the deprivation of her parental rights over her children, began on Feb. 12th in the Yokohama District Court.

Plaintiff was represented by Mr. H. Nakamura and the defendant by Mr. R. Ideura.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that his client, Mr. Jules Dubois is the elder brother of the late Mr. C. L. Dubois, husband of the defendant. The late Mr. C. L. Dubois married the defendant on April 29th, 1896, in Neuchâtel, Switzerland. Subsequently the couple lived in Yokohama and they had four children—Lucy, George, Charles Louis, and Sophia. On August 17th, 1905, Mr. C. L. Dubois died and Mrs. Julia Dubois, defendant in the present case, and Mr. Jules Dubois, the plaintiff, were nominated guardians of the four children in accordance with the Civil Code of Switzerland. Plaintiff was appointed to the position by the Swiss Consul-General. Defendant was of idle disposition and did not pay any attention to the nursing and education of her children. She squandered the allowance made her by the administrator of deceased's estate instead of supporting the family. If this continued it would seem that the children would soon be placed in a distressing position. Meantime, the defendant sold a portion of the furniture necessary for keeping the household together and which was also a portion of the property left by the deceased. She spent the money on her own pleasures. In accordance with the Swiss Civil Code, the woman should be deprived of her rights over the children.

Defendant's Counsel held that there was nothing blameworthy in the conduct of the defendant. She was acting as best she knew as mother of her children. She spent for necessary expenses the money which she received monthly from the Swiss Consul General, the administrator of the deceased's property. Two of the children are attending the Roman Catholic Convent and two others go to the St. Joseph's School for their education. Referring to the statement of plaintiff's Counsel as to the alleged sale of furniture, the defendant's Counsel said that after the death of her husband, the defendant removed from the house where she formerly lived to a smaller house. When she removed to the smaller dwelling, there was naturally a surplus of furniture and this she sold. She raised five hundred yen by the sale of the articles. This amount was entrusted to Mr. James Favre-Brandt, No. 175, Yamashita-cho, who is one of the deceased's relatives. Afterwards Mr. Favre-Brandt transferred the money to Dr. P. Ritter, Swiss Consul-General, for safekeeping with other property entrusted to him. Counsel concluded by saying that the petition of plaintiff was too vague to require an answer.

In reply to the Court, plaintiff's Counsel said that the convention between Japan and Germany with regard to the function of Consuls provides that these authorities are authorized to administer the property of a national for the first twelve months after death. The foregoing must be applied to the case of citizens of Switzerland under the most favoured nation clause. Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine Mr. James Favre-Brandt and Dr. Paul Ritter, Swiss Consul, as witnesses. As there was no objection by defendant the Court decided to examine them on Feb. 19th.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Commander I. Takeshita has been appointed naval attaché of the Embassy in Washington.

To-day, Feb. 16th, the Crown Prince will leave his villa at Hayama for Tokyo, arriving at Shimabashi by the 1.59 p.m. train.

A floating mine was observed on Feb. 8th off the village of Kunimi, Fukui prefecture. Some fishermen brought the mine ashore and handed it to the authorities.

Major-General Matsukawa at 1 p.m. on Feb. 15th gave a speech to the Budget Committee of the Lower House with regard to the land operations during the war.

Mr. Walter H. Frizell, until recently manager of the Singapore branch, has been appointed accountant at the head office of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China.

The Pacific Mail steamer Siberia brings news of the death from pneumonia of Mrs. G. W. Bramhall, a former well-known resident of Yokohama, who left here some two years or so ago to resume residence in the United States. To add to the poignant distress of the family, the aged mother of Mrs. Bramhall (who also spent many years in Japan) died the same day as her daughter. This news will occasion much sorrow among a very wide circle.

The Hon. Frank Lindley, one of the Secretaries of the British Residency at Cairo, has been transferred to the Embassy in Tokyo. He arrived by the Zieten on Feb. 12th in company with his wife and children.

The Italians in Crete have demanded an indemnity for the murder of an Italian soldier on Jan. 8. They have seized three Customs Houses as guarantees in consequence of the refusal of the Cretan Government to pay.

Earl Cromer, inaugurating the Red Sea to Nile railway at Port Soudan, dwelt on the importance of making the upper Nile easily accessible. The railway was the first step in a great scheme of works of irrigation and the railway would be open on equal terms to the trade of the whole world.

The leading business men of Tokyo, Osaka, Kyoto, Kobe, and Nagoya have decided to hold an industrial exhibition at Mukden, Manchuria. The promoters will meet in Osaka on Feb. 16th to draft the bye-laws in connexion with the enterprise. The period of exhibition will be from May 1st to July 31st.

A Manila cable to the Japan Advertiser says:—Representative Nicholas Longworth of Ohio is ill with tonsillitis, and it is feared that his marriage with Miss Alice Roosevelt, scheduled for Saturday, may have to be postponed. Congressman Longworth caught cold a few days ago. He thought nothing of the matter, but was ultimately forced to take to his bed. His condition has since not improved greatly, but is not necessarily dangerous and has not occasioned any anxiety.

At 4.30 a.m. on Feb. 15th, an outbreak of fire occurred in a small dancing house belonging to U. Saito, Nigirwaicho, Ichome, facing Isezakicho, Yokohama. Owing to the strong northerly wind the flames spread and five houses situated in the narrow street were destroyed. The fire was put out through the efforts of the firemen from the Isezakicho and Kotobukicho police stations. As to the cause, it is said that the dancing had been kept up till a late hour the previous night, after which several lighted hibachi were left in the hall. Probably the outbreak originated with one of these braziers.

On Feb. 13th snow fell all over the north-eastern provinces.

Aomori.—Heavy snow fell here. Traffic on the railways was interrupted for four or five hours.

Nagaoka.—Owing to a snow storm, many houses collapsed and traffic on the Hokuyetsu experienRailway was stopped.

Shiraishi.—Snow has continued to fall since Feb. 9th. On Feb. 13th, a severe storm was experienced. The weather was very cold.

Takata.—Owing to a heavy storm, a train on the Hokuyetsu Railway has been buried in the snow.

The following table, taken from Tokyo papers, shows the development of Japanese life insurance business:—

	Number of Companies.	Register'd Capital. Yen.	Paid up Capital. Yen.
1881 .....	1	100,000	40,000
1904 .....	35	4,905,000	2,982,938

The reserve funds of the thirty-five companies at the end of 1904 aggregated yen 22,525,472.

The funeral of Mrs. Riku Soma, wife of Mr. N. Soma, President of the Yokohama Specie Bank, who died on Feb. 12th, took place on Wednesday at Aoyama Cemetery. Many government officials and leading merchants were present. Mrs. Aya Yamamoto, wife of the Manager of the Osaka branch of the Bank of Japan, and Mrs. Yoshi Ishikawa, wife of Dr. Ishikawa, now in Okayama, are her daughters. There is a third daughter named Yoshi (14) who lives with her father, the prominent banker. The late Mrs. Soma was the adopted daughter of the late professor K. Nakamura, a well-known Chinese Scholar.

The Kobe Herald understands that what would probably have been a fatal termination to an accident to a sendo in Kobe harbour was averted by a notable act of bravery on the part of Captain Christensen. It appears that whilst the Hongkong Maru was being despatched, on Saturday, a sendo fell off the launch Josephine. A life buoy was thrown to him, but he missed this and sank. Captain Christensen, seeing this, jumped overboard, clothing and all, and was successful in saving the sendo. The sendo was hauled on board in an exhausted condition, and taken to the engine room of the Josephine. Captain Christensen seems to have suffered nothing from his plunge beyond a very "cold bath," the loss of his hat, and the saturation of his paper money, to say nothing of a cigar which he did not relinquish when he made his hasty dive.

AN APPRECIATION OF KOREA.

The following views of Dr. Rutherford Harris, M.P., will be read with interest as they represent the impression produced by Korea and the Koreans on a keen observer:—

"I went to Korea," says Dr. Harris, "expecting to find a country and a people not indeed up to the standard of our ally Japan, but at all events not so far behind her as to forbid comparison altogether. This has no reference, of course, to the fighting services. I knew that there did not exist such a thing as a Korean navy, and that the Korean army was little more than a name. Otherwise, however, I expected to see an organized state of society, perhaps a cycle, perhaps a century, behind the time but still within computable distance of modern ideals. Landing at Fusan, I went as far north as Pingyang and made in the country a sojourn of nearly three weeks in all. What I found it really baffles me to describe. One may fairly question whether elsewhere on the face of the earth there exists such a combination of unspeakable dirt and indescribable sanitary horrors as assail one eyes and nose anywhere and everywhere in the larger Korean towns. Some exception must be made in favour of the two main thoroughfares in Seoul. Those show evidence of the reforming zeal temporarily aroused in the Sovereign's bosom by urgent foreign counsels. But one has only to penetrate a few paces into the city on either side of these thoroughfares and one discovers that the state of the capital is as hopelessly abominable as that of any other town in the peninsula. I have not seen the towns along the banks of the Grand Canal in China. They are pretty bad I believe. But it is inconceivable that they should rival or even approach Pingyang, the second city in Korea, which must be without competitors outside Darkest Africa. One has read of hovels, of slums and of the submerged tenth, but here is something sunk to depths far profounder. Miles of hovels; hovels upon hovels; all betraying abject poverty and monotonous uniformity of filth, with the exception of a few spots created outside the city's walls by missionary devotion or Japanese enterprise. In those spots you seem to be in another world, and the contrast with their purely Korean surroundings is all the more flagrant. One detects no traces of organized civil life. There are virtually no shops worthy of the name, and there are no hotels except those kept by Japanese. The same is true of municipal courts, of posts and of telegraphs. Nothing that is not Japanese deserves mention. Food is practically unobtainable unless a Japanese or a foreigner furnishes it, and, in a word, one looks in vain for any evidences of an organized state of society. What one does observe, however, is a mass of hardworking, quiet people, living and struggling to eke out a half-starved existence in the midst of poverty and dirt. Beyond successful survival they appear to have no hope, no ambition, no purpose in life. So it seemed to me at all events. National vitality there is none; national policy, the phrase becomes ridiculous under such circumstances; national aims, how could they possibly exist amid an environment so paralysing? Naturally there are exceptions to this general analysis but they do not aggregate one per cent. of the population. Missionary effort is continuous and unflagging. So is Japanese effort and with larger results. The Koreans were once the carriers of civilization to Japan. But their progress was arrested. They retraced their steps, not to a clean, healthy, savage life of open-air work, but an existence devoid of almost any redeeming feature. Why this signal decadence should have ensued it is hard to tell. Whether the enervating traditions of obsolete creeds were responsible, or whether the cause is to be sought in the tides of war that rolled over the people, exposing them to its horrors without any of the consolations furnished by patriotism, I can not tell, but it is certain that they proceeded to clothe themselves slowly and steadily with every repulsive and repellent garment, retaining nothing of their old civilization except elusive memories, until it has become impossible for any one who considers Korea fairly and squarely to conceive that the monarchy and the nation can be saved, or raised again, as a whole unless they pass under the strong, firm and energetic hands of their neighbours and natural teachers, the Japanese. Whatever enterprises exist in the country are in the hands of foreigners or Japanese, and it seems evident that the Koreans, as a rule, have quite lost the power of inception or the instinct of ambition. From what I have been able to ascertain there are undoubtedly a small number of Korean civilians and a few officials worthy to be called hard-working and educated patriots who, alive to the needs of their country and acquainted with the measure of her capacities, are determined to do whatever lies within their power to raise Korea and its people once again to a worthy place in the East. These are the men who strongly favour the new Convention with Japan, believing that on this foundation their country, in the course of a generation, will have won its way back to manhood and nationhood. It appears to be believed by well informed persons that the Emperor himself is at the head of these patriots. Even he, however, taught by the ill-success of his efforts in the past, recognises how impotent is a sovereign, unaided by his people, to effect any national uplifting. The Japanese, too, appear to recognise the nature of the task lying before them. It has taken of England's best, and for how many years, to improve the lot of the Fellaah and of the Hindoo, and so Japan must give of her best in all branches of civilized life and must be prepared to persist in spite of temporary failures or the misrepresentations of biased on-lookers. No one who has read the generous, sympathetic, far-sighted and wise words of Marquis Ito at the dinner given in his honour by the business-men of Tokyo can doubt that Japan views her task, her duties to herself and her obligations to the Koreans as conscientiously and as honourably as Great Britain herself would in similar circumstances, nor can any one who has seen Korea fail to wish the Japanese Godspeed in their undertaking. Stories have been assiduously circulated to prove that force was employed to extort the Convention from reluctant Korean statesmen and an unwilling sovereign. I can not find the least tangible ground for such tales. The Japanese Minister, Mr. Hayashi, had the confidence of the Emperor of Korea and would never have built the new system on such a foundation. He and the Marquis Ito willingly assented, at the Emperor's request, to the insertion of the Convention's second clause safeguarding the dignity of the Korean throne and promising the full restoration of Korea's autonomy whenever she should have qualified to exercise it. If Japan sends to Seoul men of Mr. Hayashi's type, and if her policy in Korea is dictated, and directed by statesmen as great and illustrious as the Marquis Ito, I venture to predict that the great bulk of the Koreans will respect and value Japanese guidance as sincerely and thoroughly as do any of England's subject races her gentle and liberal sway."

CORRESPONDENCE.

STARVING AND FREEZING.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Hunger knows no seasons. Lack of food causes as much distress in summer as in winter and the gnawing within the breast is the same no matter what the weather 'out-of-doors. From one point of view the worst in the famine districts has not yet come. Month by month the bodies will become more and more emaciated and the faces more and more shrunken and the want of proper food will show itself more and more in the outward appearance of the sufferers.

However now in midwinter the suffering is intense and to the lack of food are added the discomforts of severe wintry weather. Death by drowning is the same in summer as in winter, but in winter there is the added chill of the ice water and there must be a greater degree of suffering before the victim actually loses consciousness.

The Japanese newspapers have correspondents out in the famine districts and their tales of woe and misery fill column after column of the Japanese press. A recent report of one of these correspondents said that "the number of those who have already starved to death and of those who are now at the point of death because of starvation is not small." We foreigners have no first-hand knowledge of any of the former class of cases but the Sendai papers give names, addresses and details of a number of deaths by starvation and freezing.

In the north this is an exceptionally cold winter. For the first time in many years horses have been carrying their burdens across the Kitakami river on the ice. There has not been one warm day for several weeks.

Last summer we wondered where all the rain came from. For thirteen days the sun did not shine, and at night we could not see the moon or stars. At last we would think that it was about to clear up, but the next day it would rain harder than ever. Now we wonder where all the snow can come from. About two weeks ago we had the deepest snow of recent years; although little of that snow has yet melted, except along the road, snow has fallen several times since.

In many places the public relief works have of course been suspended. A hundred thousand able-bodied men and women would to-day be given employment on these public works had not the snow suddenly put a stop to such measures of relief. These are the self-respecting, class, able and willing to do any kind of work to keep from starving, but despite the best efforts of the Government to provide employment many must against their wills be idle.

Very careful investigations have been made and it is found that in these three provinces there are from 25,000 to 40,000 sick and aged persons and helpless children, not one of whom can support himself by his own labour and who must be helped for some months whether it snows or not and no matter if the weather is cold or hot. But how bitter is their lot in this severe winter.

This morning at ten o'clock it began to snow again and since then nearly a foot of snow has fallen. When there is a storm we can hear in Sendai the roar of the sea nine miles away. To-night we hear the roaring of the waves. A storm is raging without and no doubt the wintry blasts bring terror to many a heart. Even though not even one should freeze to death to-night will it be possible to-morrow and the next day and the next to reach all with food before even one starves to death?

AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I do not altogether agree with the opinion you express in your issue of January 27th, in your article entitled "The Philippines," that the members of the tolerably strong party in the United States which sets its face against imperial expansion and consequently denounces the acquisition of the Philippines as a flagrant departure from the political routes the United States should unfailingly follow, would vote against the sale of the islands to a foreign Power. Two years ago I was at home for a short visit. I did not travel extensively, but wherever I did go, and I was in the strongholds of the present administration, I found the majority of people anxious to be rid of a bad bargain; and I may say that quite a number of those whom I have met that are, or have been, connected with the Philippine administration itself, are of the same opinion. There was no evidence of a disposition to shrink a responsibility which we foolishly assumed in buying the islands from Spain, and I am convinced that there would be strong opposition to passing them over to another Power, unless there were positive assurance that the inhabitants would not suffer in any way. By that I do not mean necessarily that it would be expected of the Power which might acquire the archipelago from us, to grant to the Filipinos that right to self-government for which we now claim to be trying to educate them.

I doubt if our new ambassador, assuming that the Hon. Luke Wright qualifies, will really be instructed to sound the Japanese Government with a view to effecting a sale; but if he is, and if he succeeds in making a satisfactory bargain, I think the Americans may be absolved from the charge of having put their hands to the plough and then turned back, for I think that the Filipinos and other inhabitants of the archipelago would be quite as well off in the hands of the Japanese as they are in ours, the possible loss of political autonomy being excepted; and I am convinced that the expenses of administration would be, other things equal, decidedly less than we find them. You must have noticed that there is already much disposition among our congressmen to criticise adversely the income and ongo of the Philippine colony, and an embarrassingly incisive questioning of the propriety of our treating the islands as a foreign country in some circumstances, and as a true colony (that is, a part of the national domain) in others.

If you do us Americans the honour of including us in the statement that the instinct of empire is firmly planted in every Anglo-Saxon, and I take it for granted you do, because, generally speaking, we are of Anglo-Saxon ancestry, again I think you are mistaken. We are somewhat peculiarly circumstanced. You and other outside observers, are quite justified in gauging the condition of the political atmosphere in the United States by the Washington barometer; yet while the Senate and the Representatives are naturally assumed to represent the people, it is not always a fact that the official act of the Senate or the House, or even of them both when acting together, represents indisputably the sentiments of the whole people. For example: do you really believe that the members of the United States Senate represented the sentiments of the people, when they interfered with President Roosevelt's laudable efforts to negotiate a treaty of arbitration with Great Britain? You will surely recall that the Senatorial demand that all the details of such treaties must be submitted to them for action prior to concluding any such agreement, thereby compelling the President to terminate the negotiations, aroused a perfect storm of indignation. If any one does think that action represented the opinions of even a minority of the people of my country, I do not! So with this matter of territorial expansion. It has seemed good to the Government at Washington to acquire certain colonies beyond the seas, and the glamour which the administration has succeeded in throwing over the members of both Houses of Congress, has had the effect of making them complacent towards that violation of the fundamental principles of our government, that the United States has no business to acquire possessions in any other part of the world than the continent of North America; but in that complacency, I think it would be unwise and indeed incorrect to say that the members of Congress necessarily and absolutely represented the views of their constituents. In concurring with the administration's views about expansion, the members do not incur the displeasure of their constituents to such an extent as to jeopardize their chances of re-election, for this matter of empire does not seriously affect the individual. I do not wish to write myself down as such a hidebound conservative that I shall be thought unwilling to admit the possibility of change in the opinions of Americans; but there must be given me more cogent reasons for changing my opinions than anything that has been presented to me to support the taking or the keeping of the Philippine colony. That carelessness towards such matters as imperial expansion is, I think, largely the reason why there appears to you to be a disposition in the United States to approve of the schism of territorial expansion. Looked upon as being an acquisition, I admit that the majority of us are not only Anglo-Saxon but that all are human in a willingness to increase our territorial holdings, for acquisitiveness is the common inheritance of all of us. Possibly all of us would feel quite satisfied to possess the whole earth, if only we felt quite sure that we could take proper care of it. Individual ownership would remove all danger of international complications, but so long as there are other nations, whose rights we are bound to respect, and who are likely to resent our interference in the affairs of the world outside of our own continent, there will continue to be a majority of the people of the United States who hold that we have enough to do to develop what we have near home, and that it is foolishly seeking trouble to go beyond the seas to acquire colonies. I suppose you know that at the end of the war between Spain and the United States, there were some journals in the latter country that advocated demanding from the former the cession of the Balearic Islands in order that we might have a coaling station for our war-ships in European waters. The idea was shown so promptly to entail all manner of complications and the suggestion was so generally ridiculed, to say nothing of the very proper resentment of the European States which such a performance would have entailed, that it never even received a moment's careful consideration from the Government at Washington.

Yes, there are some who have the instinct of empire firmly planted in their breasts; but not all of us. President Roosevelt has it, I am afraid, to excess; he draws around him those who are in sympathy with him: the influence of the Cabinet is felt in Congress; beyond that it does not necessarily go. If Mr. Roosevelt had rested his claim to re-election solely upon his imperialism, do you think the people of the United States would have chosen him again? I do not, although I am truly glad that he was re-elected and I did what little I could to help him, unless the people had been convinced that, even with the doubtful recommendation of imperialism, he had been in every way much stronger than his opponents.

Yours faithfully, JOSEPH K. GOODRICH.

A VISIT TO THE FAMINE DISTRICTS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Having recently paid a visit to Sendai it may interest your readers to hear something of what I saw in the famine district. Mr. de Forest was kind enough to pilot me to the village of Tamaura, about twelve miles south of Sendai, where he had heard that there was distress but which he had not yet visited. Armed with a card of introduction from the Mayor of Sendai, whom we met at the railway station, we proceeded to Iwanuma and from there took kuruma to the village about two miles distant. The country here, all fine paddy land, was still white with snow remaining from a heavy fall about a fortnight previously. The mud roads, hard frozen at night, were in an almost impassable condition when thawed out by the heat of the sun, and we had to alight and trudge through the sludge as best we could. On our way we passed several substantial farmhouses standing in their own grounds and surrounded by groves of trees fully testifying to the prosperity of the district in ordinary times. Arriving at Tamaura we interviewed the head man, who informed us that the village consisted of one hundred and seventy-five houses out of which there were at present fifteen that had no food. The rice crop had been a complete failure, only two per cent. of an ordinary crop, and with the exception of two people the whole population were very poor. He took us round to five or six of the houses, after which we had seen enough. The houses in this district are poor structures of wattle and mud but no doubt are weather proof when in good repair. At some of the houses we visited the mud had fallen off the walls leaving them open to the four winds of heaven. Inside there was hardly any bedding, clothing or mats, and no food; the old women and children looked thin and weak and could hardly speak without crying, yet none of them begged for help. The men, apparently in despair, had all left the place, as we saw none about with the exception of two or three huddled over their fires too ill to move. The only food visible in the village was a few small daikon; the paddy remained as it was cut, the ears being empty. The whole village appeared to us to be in the last stage of destitution and misery and we were informed had as yet received no assistance. If not soon forthcoming the greater part of these people must inevitably perish from starvation and cold, firewood being almost as scarce as food. If this is the state of affairs in the centre of a rich rice producing district what must it be in the villages snowed up in the hills? It will undoubtedly be many months before there is any food in this district except what is brought in from outside and in the mean time what are all these starving people to do? The local authorities are doing all they can to relieve the distress but have hitherto held back somewhat for fear of pauperizing the people. I think your readers will agree with me that it is no longer a question of pauperizing, but of saving life, and from enquiries I have made I feel certain that the charitably disposed may rest assured that their gifts will be faithfully and carefully distributed.

Yours truly,

FRANCIS OWSTON.

THE FAMINE IN FUKUSHIMA KEN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—To the best of my knowledge I am the only foreign resident in Fukushima ken. There are some French priests who visit occasionally Fukushima and other towns in the ken, but certainly I am the only constant foreign resident in Fukushima itself. I have repeatedly been asked by friends living in Tokyo and Yokohama for information regarding the reports which have from time to time appeared in the newspapers.

As I am living within only a few miles of the famine district, indeed, in the very centre of it in Fukushima ken, I determined to give the few days holiday which generally follows Christmas to go into the country and see for myself the real state of things. I started from Fukushima, walking west of the railway to Koriyama, then, crossing the line, returning east again to Fukushima. Eastward I went as far as Yamakoya Mura, some 15 miles from the railway line. I had been told in many places of the district there. I found it just as it had been represented. Hundreds of fields of rice are still uncut. Rice there is none, the straw is not worth cutting, and now the whole is laying under the heavy snow. One in five of the children come to school bringing no food, although many of them come miles, and when they return home in the evening only get a meal known as "Dango." This is made of anything that can be mixed together and is quite black. Many of the children steal each others' bento. This state of things exists in lots of places in other counties. In Shimo Kawasaki Mura, Adachi-gori, being near the busy towns of Kawamata and Matsukawa, the men find a little work and could get a little help. At Takuno Mura in the same county I found much the same. Rice was from 15 to 18 sen per sho.

During eight days I walked through Date-gori, Shinobu-gori, Adachi-gori, Tamura-gori, and part of Asaka-gori, always keeping clear of the Railway, and at once making for the Yakuba (village offices). The villages amongst which I visited were Otaira Mura, Haginoda Mura, Ota Mura, Kawada Mura, Hara Michi, Kodzunagi Mura, Arai Mura and the busy town of Miharu. Another visit I made was to the distant districts in Shinobu Gori, Natano Mura and Ozasa Mura. Muniwa Mura is mostly shut in by the deep snow. My journey of inquiry made up a walk of at least 160 miles. The result was that I made up my mind to try and help one or more of the villages. My first thought was to give the half-starved children a good hot meal two and three times a week. A friend kindly put a hundred yen at my disposal. Bishop M'Kim, of Tokyo, was good enough to give me the Christmas collection at the Trinity Cathedral, Tsukiji, of 204 yen (foreign Congregation) making it up himself to 300 yen. Having this in hand I went to the Kencho telling them what I wished to do. They received me and my plan kindly, suggested where help was needed and did all they could to facilitate my desire. Enough has been said of distressing cases of starvation. They are many. I will give one in the village in which we are giving relief. A family of seven, living in a one-roomed shed. All lay on straw laid on the earth; the only light coming in through the door half covered with paper. The old father, a cripple, the mother, blind. The son a farm labourer with wife and three young children. Now no work can be had. Another family, also seven in number are living in a hole dug out of the hill side not more than 7 by 6 feet and 4½ feet in height. A little lean-to roof serves as an entrance, the opening has a piece of straw matting for a door. Needless to say all the children and poor mother look like sick patients, in fact, the eldest boy is ill with consumption. The man's name is Sakuma Kishiroku. It is a wonder to me how people can live under such circumstances. In nearly all cases one finds a child hanging at the mother's breast. I could go on telling story after story but others besides myself have found the same state of things over and over again. What are we doing to help? Three days a week in Nakano Mura a good hot meal of rice and vegetable soup is given to 30 children in the school. The same is being done in Ozasa Mura. Distressed old people get two or three cho of rice given to them every Tuesday. Needless to say the demand for help grows.

I have a women's working party making shirts or kimono for the thinly clad children. Old clothes will be made the best use of, and I shall be most grateful for them. Money, old or new clothing, food stuff; anything can be made use of. Don't think things are too old to send.

To those who feel drawn to help in this work of mercy and love and who wish further to contribute to our fund I shall indeed be grateful.

THE AMERICAN BOARD MISSION AND THE KUMIAI CHURCHES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In the Weekly Mail of the 10th instant there appears in the Monthly Summary of the Japanese Religious Press the following passage referring to the relations of the missionaries of the American Board to the Kumi-ai Churches, a portion of which I underscore:—"There should henceforth be no unfriendliness between the foreign and the Japanese workers. Race distinctions should melt away. It may be said that the missionaries who have been instrumental in effecting the great change are all Japonicized, and hence we think they will work in perfect harmony with us. They are now honorary members of our Church, but there is nothing to prevent them from becoming ordinary members if they are so disposed. They could hold office in the native churches if they pleased. It does not seem to us that there will be any further need for their existence as a separate body supported by a foreign Missionary Society. It is a fact that the missionaries possess a knowledge of theology and scripture exegesis which is most valuable to our churches, and as organizers of various societies their assistance cannot be dispensed with without loss."

The text upon which the underscored lines are based is given in a footnote. It reads:—Gofin wa American Board no senkyoshi shoshi ga betsu ni Nihon ni atte issuu tokubetsu ni senkyoshi jishin no kyokai wo iji sevaruru wo hitsuyō to wa mizaru nari. The special organisation referred to here as a tokubetsu ni senkyoshi jishin no kyokai which is no longer needed is not the Mission of the American Board in Japan. It is what we are accustomed to call our "Mission Church," a quasi ecclesiastical body to which nearly all the missionaries belong. This "Mission Church" is organically distinct from the "Mission," has different records and different officers.

Many of our Japanese friends would be glad to see the "Mission" also disbanded and the missionaries taken over by the "Missionary Society" of the Kumi-ai Churches, but that thought does not find expression in the Japanese text above quoted.

I remain,

D. C. GREENE.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE)

BRITISH POLITICS.

London, February 9.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has written a long letter to Lord Ridley regarding the future policy of the Unionist party. He says he does not desire to accept the leadership of the party; but he repudiates the suggestion that the party might drop the proposal to introduce tariff reform, as he thinks doing so would be inconsistent with Mr. Balfour's own statements. Mr. Chamberlain says he has asked for a meeting of the party to discuss its future policy. Then, if the majority is in favour of dropping the "tariff reform" question, Mr. Chamberlain would form a group ready to co-operate with their Unionist colleagues for common objects. But he cannot accept a policy of inaction, or of "mystification" regarding the main object of their political life. He emphasises the necessity of reorganising the party machinery.

JOHN BURNS AND THE KING.

London, February 9.

The Rt. Hon. John Burns, President of the Local Government Board in the new British Ministry, has had an hour's audience with the King.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

The French are loudly protesting against any idea of yielding in regard to the policing of Morocco.

SOUTH AFRICAN LOYALTY.

The Duke of Connaught, Inspector-General of the British Army, gave audience at Pretoria to 400 chiefs of native tribes and their followers, who swore loyalty and devotion to the British Crown, recalling the benefits they had received from their "Mother, Queen Victoria." The Duke of Connaught replied that he was gratified by the reports of their law-abiding habits.

POLICING MOROCCO.

London, February 10.

A telegram from Algieras, published in Paris, declares that the critical moment has arrived. The Powers are favourably impressed by the frankness of the French delegates, as compared with the reticence of the Germans, and insist on France policing Morocco as the only possible solution of the question.

JAPANESE AND AUSTRALIAN MILITARY PLANS.

The Daily Chronicle publishes a sensational story about the secret plans of the fortifications of Sydney (New South Wales) having been discovered in the luggage of two Japanese. Mr. Playford (Minister of Defence in the Commonwealth Government), is investigating the affair.

NEW AMERICAN WARSHIPS.

The plans of the projected U.S. battleships North Carolina and Michigan provide for twelve guns of twelve-inch calibre, and no secondary battery, except something sufficient to repel torpedo attacks.

TROUBLES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Later.

Armed natives attacked fourteen policemen who were collecting the poll-tax at Richmond, Natal. They killed the Inspector and a private, and six men are reported missing. Troops have been sent to the scene.

A MINE ACCIDENT.

Fifty-five Kaffirs have been drowned by the flooding of the Southropdeep Mine, on the Rand.

SENTENCE QUASHED.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, sitting in London, have quashed the East Africa Appeal Court's sentence of death passed upon Herman Wehner for the alleged murder of a native.

THE ALGERIRAS NEGOTIATIONS.

London, February 11.

A telegram from Algieras published in Berlin says that a favourable outcome of the Conference at Algieras was expected till the French delegates suddenly expressed their desire for a settlement of the policing question. The telegram adds that the German delegates will not consent to the "Frenchifying" of the whole coast, which would legalise the incorporation of Morocco in French Africa.

JAPANESE IN AUSTRALIA.

The Morning Chronicle has a telegram from Melbourne to the effect that the Hon. Thomas Playford, Minister of State for Defence, has ascertained that the Japanese espionage story is unfounded.

AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

From Washington it is reported that the House of Representatives has passed a bill revising the Philippines tariff, and increasing the duty on European made cotton goods.

AMERICAN TROOPS FOR MANILA.

Later.

A telegram from Washington says that Mr. Secretary Taft has asked the Senate for a supplementary grant to build barracks in Manila. He explained that it might one day be necessary to send troops to China.

TROUBLE IN NATAL.

The Prime Minister of Natal states that the Imperial troops are suppressing the native troubles.

THE TRANSVAAL.

London, February 12.

The Government has appointed Lord Elgin, Lord Ripon, Mr. Haldane and Mr. Winston Churchill, as a committee to study the problems of the Transvaal.

THE "DREADNOUGHT"

The King was present at the launch of Dreadnought. It is understood that she embodies all the war experience of the Japanese. After the launch the King invested Admiral Scott, Inspector of Naval Gunnery with the decoration of Knight of the Victorian order. It is understood that this is the result of recent gunnery improvements.

At the same time His Majesty also knighted Admiral Barry.

THE IRISH PARTY.

The Irish Party in Dublin have refused to support any English party or Government which refuses to make Home Rule a cardinal part of its programme.

THE SITUATION AT ALGECIRAS.

London, February 13.

The gravity of the situation at Algeciras absorbs attention for the moment. France insists on controlling and officering the police which is to be composed of Moors in the port towns, where insecurity is notorious, and possibly also in Fez. Germany apparently wishes to allot the privilege of policing to secondary European States some of which seem to be desirous of accepting it.

AMERICA AND CHINA.

It is reported from Washington that the Committee on Appropriations have refused the Supplementary credit for the Philippines, Mr. Secretary Taft admitting that it was not intended to send troops until it was evident that the Americans in China need protection.

MR. MAKINO.

Mr. Makino has left Vienna for Japan; most of the members of the Corps Diplomatique said farewell to him.

AMERICA AND JAPANESE FISHERMEN.

London, February 14.

The United States Congress is now discussing a Bill to exclude alien fishermen from the Alaska fisheries, aimed at checking the Japanese.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

The French and German inter-change of semi-official recriminations continued yesterday, but an Algeciras telegram about midnight said that some real improvement in the situation was manifest, and the uneasiness had disappeared.

FRANCE AND RUSSIA.

The French Chamber has adopted the Franco-Russian Commercial Treaty.

THE PHILIPPINES GARRISON.

London, February 14.

Reuter's Washington correspondent says that the Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary for War, continues to urge Mr. Secretary Taft to take military precautions in preparation for any emergency. Some troops are already en route to the Philippines.

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

London, February 15.

Mr. J. W. Lowther has been re-elected Speaker of the House of Commons.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

The British authorities in London and Peking do not anticipate any serious anti-foreign outbreak in China despite the fears entertained in the United States.

AMERICA AND THE JAPANESE FAMINE.

President Roosevelt has appealed to Americans to contribute for the relief of the famine now afflicting the great and friendly nation of Japan.

DOINGS AT ALGECIRAS.

The Algeciras Conference continues its discussion of the regulation and suppression of contraband trade.

ST. PETERSBURG BANK ATTACKED.

Later.

A band of men armed with revolvers attacked a bank in St. Petersburg but were driven off by the police after severe fighting. Several were killed.

NO MORE STRIKES.

The Polish revolutionaries announce that they have abandoned strikes and will resort henceforth to bombs. The Governor of Odessa has notified that any person possessing explosives or their ingredients will be executed without trial.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE IN TOKYO)

VLADIVOSTOCK NEWS.

The Japanese Commissioner of Trade in Vladivostock telegraphs under date of Feb. 13th that the ice-breakers are in a defective condition and that the entry and exit of ships is greatly delayed in consequence, several days being sometimes required. A month will probably elapse before normal conditions restored.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "TOKYO ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

AMERICA AND THE JAPANESE FAMINE.

London, February 14.

A message from New York says that the whole of America will undoubtedly respond promptly and generously to President Roosevelt's appeal on behalf of the Japanese famine.

RUSSIAN MINISTER TO TOKYO.

A message from Sofia says that M. Bakhztieff, the new Russian Minister to Tokyo, left for his post on the 13th of February. He was banquetted at the Palace. The press is confident that he will maintain his high reputation.

FRENCH ENTERPRISE IN MOROCCO.

London, February 15.

A telegram from Tangiers says that several Frenchmen have offered to the Moorish Pretender a loan of £40,000 and 70,000 stand of rifles in exchange for a concession of land at Melilla, on the Algerian frontier.

(FROM THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

AMERICA.

Washington, February 14.

America is despatching a regiment to the Philippines to reinforce the garrison there.

Anxiety is felt that war will break out between Great Britain and France on one side and Germany on the other in connexion with the situation in Morocco. In case the apprehension should be realized, America alone must attend to the duty of preserving order in China.

LABOURERS.

London, February 14.

Thousands of unemployed workmen held a demonstration in Hyde Park after which they presented a petition to the government asking for relief. Mr. Asquith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, made a speech to the workmen and promised that the Government would provide money to relieve their distress.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

London, February 13.

The British Parliament has been opened. The Rt. Hon. J. W. Lowther is again Speaker. The address of the King will be given on Monday, February 19th.

SOUTH AFRICA.

According to an official report, the disturbance in Natal is attributed to dissatisfaction on the part of the natives.

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

A good business has been done at full rates. Direct export figuring largely in the daily settlements. Prices for full size filatures have again advanced but at the close there is less doing although holders profess themselves very strong in their pretensions. Advices from consuming markets are not very encouraging and it is difficult for buyers to go on at these high prices.

ITCHING HUMOURS

SPEEDY CURE TREATMENT FOR EVERY HUMOUR.

Bathe the affected parts with hot water and CUTICURA SOAP, to cleanse the skin and scalp of crusts and scales, and soften the thickened cuticle. Dry, without hard rubbing, and apply CUTICURA OINTMENT freely to allay itching, irritation, and inflammation, and soothe and heal, and lastly take CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS, to cool and cleanse the blood. This pure, sweet, and wholesome treatment affords instant relief, permits rest and sleep, and points to a speedy, permanent, and economical cure of the most torturing, disfiguring, itching, burning, and scaly skin, scalp, and blood humours, eczemas, rashes, and irritations, from infancy to age, with loss of hair, when all else fails.

MILLIONS USE CUTICURA SOAP

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT, for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes, itchings, and chafings, and for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. Millions of Women use CUTICURA SOAP in the form of baths for annoying irritations, inflammations, and excoriations, for too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerative weaknesses, and for many sanative, antiseptic purposes which readily suggest themselves to women, especially mothers.

PRINCE ARTHUR AND THE GARTER MISSION.

His Royal Highness Prince Arthur Frederick Patrick Albert of Connaught, K.G., G.C.V.O., who arrived at Yokohama on Feb. 19th is the only son of H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught, brother of His Majesty the King. Prince Arthur was born on January 13th, 1883, and is thus twenty-three years of age. His Royal Highness is a lieutenant in the 7th Hussars, and served in South Africa in 1901-2. On his father's resignation of the Dukedom of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, Prince Arthur, who was heir to the throne, made way for his cousin, the Duke of Albany now Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, but Prince Arthur remains eventual heir in case of there being no male line of the Duke's own. Prince Arthur represented the King at the marriage of the German Crown Prince, and now represents his Majesty in conveying to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan the insignia of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught is himself a member of the Order.

ARRIVAL IN YOKOHAMA.

Splendid weather marked the arrival in Yokohama of Prince Arthur of Connaught who heads the Mission to confer the Order of the Garter upon His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan. Duly according to programme the British cruiser Diadem came into the outer anchorage about daybreak and during the morning salutes were exchanged. The Diadem was somewhat ahead of time so the various officials entrusted with the reception had to somewhat expedite their arrangements. All the events, however, came off according to the official programme, but long before ten o'clock, at which hour the Prince was understood to land, the Hatoba and its environs were crowded with people of all nationalities.

The huge liner Minnesota moved out and the Diadem took her place at No. 12 Buoy, being escorted up the bay by the cruiser Yakumo (flagship of Admiral Kataoka, Commander of the Second Squadron) and the cruisers Adzuma, Iwate and Chiyoda. As the Diadem entered the anchorage day fireworks were displayed from various points in the harbour and along the Bluffs. The battleship Asahi, the cruiser Otowa, and the torpedo destroyers Fubuki, Arare, Ariake and Yayoi, which were already in the harbour, were all dressed, as also was the Russian transport Yakout and various other merchant vessels. The Committee appointed to receive His Royal Highness—which consisted of General Baron Kuroki, Admiral Togo, Chief of the Naval Staff Office, Vice-Admiral Ijuin, Vice-Chief of the Staff Office, Mr. K. Takahira, formerly Minister to Washington, Mr. S. Nagasaki, Grand-Master of the Board of Ceremonies, Major-General Fukushima of the General Military Staff Office, Colonel Utsunomiya, formerly military attaché to the Legation in London, Captain Takarabe, of the Naval Staff Office, Count Terajima, confidential secretary to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Messrs. Watanabe and Asano, Masters of the Board of Ceremonies, with Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, Governor Sufu, and various officers from the Naval Department—left the Hatoba by steam launches for the Diadem to welcome His Highness. The Superintendent of the Harbour Office also proceeded in his launch to pilot the Diadem to her position at Buoy No. 12. At the entrance to the breakwater Police of the Harbour, Police Station were stationed in several boats, while they also patrolled the route which the Diadem followed. When the Diadem passed the Lightship, salutes were fired and fireworks were again sent up. Subsequently the royal cruiser reached her buoy, at 7.20 a.m., and salutes were again fired and fire-works displayed. At 9.50 a.m. His Highness left his ship and on board the Hatsukaze, an Imperial steam-launch specially sent from the Yokosuka Naval Station came ashore, the Japanese naval flag being hoisted at the bow and the Royal Standard at the stern. She reached, at 10 a.m., the second landing place of the English Hatoba, being escorted by several steam-launches with the Imperial Reception Committee, etc. His Highness landed at once. The arrangements at the Hatoba were capitally carried out. Two companies of blue-jackets, numbering 460 men, under Commander Mukai, from the Yokosuka Naval Station were drawn up in front of the Customs' Examination Office, and the naval band from Yokosuka was stationed at the entrance to the pier. Admiral Kamimura, Commander-in-Chief of the Yokosuka Naval Station, and his staff were present. Next to these were the officials of the local Government Offices, the leading traders, and the representatives of the Yokohama branch of the Ladies' Patriotic Society.

His Royal Highness was attended by Sir Edward Seymour, Admiral of the Fleet, General Sir Thomas Kelly Kenny, Colonel Arthur Davidson, Captain Wyndham, and Mr. M. W. Lampson, of the British Foreign Office. On landing the Prince was met by Mr. Nagasaki, Grand Master of the Board of Ceremonies, and Messrs. Watanabe and Asano, members of the Imperial Board of Ceremonies. Among others delegated to meet the Prince was Count Terashima, Confidential Secretary of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, but of course the heads of the Reception Committee were Admiral Togo and Baron General Kuroki. Among the people present from the British Embassy should be mentioned in addition to the Ambassador and Lady Macdonald, Mr. G. H. Barclay, C.M.G., Councillor of H.B.M. Embassy; Mr. F. O. Lindley, Mr. J. H. Gubbins, and Mr. R. H. Clive, the attachés being Colonel Hume and Captain Jackson, respectively, military and naval. From the Consulate-General in Yokohama, there were present the Consul-General, Mr. John Carey Hall, I.S.O., Mr. Hobart-Hampden and Mr. O. White, all in full uniform.

As the Prince ascended from the launch under the guidance of General Baron Kuroki and Mr. S. Nagasaki, of the Imperial Household, the band of the Yokosuka Naval Station played the British Naval Anthem. The Prince, being conducted past the building usually devoted to Customs purposes, was met by Miss Chiyo Sufu, daughter of the Governor (who was accompanied as chaperone by Mrs. J. Carey Hall) who presented to him a beautiful basket of flowers. Miss Chiyo, who is about fourteen years of age, was charmingly attired in iris crepe, with patterns of spring blossoms, and wore a costly rasetta obi; her hair was dressed in semi-foreign-student style and her manner as well as her appearance most have strikingly impressed the Prince who cordially returned his thanks.

His Highness walked a few steps and was then the recipient of an address from Mayor Ichihara, on behalf of the community of Yokohama, which read:

"To His Royal Highness Prince Arthur Frederick Patrick Albert of Connaught K.G., G.C.V.O.

"On behalf of the citizens of Yokohama, I welcome your Royal Highness most heartily, and wish to thank you for giving our city the honour of welcoming you first on the shores of Japan.

"The friendship between Great Britain and Japan has been strong and lasting, and it gives us great pleasure to know that the bonds of this friendship have been materially strengthened by the conclusion of a new Treaty of Alliance, which is but the natural result of the mutual respect and good-will between the two countries.

"Your Royal Highness now arrives here as Special Representative of your August King and Emperor to present our Emperor with the Insignia of the Garter, the highest order of your realm. It is with particular satisfaction that we witness the constant growth of the mutual respect and good-will between the two Imperial courts.

"May your visit to our country be very pleasant and may it also be a means of still further strengthening the ties of friendship between the two nations! With every expression of my deepest respect, I remain, your humble and obedient servant, Morihiro Ichihara, Mayor of Yokohama."

The Prince replied to this address in the fewest of words, simply saying that he was sincerely gratified to receive such a welcome.

Cheers were heartily given at this time, amid which Prince Arthur arrived at the place allotted to the British Committee. His Royal Highness, who looked very handsome in his Hussar uniform, surrounded as he was with a glittering party, listened with deep attention while Mr. Jas. Walter on behalf of the British community read the following address.

"To His Royal Highness Prince Arthur Frederick Patrick Albert of Connaught, K.G.

On behalf of the British residents of this port we most heartily welcome your Royal Highness after your long voyage from the Mother Country.

"It is nearly sixteen years since your Royal parents paid a visit to Japan, and now it is with gladness that we see their son arrived in this beautiful country on a mission to its August Emperor from our beloved and gracious King.

"It is a satisfaction for us to know that the bonds of friendship have been tightened between the two countries, and that your Royal Highness is the bearer of the Insignia of the Garter, the highest order which our King and Emperor has ever bestowed upon a foreign potentate.

"We trust your stay in this hospitable country may tend to further strengthen the friendship between the East and the West, and that your visit may be a happy omen to our gallant allies."

Your humble and obliged servants,

THE COMMITTEE

Representing the British Residents of Yokohama.

Prince Arthur, in reply, said:—"Gentlemen, I thank you very sincerely for the very kind address of welcome you have presented to me."

The British Reception Committee comprised the following gentlemen:—Mr. Jas. Walter (Chairman), Rev. W. P. G. Field, M.A., Dr. Wheeler, Messrs. M. Beart, E. C. Davis, H. C. Gulland, J. T. Hamilton, Caesar Hawkins, F. S. James, F. J. Lias, A. Maclean, C. K. M. Martin, and A. G. M. Weale.

Sir Claude MacDonald afterwards introduced the members of the deputation to the Prince, who very cordially shook hands with each member.

The address presented by the British residents of Yokohama was enclosed in a very handsome silver box, 17½ inches in length, 3½ inches wide, and 2¾ inches deep. The design was chrysanthemums and cherry blossoms, and on the lid was the following inscription:—

"Presented to H.R.H. Prince Arthur of Connaught by the British Residents of Yokohama. February 1906."

The box, which was a superb piece of workmanship, was made by Messrs. Arthur & Bond, silversmiths, of Yokohama.

The Prince then entered a carriage accompanied by General Baron Kuroki and drove to the detached palace on Moto Benten, which he left shortly afterwards for Tokyo on a very gaily decked train.

The decorations at Yokohama were most striking and effective. Chiefly noticeable were the English and Japanese colours in combination. At the Hatoba a large evergreen wreath shown in English the word "Welcome"; the various public offices displayed the two flags in similar friendly combine, and crowds of people lined the streets through which the young Prince passed.

WELCOMED BY THE EMPEROR.

At Shimbashi the welcome accorded to the Prince was even more significant than that given to him in Yokohama, the Emperor paying him the unusual honour of welcoming him personally at the station. The departure of the Prince from Yokohama being signalled to the Imperial Court, the Emperor and the Crown Prince, accompanied by Marquis Tokudaiji, Grand Chamberlain, General Baron Okazawa, Chief Aide-de-Camp to His Majesty, and Major-General Muraki, Chief Aide-de-Camp to His Highness the Crown Prince, and other officials of the Imperial Household Department, left their respective palaces. His Majesty and the Crown Prince drove to the railway station and awaited the arrival of the Prince in one of the upper rooms of the railway station building. Subsequently, a further report being received by telegram that the Prince had passed Omori at 11.28 a.m., the Emperor and the Crown Prince descended to the platform to welcome His Royal Highness. Here had assembled Princes of the Blood, Marquis Saionji the Premier, Mr. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Hara, Minister for Home Affairs, Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, Vice-Admiral Saito, Minister for the Navy, Mr. Matsuda, Minister for Justice, Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications, General Terauchi, Minister for War, Count Katsura and other members of the late cabinet, Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama and other high officers of the Army, Admiral of the Fleet Viscount Ito, and other high naval officers; Prince Tokugawa, President of the House of Peers; Mr. Sugita, President of the House of Representatives; a number of the members of both houses, Counts Okuma and Itagaki, Baron Senge, Governor of Tokyo-Fu, Mayor Ozaki, Baron Shibusawa, President of the Chamber of Commerce, the Corps diplomatique, and other notables. At 11.40 a.m. the train with Prince Arthur arrived. The Emperor and the Crown Prince welcomed him on the platform and subsequently he drove to the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace, being escorted by a troop of cavalry. The approaches to the station were crowded with myriads of people, but the police managed the enormous traffic right admirably so that even the smallest school-child saw the brilliant ceremony without fear of hurt. Tokyo has seldom seen such a royal welcome.

Needless to say all the leading Japanese papers of Tokyo published articles cordially welcoming Prince Arthur to these shores, the Tiji Shimpō, Kokumin and Nichi Nichi Shimbun being particularly laudatory in their remarks concerning Great Britain and King Edward.

DINES WITH PRINCE ARISUGAWA.

At 3.30 p.m. on Feb. 19th Prince Arthur proceeded to the Imperial Palace to pay his first complimentary visit on the Emperor and after about an hour's stay returned to the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace. At 7.30 p.m. His Highness was entertained by H.I.H. Admiral Prince Arisugawa at a brilliant banquet. His Imperial Highness is an old acquaintance of the distinguished visitor. The seating arrangements at the dinner were as follows:—

Major Osawa.	Mr. Ito, Grand Steward to Prince Arisugawa.
Mr. Saito.	Mr. K. Takahira.
Mr. Lampson.	General Baron Kuroki.
General Count Katsura.	Colonel Davidson.
Admiral of the Fleet Sir E. H. Seymour.	Mr. Sakurai, an official of the Imperial Household.
Mr. Hashiguchi.	Prince Kitashirakawa.
Prince Kuni.	Countess Toda.
Princess Nashimoto.	Prince Kanin.
Princess Fushimi.	Princess Higashifushimi.
Princess Arisugawa.	Prince Arisugawa.
Prince Arthur of Connaught.	Lady MacDonald.
Princess Kuni.	Prince Higashifushimi.
Princess Nashimoto.	Mr. Nagasaki.
Mr. Uyeno.	Sir Claude MacDonald.
Lord Redesdale.	General Sir T. Kelly Kenny.
Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household.	General Baron Kodama.
Captain Wyndham.	Admiral Togo.
Count Toda.	Mr. Nagasaki.
Major Hishida.	Mr. Watanabe.

Prince Arisugawa gave a speech in English welcoming Prince Arthur. The latter replied in brief terms, and the party broke up at a late hour.

PRESENTATION OF THE GARTER.

The presentation of the Order of the Garter to His Majesty the Emperor by His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught representing His Majesty King Edward, took place at 10.30 a.m. on Feb. 20th in the Homei Hall of the Imperial Palace. On the right side of the throne were the Crown Prince, Prince and Princess Arisugawa, Prince and Princess Higashi-Fushimi, Prince and Princess Fushimi, Prince and Princess Kuni, Lady Takakura, Lady Kitajima, Lady Kagawa, Marquis Tokudaiji, Grand Chamberlain, General Baron Okazawa, Chief Aide-de-Camp, etc.; next to these the places in rear of the Throne were occupied by Field-Marshal Marquis Yamagata, Field-Marshal Count Nodzu, Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, Admiral of the Fleet Viscount Ito, Marquis Saionji, Premier, Count Inouye, Viscount Tanaka, Minister for the Imperial Household; General Terauchi, Minister for War; Mr. T. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Vice-Admiral N. Saito, Minister for the Navy, Baron Hanabusa, Vice-Minister for the Imperial Household; Count Toda, Messrs. Ito, Inaba, Fujinami, Masters of the Board of Ceremonies; General Baron Kuroki, Admiral Togo, Vice-Admiral Ijuin, Major-General Fukushima, Mr. S. Chinda, Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, etc. On the left of the Throne were the British Ambassador, Lady Claude MacDonald, the Councillor of the British Embassy, Mr. G. H. Barclay and Mrs. Barclay, and various members of the staff of the British Embassy. Members of the Board of Ceremonies and officials of the Department of the Imperial Household were also present. His Highness Prince Arthur and party being introduced by Mr. Ito, Vice-Grand Master of the Board of Ceremonies, entered the Hall, and a procession was formed in the following order:—

Mr. M. W. Lampson.	Throne	Colonel A. Davidson.
Captain Wyndham.	O	Admiral of the Fleet Sir E. Seymour
General T. K. Kenny.	O	Lord Redesdale
	O
	Prince Arthur of Connaught.

Mr. Lampson bore the Insignia; Lieut. Col. W. G. C. Wyndham the Cape of the Order; Col. Davidson the Star and Surcoat; Admiral Sir E. H. Seymour the Garter; Sir Thomas Kelly-Kenny the Collar, and Lord Redesdale the George. Prince Arthur carried an autograph letter from His Majesty King Edward which, after approaching the Throne with due ceremony, he presented, the members of his suite remaining on his right and left. Retiring a few steps his Royal Highness said he had been entrusted with the mission under the instructions of King Edward and he then explained the history of the Order of the Garter. His address was interpreted by Mr. Nagasaki, a confidential Secretary of the Minister of the Imperial Household, who also interpreted the reply of His Majesty. The various objects comprising the insignia of the Order were then handed to the Prince by their respective bearers and his Royal Highness personally attached the garter to the left knee of the Emperor. The Grand Cordon, the Star, the Collar, the Coat and Hat were similarly conferred. The ceremony, which has been carried out in a most stately fashion, then concluded and shortly afterwards the Prince left the Palace.

The Emperor has been pleased to decorate Prince Arthur of Connaught, with the Grand Cordon of the Chrysanthemum. The First Order of the Rising Sun has been conferred on Lord Redesdale, Admiral Sir E. Seymour and General Sir Thomas Kelly Kenny; the Second Order of the Sacred Treasure on Colonel Davidson, and the Fourth Order of the Rising Sun on Col. Wyndham and Mr. Lampson.

In the afternoon, the British Prince paid visits to the Crown Prince and other princes of the blood.

As already reported as part of the official programme arranged by the Imperial Reception Committee, His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught proceeded at 6.30 p.m. on Feb. 20th to the Imperial Palace where he was entertained at a banquet specially held in his honour. Many distinguished persons were present. Subsequently His Highness was entertained by three exhibitions of ancient dancing. These were the Shunetkwa, or Flowers of Spring; and the Taiheiraku, or Music of Peace. This dance was devised about one thousand and forty years ago in imitation of a dance imported from China. The music indicates the happy conditions prevailing when humanity enjoys universal peace. The Nosori dance, which concluded the entertainment, exhibited the gambols of two dragons.

LUNCHES WITH THE MINISTER OF WAR.

The glorious weather which greeted the Prince on his arrival in Yokohama, turned to snow on Tuesday. It fell steadily till evening, when rain set in and a persistent downpour continued all night and the whole of Wednesday, making everything out doors look very dreary. At noon on February 21st, as had been arranged by the Imperial Reception Committee, the Prince was entertained by General Terauchi, Minister for the Army, at the Koraku-in, Koishikawa. The Ministers of State, high officers of the Army and Navy, as well as princes of the blood to the number of about eighty were present.

On Wednesday morning H.R.H. Prince Arthur of Connaught received at the Kasumigaseki Palace Marshal Yamagata, Marshal Oyama and Admiral Togo and presented each with the Order of Merit.

BANQUET BY THE CROWN PRINCE.

In the evening, His Highness the Crown Prince entertained Prince Arthur at the Shiba Detached Palace where practically all the guests who were present at the banquet held in the Imperial Palace were also included. An exchange of cordial addresses took place between the British Prince and the Crown Prince.

At 9.30 a.m. on Feb. 21st, His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught received at the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace, Count Inouye, Prince Y. Tokugawa, descendant of the ex-Shogun, Prince I. Tokugawa, Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications, and many peers. Subsequently on the introduction of Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, he received the foreign representatives in Tokyo.

At 3.30 p.m. on Feb. 21st, the Prince paid a visit to the Mitsui Gofukuten, Nihonbashi, in company with Lord Redesdale, Sir E. H. Seymour, and the Imperial Reception Committee, and made several purchases. About an hour later he left for the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace.

The following was the menu at the lunch given by General Terauchi, Minister for War, in honour of the Prince at the Korakuen Koishikawa at noon on Feb. 21st :

Hors d'oeuvre.
Consommé à la Quenelle.
Truite saumonée Sée. Chambord.
Filet de Boeuf au Cèpe.
Espic de foie gras en Belle-vue.
Choux-fleurs Sée. Mousseline.
Faisan rôti, Salade.
Touffing d'Emande.
Glace au Charlotte,
Dessert.

THE EMBASSY BALL.

In spite of unfavourable weather, the ball at the British Embassy on Wednesday evening was a most brilliant and successful affair. Long before nine o'clock every approach was packed with carriages, and the entrance hall as well as the reception rooms were crowded with splendid uniforms and bright faces. The space directly within the front door was reserved as a dressing room for the Royalties, who alighted there and were met in the hall beyond by the host and hostess. The other guests passed in through the library, and early in the evening the neighbouring smoking room was full of the great men whose faces we know so well: Marshals, Admirals, Statesmen—it presented an interesting gallery of the makers of recent Japanese history. When Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived with his suite, the bright crowd parted, and he passed on to the drawing room to the strains of the National Anthem, and soon after took his place at the head of the quadrille d'honneur with Princess Shigashi Fushimi. His fair, handsome face, upright figure and magnificent scarlet uniform naturally made him the centre of all eyes. Princess Nashimoto and Princess Yamashina were dancing in the same quadrille, where there was an interesting array of the most impressive Japanese and foreign personalities. Almost more interest, however, was centred in the smaller drawing room, where Admiral Togo, shy and silent as usual, was listening to the remarks of General Kelly Kenny and some British naval officers. Marshals and Generals, in the fine Japanese uniforms, stood around playing with their well won decorations; in a corner, silent and thoughtful sat Marquis Saionji, in quiet evening dress—looking less gay and alert than usual. He was heard to confide to a friend that the present parliamentary sessions were enough to make any man look grave. Count Inouye, who always seems to carry with him an atmosphere of calmness and repose, was talking earnestly to the great financier, Mr. Takahashi, whose bright eyes and jovial countenance seemed to imply that national finance is an amusing and cheerful pastime. But after all, at a ball, the young people are the ones with whom everybody secretly sympathises, and the girls' smiling faces and charming toilettes harmonised very happily with the varied uniforms of the Middles from the Diadem and the many young British officers now studying the Japanese language in Tokyo. English people so seldom behold their own officers tricked out in the whole gorgeous panoply of war that the sight is one of artistic pleasure—in spite of the smothered protests of the gallant officers themselves. It seems a pity that none of these were invited to be present when His Royal Highness landed at the Yokohama hatoba the other day and that their loyalty had to confine itself to mingling with the crowd outside the Shimbashi Station. However, they made up for it on Wednesday night, and the medals and decorations worn by some of them rivalled in number the splendid show on Japanese uniforms. Supper was served at eleven o'clock in an improvised pavilion, tastefully decorated with flags and flowers, and when the brilliant procession had filed in the whole presented a bright and charming scene.

We still witness odd contrasts in this meeting place of nations! While supper was going gaily on downstairs, in a quiet tea room on the upper floor a well-known Japanese diplomatist was in deep converse with an equally distinguished Chinese official—they were talking French, over a cup of unmistakeable English breakfast tea.

The unusual concourse and the precedence granted to all the court carriages made it difficult for departing guests to find their conveyances; many were seen making their way to the front gate on foot, under a most inclement downpour of rain; but even this seemed not to have had the effect of damping their enjoyment of a most memorable and delightful evening.

Sir Claude MacDonald, with that charming thoughtfulness for others which is one of his distinguishing characteristics, had provided a special train to convey home the Yokohama contingent of his guests and this was largely availed of by those who had travelled up specially to the capital for the ball.

AT YOKOHAMA.

His Highness left Shimbashi on Feb. 22nd by the 8.15 a.m. train for Yokosuka with his suite and the Imperial Reception Committee as well as a number of officers of the Naval Department. At 9.56 a.m., His Highness arrived at Yokosuka Railway Station. On the platform high officers of the naval station, officials of the local government offices, and representatives of various public bodies, as well as two companies each of soldiers and bluejackets were present to welcome him. He embarked by a torpedo-boat to make a tour round the harbour. The warships in the harbour were fully dressed and fired the usual salutes. When His Highness appeared afloat all the crews manned their ships and the bands on board the various vessels played the British national anthem and other selections. The torpedo-boat carrying Prince Arthur, under command of Commander Ouchida, passed between the lines of warships and on reaching the pier he was received by Admiral Kamimura Commander of the Naval Station and Staff, Vice-Admiral Saito, Minister for the Navy, etc. Thence he paid a visit to the docks, arsenals, etc. Subsequently he was entertained at the barracks. At 4 p.m. he left Yokosuka, returning to Tokyo at 5.45 p.m.

In the evening, His Highness was entertained by Mr. T. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs, at his official residence.

In connexion with the tour of Prince Arthur through the interior; the following hotels, etc., are allotted for his accommodation :

Shidzuoka	Daito-kwan.
Nagoya	Nagoya Hotel.
Kyoto	Kyoto Hotel.
	(Tokiwa-ro.)
Kagoshima	Iso Castle.
Nikko	Kanaya Hotel.

It may be added that his departure from Tokyo will take place on Feb. 27th.

Field-Marshal Marquis Yamagata, Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama and Admiral Togo, on whom His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught conferred the Order of Merit as representing His Majesty the King of England on Feb. 21st sent telegrams to the British Court. Their messages were simply in the sense of expressing thanks for the high honour bestowed on them.

The following notes concerning the Most Noble Order of the Garter may prove interesting :—

The motto in Old French, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," familiar with its mistranslation, "Evil to him who evil thinks," really signifies, "Accused be he who sees harm in the Garter." Nowadays we see great honour in it, and great as is the Emperor of Japan, the compliment now on its way to him is considered one of the highest that the British King-Emperor can bestow. It is possible that even its modern aspects are not as familiar to all as they might be, and we reproduce here from Whitaker's "Peerage" two passages of interest :—

"The Order itself may be said to rank indisputably as the first in the world, and the number of foreign Sovereigns who have accepted it is almost countless. It is still limited to twenty-five Knight Companions, with the Sovereign and the Prince of Wales, and such occasional extra Knights and foreign rulers and dignitaries as may be admitted by special statute, the "extras" being merged in the regular five-and-twenty upon the first occurrence of vacancies; the only alteration has been the extension of the limits to lineal descendants of either of the four Georges. A Knight of the Garter is at his investiture allotted a stall in St. George's Chapel at Windsor, over which are set up, to be retained throughout his life, his sword, helmet, crest, banner, and a plate containing his arms, titles: this practice is still in vogue, partially at any rate.

The decorations of the Knights of the Order constitute a most elaborate and imposing array, comprising the Garter, Mantle, Surcoat, Star, Hood, Hat, Collar, George, Lesser George, and Ribbon. First, the Garter itself (worn below the left knee), of dark blue velvet edged with gold, the motto in golden letters, and the buckle and pendant of chased gold (those awarded to foreign Sovereigns have been most richly gemmed, that sent to Gustavus Adolphus having the motto composed of some four hundred diamonds). Secondly, comes the Mantle, which is of dark blue velvet lined with white taffeta (this is the mantle worn by Sovereign upon state occasions, the regal distinction lying in the extra length of the train). Thirdly, we have the Surcoat, of crimson velvet, lined like the Mantle and adorned like it upon the left breast with an eight-pointed silver embroidered Star, within which is the Red Cross of St. George, the whole encircled by a miniature blue garter. After these come the Hood, resembling the Surcoat in colour and material, and the Hat which is of black velvet and surmounted by a plume attached by a diamond composed of white ostrich feathers with a central tuft of black ones from the heron. Then there is the Collar, which is constructed of twenty-six circular medals of gold fastened together by chains; each medal has for its border a garter with its motto, and for its interior a rose, alternately white and red; between each medal and the next is a true-lovers' knot, formed of gold and enamelled white. The twenty-six "garters" as they are called, correspond to the number of the Order—the Sovereign and Knight Companions; the entire Collar weighs exactly thirty-two ounces. Suspended to this Collar over the breast is the Badge or George, an image of that saint encountering the Dragon; the Lesser George, which is similar, is attached to the broad dark blue Ribbon of the Order, passing over the left shoulder and crossing obliquely to beneath the right arm.

Prince Arthur when in Hongkong on his way to Japan was entertained among other things with a Chinese play and a Khattack dance. Regarding the play the Daily Press said:—The first act of the play showed the kings of six petty states, all of whom paid tribute to China, deliberating as to the advisability of appointing a minister to the Court of China who would represent their common interests. They apply to the Emperor, who agrees to their request, and a Prime Minister to represent their united interests is appointed. In this appointment, determined by scholarly attainments, is indicated the height of human ambition among the Chinese. The second act dealt with the capture of a notorious rebel leader by the loyal officers of the Chinese Government. The third act was based on the suppression of a frontier rebellion, being made interesting by a series of defeats and successes.

With regard to the Khattak Dances our contemporary is rather captious in its description:—

A matshed circus had been erected on the Parade Ground, in the shape of a horse shoe. The two ends impinged on the retaining wall of the Cathedral Compound, and a platform on the embankment thereof accommodated the Prince, the Governor, and a large company of the élite. The amphitheatre was crowded with the rank and file of society. In the centre a bonfire of wood blazed, periodically exhilarated by libations of kerosene, the subtle odour of which appealed to every nose within reach. The circumference of the arena was punctuated by flambeaux, which also owed their sustained luminosity to the same odorous agency. There was a long wait before the band abruptly left "The Broken Melody" and played the opening bars of the National Anthem; but soon after that strains very much reminiscent of "Caledonia stern and wild" were heard, and a mob of turbanned and shirted maulers of music marched swiftly round the ring, caterwauling and "tom-tom-ing." Fragments of "Cock o' the North" and the Belfast Schottische alternated with jungle cries of the most ear-splitting and heart-breaking nature. Suddenly a portion of this mob hurried out, leaving four whose "music" diminished to a plaintive wailing and throbbing. A horde of Indians poured in, and with wildly waving arms danced slowly round the bonfire, genuflecting towards it, whirling like drunken teetotums, and sometimes howling in choruses and striking the earth with their palms. Many of them had flowers and garlands adorning their headgear. They gave place to a different and still more Oriental looking crowd, whose nasal organs without exception might have been cast in one mould. There were four entrances and exits, the dance in each case being very similar, but on the final appearances the men carried naked swords, which they brandished in a most alarming manner, sometimes (by accident) clashing with their neighbours. The final figure was done by a few selected swordsmen who ran in with a sword in each hand, and kneeling with their faces to the Royal guest, gave a fine display of suist work. The whole spectacle might have been more weird and barbaric than it was, but for some little features which prevented the play of imagination. The later performers were bare footed: their predecessors wore a conspicuous mixture of footgear, ranging from very large white tennis shoes to army boots of equally generous dimensions. In the fitful light, it might have been easy to imagine that the scene was situated somewhere among Bagheera's hills; that these men were working up a fanatic frenzy preparatory to a tribal foray; but alas, the prosaic sight of a kerosene can and two unnecessary European officers in the middle of things choked off romance, and made the final impression one of meretriciousness.

The Chinese address to Prince Arthur of Connaught, presented to him on his landing in Hongkong, was a work of art, being written on a long scroll of yellow silk. The translation read:—

"May it please Your Royal Highness,—We the Chinese of Hongkong, representatives, merchants and others, humbly acknowledge that we have long found a safe refuge under the shelter of the August Ruler of the British Empire. We feel with gratitude His Majesty's quickening influence and thank him for the manifold blessings wherewith he has enriched us. From his Government we have received guidance and support; under the rule of his Ministers peace and concord.

"Earnestly and often we have striven to repay in some measure the kindness shown to us, and now we hail with respect and joy the fortunate arrival of your Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught.

"In your hands are the jewelled greetings from the King's palace, and you bear them with Royal ceremony to the Eastern Isles. On this happy day of the second month the wheels of your princely chariot are stayed by the fragrant streams. You come as a glorious cloud to this distant land and as a downpour of timely rain. Your banners descend from Heaven and the longings of your people are fulfilled. As your escort enters our loyal Colony at every door shouts of joy arise.

"Heir of Kings! You have laid aside the dignity of your Royal birth to labour for the peace and prosperity of the nation. Deep we bow in admiration and our loving reverence is increased a thousandfold. We pray that virtue and happiness may be multiplied unto you and we beseech you deign to listen to us while with one heart and voice we join with our rude verses in the universal song of praise:—

'Gentle Folk and Simple, by the Fragrant River, Bathed in a King's Mercy, find Refreshment ever.
Happy Day! when King's Son, hither journeying, Bringeth for our Winter seasonable Spring.
Swelleth Seed and bloweth Mead, Nature bourgeoneth, Day-star of all Countries, at thy quickening breath;
Through a thousand Autumns shall thy Glory stand
For a sure Protection to our peaceful Land.'
"Dated on a lucky day in the second month of the year 1906."
